THE LIBRARY OF
THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA
LOS ANGELES
SCHOOL OF LAW

REPORTS OF CASES

ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN

THE SUPREME COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA

COVERING

ALL THE CASES (LAW AND EQUITY) FROM THE ORGANIZATION OF THE COURT (BAY'S REPORTS) UP TO AND INCLUDING VOLUME 25 OF THE SOUTH CAROLINA REPORTS

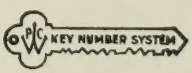
ANNOTATED EDITION

UNABRIDGED, WITH KEY-NUMBERED NOTES AND REFERENCES BY THE EDITORIAL STAFF OF THE NATIONAL REPORTER SYSTEM

BOOK 20

CONTAINING A VERBATIM REPRINT OF

VOLS. 1, 2 & 3 DESAUSSURE'S EQUITY REPORTS



ST. PAUL
WEST PUBLISHING CO.
1917

rS
SC70
S.87

RR
KFS
1845
.A2
bk2.20

COPYRIGHT, 1917
BY WEST PUBLISHING COMPANY

(BOOK 20 S.CAR.)

REPORTS OF CASES

ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE

COURT OF CHANCERY OF THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA

FROM THE REVOLUTION TO DECEMBER, 1813, INCLUSIVE

IN THREE VOLUMES

BY

HENRY WILLIAM DESAUSSURE

SENIOR JUDGE OF THE COURT OF EQUITY, AND PRESIDING JUDGE OF THE COURT OF APPEALS IN EQUITY IN THE SAID STATE

VOLUME I

Justitia est velle omnibus quod æquum est.
The duties of life are more than life.—Bacon's Works, Vol. VI.

COLUMBIA, S. C.
PRINTED BY CLINE & HINES
1817

ANNOTATED EDITION

ST. PAUL
WEST PUBLISHING CO.
1917

District of South-Carolina.

Be it remembered, That on the twenty-fifth day of April Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, and in the forty-first year of the Independence of the United States of America, the Honorable Henry William Desaussure deposited in this Office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as author and proprietor, in the words following, to wit:

"Reports of Cases, argued and determined in the Court of Chancery of the State of South-Carolina, from the Revolution to December, 1813, inclusive, in three volumes, by Henry William Desaussure, senior Judge of the Court of Equity, and presiding Judge of the Court of Appeals in Equity in the said State."

"Justitia est velle omnibus quod æquum est."

"The duties of life are more than life."—Bacon's works, vol. 6.

In conformity to the act of Congress of the United States, entitled "An act for the encouragement of learning by securing the copies of maps, charts and books to the authors and proprietors of such copies during the times therein mentioned;" and also, an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning by securing the copies of maps, charts and books to the authors and proprietors of such copies during the times therein mentioned,' and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving and etching historical and other prints."

JAMES JERVEY, Clerk of South-Carolina District.

DEDICATION

TO THE HONOURABLE

JAMES R. PRINGLE, PRESIDENT,

AND THE OTHER MEMBERS OF THE SENATE;

THE HONOURABLE

THOMAS BENNETT, SPEAKER,

AND THE OTHER MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, OF THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE FOLLOWING WORK OWES ITS PUBLICATION TO YOUR LIBERAL PATRONAGE: TO YOU THEREFORE, IT IS PROPERLY AND RESPECTFULLY DEDICATED, BY THE AUTHOR.

LIST OF JUDGES IN EQUITY

SINCE THE REVOLUTION

Upon the erection and establishment of the Court of Chancery after the revolution, by the act of the Legislature of the 21st March, 1784, John Rutledge, Richard Hutson, and John Mathews, were elected Judges of that Court. They continued in office until the new organization of the Courts of Law and Equity, in the month of February, 1791; at which time John Rutledge was elected Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas and Sessions, and thereby vacated his seat on the Equity Bench.

Hugh Rutledge was then elected a Judge of the Court of Equity.

Richard Hutson resigned his office; and his place was filled up by the election of James Green Hunt, in the month of May, 1794. He died in the course of the summer of that year. The vacancy occasioned by his death not being filled up, the Judges Mathews and Hugh Rutledge continued to hold the Court, until the month of November, 1797, when Judge Mathews resigned his office.

In 1799, Ædanus Burke, (then a Judge of the Common Pleas and Sessions) and William Marshall, were elected Judges in Equity.

Judge Burke dying in the year 1802, William Dobein James was elected to fill his place in December, 1802.

Judge Marshall dying in the year 1805, the vacancy was filled up by the election of Waddy Thompson, in December, 1805.

At the Session of the Legislature in December, 1808, the Court of Equity was again re-organized, new districts were created, and two additional Judges were added to the former numbers: whereupon Henry William Desaussure and Theodore Gaillard were elected and commissioned in December, 1808.

By the same act the salaries were raised to six hundred pounds per annum. But the old Judges could not receive the new salary, as the Constitution prohibited any increase or decease of salary during their continuance in office.

Judge Hugh Rutledge dying in January, 1811, Thomas Waties, (then a Judge in the Court of Common Pleas and Sessions) was elected in his place in December, 1811.

In December, 1813, Judges James and Thompson resigned their commissions; and were afterwards re-elected and took new commissions, which entitled them to the increased salary, under the act of 1808.

The Court is now composed of

Henry William Desaussure,
Theodore Gaillard, } Elected in December, 1808.

Thomas Waties,—Elected in December, 1811.

William Dobein James,
Waddy Thompson, } Elected in December, 1813.

TABLE OF CASES REPORTED

	Page
Anonymous	113
Anonymous	124
Bellinger v. Gervais	174
Beresford, Ex parte	263
Beresford v. Elliott's Ex'rs	183
Bethel Presbyterian Church v. Donnom	154
Bethune v. Beresford	174
Boone v. Durand's Ex'r	588
Bourke v. Bocquet	142
Bowles v. Drayton	489
Bowman v. Middleton	159
Bowman v. Middleton	163
Brown v. Cattell	112
Burrows v. McWhann	409
Butler v. O'Hear	382
Cape v. Adams	567
Carmichael v. Abrahams	114
Clarke v. Todd	112
Clifford's Ex'r v. Clifford	115
Clitherall v. Ogilvie	250
Colcock v. Butler	307
Commissioners of Public Accounts v. Boquet's Creditors	599
Commissioners of Public Accounts v. Greenwood	450
Commissioners of Public Accounts v. Rose	461
De Bardeleben v. Beekman	346
De Brahm v. Fenwick's Ex'rs	111
De Brahm v. Fenwick's Ex'rs	114
De Brahm v. Fenwick's Ex'rs	115
Denton v. McKenzie	289
Deveaux v. Barnwell	497
Dickinson v. Legare	537
Dill v. Dill	237
Dinckle v. Timrod	109
Drayton, Ex parte	116
Drayton, Ex parte	136
Drayton, Ex parte	144
Drayton v. Drayton	125
Drayton v. Drayton	324
Drayton v. Drayton	557
Dupont v. Goffe	143
Ernst v. Tharon	115
Evans v. Evans' Ex'rs	515
Fenwick, Ex parte	126
Fitzpatrick v. Smith	340
Flagg, Ex parte	164
Gadsden's Ex'rs v. Lord's Ex'rs	208
Garner v. Garner's Ex'rs	437
Gibbes, Ex parte	126
Gibbes, In re	587
Glaze v. Drayton	109
Glover v. Smith	433
Grant v. Stewart	136
Green's Ex'rs v. Warrington	430
Greene's Ex'x v. Ferrie	164
Greenland v. Brown	196
Grimke v. Grimke's Ex'rs	366
Haig v. Commissioners of Confiscated Estates	112
Haig v. Commissioners of Confiscated Estates	144
Haig v. Haig's Ex'rs	348
Hampton v. Snipes	125
Harleston's Adm'rs v. Lynch's Ex'rs	244
Hartly v. Carson	500
Higginson v. Air	427
Hopkins v. Wainwright's Ex'r	302
Hunter v. Boykin	108
Izard v. Middleton	116
Jacks v. Henderson	543
Johnson's Legatee v. Johnson's Ex'r	595
Keith v. Perry	353
Ladson v. Ward	314
Laurens' Ex'rs v. Hawkins' Ex'rs	144
Legare v. Ash, note	457
Lennox v. Gibbes	305
Lindsay v. Lindsay's Adm'rs	150
Lloyd v. Inglis' Ex'rs	333
Logan v. Ladson's Ex'r	271
Loocock v. Clarkson	471
Lowndes v. Lemprire	590
McDowel v. Teasdale	459
McKenzie's Creditors v. Burrows' Adm'r	142
Mayrant v. Davis	202
Megrath v. Robertson's Adm'rs	445
Miller v. Cape	110
Miller v. Miller's Ex'rs	111
Morton v. Smith	123
Murrell v. Greenland	332
Neilson v. Dickenson	133
Neilson's Ex'r v. Rutledge	194
Neufville v. Mitchell	480
Osborne v. Bremar	486
Parker v. McIver	274
Perigne v. Snowden	591
Perronneau v. Perronneau's Ex'rs	521
Postell v. Postell's Ex'rs	173
Postell v. Skirving's Ex'rs	158
Potts v. Cogdell	454
Quince v. Callender	160
Radford v. Westcott's Ex'x	596
Read v. Prince	145
Reid v. Smith	460
Reynolds v. Calder's Ex'rs	355
Rogerson v. Blake	135
Rose v. Hamilton	137
Rugge v. Ellis	160
Rutledge v. Williamson's Ex'r	159
Salvador v. Rapley	126
Sams v. Mathews	127
Sealy v. Laurens	137
Shackleford v. Buchanan	570
Shubrick's Ex'rs v. Russell	315
Simpson v. Gibbes	145
Smith v. Brailsford	350
Smith v. Huger	247
Smith v. Poyas	156
Smith v. Smith's Ex'rs	304
Snow v. Callum	542
Stock's Ex'x v. Stock's Ex'r	191
Stuart v. Carson's Ex'r	500
Talbird v. Verdier	592
Tattnell v. Fenwick's Ex'rs	143
Thompson v. Thompson	136
Todd v. Clarke	112
Todd v. Rivers' Ex'rs	155
Wainwright v. Read	573
Ward v. Wilson	401
Washington v. Huger	360
Watlington v. Howley	167
Wightman v. Brown	166
Wilkinson v. Wilkinson	201
Williman v. Petrie	125
Willingham's Ex'rs v. Simons' Ex'rs	272
Wilson v. Wilson	219
Woodbery v. Collins' Ex'r	424
Wright v. Wright's Ex'r	124

PREFACE

JUSTICE has been properly called the standing policy of civil society; and as that policy is well understood and steadily pursued in any country, it may be concluded, that the government is wise and paternal, or weak, vicious, and tyrannical. For beyond all doubt, as the pure and enlightened administration of justice is one of the greatest blessings which a nation can enjoy, so the possession of that blessing is an evidence, either of a high degree of wisdom in the construction of the government, or of great virtue in the administration of it. Abuses may indeed occasionally take place under any form of government, whilst the rulers continue to have the passions and infirmities of men. But the regular course, the habit of the system, and its usual working, will furnish a safe guide in forming a correct opinion of its merit. History, which teaches by example, instructs us, that wherever despotism prevails, a sound administration of justice cannot generally be expected. Some brilliant instances have indeed occurred where monarchs, cloathed with despotic powers, have caused justice to be impartially and steadily administered in their dominions. And the long course of nearly a century of wise and humane administration, during which the happiness of the people seemed to be the great object of the Roman princes, from Nerva to the younger Antonine, though vested with absolute power, seems to put at defiance all human reasoning, as to forms of government. But this example has been rarely set, and more rarely followed; and it appears to belong to free governments alone to model their judiciary systems on such principles as almost to insure a faithful and beneficent administration of the laws, whatever may be the character of the functionaries.

The danger, however, under almost any form of government, is not so much of direct and palpable violations of acknowledged principles, as of perversions and sophistications. Even in Turkey, where an unmasked despotism disregards the very forms of justice, power finds it more safe and convenient to resort to the abuse of principles, than to open violations of them. Of this truth Dr. Clarke, the famous traveller, has given some curious examples.

It seems that by the Mohammedan law there is an offence called "Homicide by implication," or more strictly, "Homicide by an intermediate cause." A remarkable case was tried at the Greek island of Cos, while Dr. Clarke and his companions were at that island, a few years ago. It was as follows: A young man desparately in love with a girl of Stanchio, eagerly sought to marry her; but his proposals were rejected. In consequence of his disappointment he bought some poison, and destroyed himself. The Turkish police instantly arrested the father of the young woman, as the cause by implication, of the man's death. Under the fifth species of homicide, he became therefore amenable for this act of suicide. When the cause came before the magistrate, it was urged literally by the accusers, that "If he, the accused, had not had a daughter, the deceased would not have fallen in love; consequently he would not have been disappointed; consequently he would not have swallowed poison; consequently he would not have died: But he, the accused, had a daughter; and the deceased had fallen in love; and had been disappointed; and had swallowed poison; and had died. Upon all these accounts he was called upon to pay the price of the young man's life; and this being fixed at the sum of eighty piastres, was accordingly exacted.

Another instance was mentioned to Dr. Clarke, which occurred at the island of Samos, as a characteristic feature of Turkish justice; that is to say, a sophistical application of a principle, rigidly founded upon this fifth species of "Homicide by implication."—The Capudan Pasha reasoned with the people of Samos, on the propriety of their paying for a Turkish frigate, which was wrecked upon their territory, and the crew lost, "because the accident would not have happened unless their island had been in the way."

Perhaps the English doctrine of Deodand, by which, whatever personal chattel is the immediate cause of the death of a human being, is forfeited to the king, comes strictly under this Turkish principle, though not carried to so absurd an extreme.

But cases of a much more atrocious and important kind have occurred in all governments tinctured with despotism. It is determined by the laws of China, that whosoever shows any disrespect to the emperor, is to be punished with death. As they do not mention in what this disrespect consists, any thing may furnish a pretext to take away a man's life, and to exterminate any family whatever. Two persons in that country, who were employed to write the Court Gazette, having inserted some circumstances relative to a certain fact, that were not true, it was pretended, that to tell a lie in the Court Gazette was a disrespect shown to the court; in consequence of which they were put to death. A prince of the blood having inadvertently made some mark on a memorial signed with the red pencil of the emperor, it was determined that he had behaved disrespectfully to that prince; which was the cause of one of the most terrible persecutions against that family that ever was recorded in history. Upon these facts Montesquieu makes the judicious remark, that if the crime of high treason be indeterminate, this alone is sufficient to make the government degenerate into arbitrary power.[1] Corruption keeps pace in such governments with the other abuses; and eagle-eyed despotism itself is deceived. In a case which occurred at Canton, some British seamen had killed a Chinese. The British agents acting for the East India company were extremely reluctant to give up the perpetrators, as the Chinese laws are generally strictly enforced in cases of homicide. The Chinese authorities demanded the seamen, and great difficulties arose; money was offered in profusion, and at length prevailed over all difficulties. The Chinese merchants, the hong, who were responsible for the ship, invented a story, that it was an accidental death; Chinese witnesses, who were bribed, attested it; Chinese Judges, who were corrupted, decided it; the relations of the man killed were bought to silence; and upon a false statement to the emperor, he confirmed the sentence by which the criminals escaped punishment. Thus corruption and imposition were carried to their highest pitch—But all this falsehood and concealment cost immense sums of money.[2]

The Roman story would furnish abundant examples of the abuses of power under judicial forms, by an enslaved senate, to satiate the cruelty or gratify the cupidity of a Tiberius, a Caligula, or a Nero. The first of these emperors seemed to take delight in making the senate the abject instrument of his butcheries and confiscations. No legal reports of these proceedings were ever published; but the indignant pen of the great historian Tacitus, has transmitted accounts of them, as everlasting memorials of the baneful nature of tyranny, and the fatal effects of a dependant judiciary.—Nor would the Grecian story fail to furnish innumerable examples of dreadful excesses committed by the popular governments of those small republics, where the people took upon themselves, in large bodies, to exercise the judicial power. The frequent judicial murders of the wisest and most virtuous citizens, by the majority of votes of a numerous court of citizens, is a stain upon the reputation of Athens which can never be wiped out.

In modern times the same scenes have been acted over in every country; and the innumerable judicial butcheries committed by the temporary tribunals erected by the triumphant party of the day, during the late revolutions in France, have only added new lessons to guard mankind against despotism, under every form it may assume. It is unjust, and cruel, and insatiable, whether it be exercised by a monarch, a leader of a faction, or a demagogue, who abuses his power over the people whom he misleads.

England has long boasted of the excellency of her judicial system, so well contrived, that whilst it guards the most exalted prerogative of the throne, and the privileges of the nobles, it shields the humblest subjects of the realm from the persecutions of the powerful, and the machinations of the cunning. Nor is this generally an idle boast—It is substantially true. But it is true only in modern times, and since the establishment of a real independence in the judiciary. Whilst the Judges were dependant on the government for their continuance in office, or for the amount of their salaries, the grossest abuses prevailed, and the nation felt the miserable effects of their dependance. The courts of justice, like the parliament, ministered to the avarice of Henry VII. to the cruel caprices and rapacity of Henry VIII. and to the high claims of prerogative of Elizabeth. In the time of James I. the same claims of high prerogative were set up by the monarch; and the weakness of that vain king permitted even his favourites to interfere with the regular administration of justice—And the dependant courts were but too subservient to the will of the prince, as well as the dictates of his favourites. The lord chancellor Egerton presided in the court of chancery upwards of twenty years, "with unblemished reputation as a Judge in private causes: but his public conduct had been always framed to the directions of the court, with an obsequiousness of dangerous example in one who held so great and important a trust." [3]

[1] Montesquieu's Spirit of Laws. 1st vol. p. 270.

[2] See Sir George Thomas Staunton's translation of the Penal Code of China, p. 515, 516. Appendix.

In the famous case relative to Commendams, king James, and his attorney-general sir Francis Bacon, interfered directly in the administration of justice, and obliged the Judges to suspend proceedings in a private suit, (under pretence that it touched the royal prerogative,) until the king should be consulted, and his pleasure made known. The Judges were summoned before the privy council, and the following question was propounded to them: "Whether if at any time, in a case depending before the Judges, which his majesty conceived to concern him, either in power or profit, and thereupon required to consult with them, they ought not to stay accordingly?" They all (the lord Chief Justice Coke excepted) yielded that they would, and acknowledged it to be their duty to do so: only the lord Chief Justice of the king's bench said for answer, "that when that case should be, he would do that which would be fit for a Judge to do." [4] This was certainly a noble answer, and has been commended by sir William Blackstone, and goes far to redeem the character of sir Edward Coke for his virulent prosecution and abuse of sir Walter Raleigh and other state criminals on their trials.

Villiers, duke of Buckingham, the all-powerful favourite, was in the constant practice of writing letters to the Judges, soliciting favourable judgments for the party litigating, whose cause he espoused. Of this numerous examples are to be found in the memorials of those times, and particularly in the collection of lord Verulam's letters. Nor were these letters missive intended as mere matters of form, obtained by the importunity of suitors. They were written by the mighty master of the king and the state with an express view to influence the courts of justice in favour of his dependants and supporters; and they had but too great effect on the yielding mind of the unhappy lord Verulam. Nor did it stop there. His probity once shaken, he glided down the stream of corruption, receiving at first presents at the conclusion of causes, and finally, as might be expected, accepting bribes, pendente lite. Mr. Egerton and others, who had been recommended by Buckingham, and had given him presents for decrees, became his accusers, and he was convicted of corruption, driven from his office, and from the house of lords, imprisoned and heavily fined. Thus fell, ever to be lamented, one of the wisest and greatest of the human race, acknowledging his corruption, and making humble submission.[5] The duke of Buckingham made the same kind of applications to lord Bacon's successor, the lord keeper Williams; in whose life by bishop Hacket, (part 1, p. 107,) it is stated, that there was not a cause of moment, but, as soon as it came to publication (preparatory to trial) one of the parties brought letters from this mighty peer, and the lord keeper's patron.[6]

Another signal example of the effects of a dependent judiciary occurred in the case of Peacham. This man had been accused of inserting in a sermon several treasonable passages; but in a sermon never preached, nor intended to be made public—It had been taken out of his study. King James I. ever jealous

[3] Mallet's Life of Bacon, p. 57.—4th vol. of the Works of Bacon, Letter 163.

[4] See tract relative to the case of Commendams.

[5] See 6th vol. Bacon's Works, London edition, 8vo. p. 142, 148, 177, 178, 179, 181, 186 (Mr. Egerton's case, in which he received seven hundred pounds;) 191, 192, 193 (Monk's case;) 195, 197, 198 (Hansbye's case, in which Bacon received five hundred pounds, pendente lite;) 199, 204, 211, 212, 213, 216, 217, 218, 225, 245, 247, 248, 251, 254, 280, 369.

[6] 6th vol. Bacon's Letters, p. 142.

on this point, ordered his attorney-general, sir Francis Bacon, to sound the Judges beforehand, and gather their opinions separate and apart. Lord Chief Justice Coke obstinately refused to declare his opinion before trial, looking on this auricular taking of opinions (for so he expressly called it) as not according to the customs and laws of the realm, but of new and pernicious tendency. The other Judges submitted, and gave their opinions. Peacham was then tried, and was found guilty of high treason: in the same manner, and on the same ground, as Algernon Sidney was afterwards tried and convicted for a like crime, and on like evidence, in the reign of Charles II.

It is lamentable to learn from his own letters, that that great man, Bacon, the boast and the ornament of the English nation, took an active part in this attempt upon the independence of the judiciary of his country, and applied with great dexterity the powers of his wonderful mind to beguile or overawe the Judges into a sacrifice of their duties and powers, at the shrine of oppression. The noble conduct of Lord Coke on this occasion, together with his firm resistance in the business of Commendams, cost him his office—So true it is, that the independence of the judiciary is hated and dreaded by despotic power, under every form of government.[7]

In the time of Charles I. the Judges still remaining dependant on the crown, the same servility was practised. The king having imposed a tax by his own authority, under the name of ship money, Charles, in order to discourage all opposition, proposed this question to the Judges: "Whether, in a case of necessity, for the defence of the kingdom, he might not impose this taxation; and whether he were not sole judge of the necessity?" The Judges answered "that in a case of necessity he might impose that taxation, and that he was the sole judge of the necessity."[8] And this was not an empty compliment; the taxation was universally enforced, and the liberty of the nation put in the greatest jeopardy; for if the king had finally prevailed in this contest, he would soon have enjoyed absolute power. He was already in possession of the sword by virtue of his prerogative as the executive of the nation; and the power over the purses of the people, would have made him complete master, and he might have trampled equally over the parliament and the people. Mr. Hampden nobly resisted this stretch of arbitrary power, and though he was rated only twenty shillings on account of this tax, he refused to pay it,—and resolved to stand a legal prosecution, notwithstanding the declared opinions of the Judges, the great power of the crown, and the little prospect of relief in parliament. The cause was fully argued twelve days, in the exchequer chamber, before all the Judges. The issue was such as might have been expected from a dependant bench; the majority of the Judges gave sentence in favour of the crown.[9] It is true that four of the Judges did themselves honour by standing up against the assumed prerogative of the king, and thus showed that there are always some high minded men, who will do their duty, at all hazards and under any circumstances. But they were in the minority—Hampden lost his cause but he gained his object—the nation was roused by this and other oppressive measures of the government, to open resistance: the king was overthrown, and the monarchy subverted. And though unhappy events, produced by the folly of the mad enthusiasts of the time, and by the cunning and valour of Cromwell, defeated for a season the views of the enlightened men who aimed at the establishment of a free government, these efforts were not made in vain. On the restoration of the royal family, in the year 1660, though recalled without conditions, (contrary to the advice of the wise and virtuous Hale,[10] afterwards the great and admirable Chief Justice, whose motion to send over propositions to the king was negatived by acclamation,) the new government, taught by experience, and guided by the able and virtuous lord Clarendon, did not venture to set up the extravagant pretensions which had caused the civil war. But Charles II. was a profligate monarch, without religion or mor-

[7] See 5th vol. Bacon's Letters, 8vo. London edition of 1803. Letters 112, 114; p. 338, 339, 340, 343, 344, &c.—Also, Mallet's Life of Bacon, p. 63.

[8] 6th vol. Hume's History of England, p. 313, 314, &c.

[9] 6th vol. Hume's History of England, p. 314 to 316—State trials—Article, "Ship Money;" which contains the speeches of the four Judges in favour of Hampden.

[10] 1st vol. Burnet's History of his own times, p. 142.

als; and after the prosecution and retreat of that great minister lord Clarendon, he was supported by ministers as unprincipled as himself. The utmost pains were taken to make the judiciary subservient to the purposes of the crown. To effect this Judges were selected, not for their learning, talents and probity, but for their zeal to serve the government at all hazards, and upon any terms. The Judges were made to feel their dependance by frequent removals, whenever they discovered any symptoms of a refractory spirit; and pliant tools, without probity or character, were appointed to fill their places.

These are grave charges, but they are supported by the historians of the times, some of whom were intimately acquainted with the facts which they relate, and all of them agree in the substance of the story. The following instances are given by them:—On the question relative to the charter of the city of London, which was declared to be forfeited, in order to new mould it, and reduce the city to subjection to the court, Judge Dolben not being favourable to the government, was turned out of office.[11] Wyld, a worthy Judge, indignant at the horrible perjuries of Bedloe, one of the infamous witnesses against men tried for their lives, on account of the popish plot, said to Bedloe, that he was a perjured man, and ought no more to come into courts of justice, but go home and repent. The Judge was turned out of office for his plain freedom.

During the trials which took place under pretence of the popish plot, in the year 1678, sir William Scroggs was Chief Justice, who is thus characterized: "Sir William Scroggs was a man more valued for a good readiness in speaking well, than either for learning in his profession, or for any moral virtue. His life had been indecently scandalous, and his fortunes were very low. He was raised by the earl of Danby's favour, first to be a Judge, and then to be Chief Justice —And it was a melancholy thing to see so bad, so ignorant, and so poor a man, raised up to that great post. Yet he now seeing how the stream run, went into it with such zeal and heartiness, that he was become the favourite of the people. But when he saw that the king had an ill opinion of it, (the plot,) he grew colder in the pursuit of it: upon which they who behaved themselves as if they had been tribunes of the people, began to rail at him. Yet in all the trials he set himself, even with indecent earnestness, to get the prisoners to be always cast." [12]

Another example may be given: "Fitzharris's trial (for a malicious and treasonable libel against the king) came on in Easter term, in the year 1681. Scroggs was turned out, and Pemberton was made Chief Justice. His rise was so particular, that it is worth being remembered. In his youth he mixed with such lewd company, that he quickly spent all he had; and ran so deep in debt that he was cast into a jail, where he lay many years. But he followed his studies so close in the jail, that he became one of the ablest men of his profession. He was not wholly for the court: He had been a Judge before, and was turned out by Scrogg's means; and now he was raised again, and was afterwards made Chief Justice of the other bench. But not being compliant enough, he was turned out a second time, when the court would be served by none but by men of a thorough paced obsequiousness." [13]

Nor is this the whole.—The same historian from whom we have made these extracts, states, "that all people were apprehensive of very black designs when they saw (in 1683) Jefferies made lord Chief Justice, who was scandalously vicious, and was drunk every day, besides a drunkenness of fury in his temper, that looked like enthusiasm. He did not consider the decencies of his post: nor did he affect to seem impartial as became a Judge."—"And Jefferies had three Judges joined with him in the king's bench, fit to sit by him." [14]

These apprehensions were soon verified, for in the following year (1684) Sidney was brought to trial, and convicted on proofs entirely insufficient, and which would not at this day be listened to in any tribunal in England or America. During Sidney's defence, which he conducted, himself, with admirable judgment and [11] 2d vol. Burnet's History of his own times, p. 925.

[12] 2d vol. Burnet's History, p. 776.

[13] 2d vol. Burnet's History p. 870.—I quote from the London edition of 1725, in five volumes.

[14] 2d vol. Burnet's History, p. 979, 980.

temper, "Jefferies interrupted him often very rudely," and endeavoured to overawe or trepan him—Judge Wilkens interrupted him, "and by a strange indecency gave him the lie in open court." And upon Sidney's laying a statement of his case before the king, "Jefferies, in his furious way, said, either Sidney must die or he must die." [15] Sidney was executed, a martyr to public liberty.

On the accession of James II. to the throne, the same practices were resorted to by the government against the integrity and independence of the Judges, who were secretly asked their opinions on important cases then pending, in which the court took an interest: "and such as were not clear to judge, as the court did direct, were turned out; and upon two or three canvassings, the half of them were dismissed, and others of more pliable and obedient understandings were put in their places. Some of these were weak and ignorant to a scandal." In these hands the nation was in the utmost peril of losing its liberties.[16] In the year 1685 Chief Justice Jefferies was sent, after the suppression of Monmouth's rebellion, to the western counties, to try the prisoners. His behaviour was beyond any thing that ever was heard of in a civilized nation. He was perpetually either drunk, or in a rage, liker a fury than the zeal of a Judge. He required the prisoners to plead guilty: and in that case he gave them some hope of favour, if they gave him no trouble—otherwise he told them, he would execute the letter of the law on them in its utmost severity. This made many plead guilty, who had a good defence in law. But he showed no mercy: He ordered a great many to be hanged up immediately—Upwards of six hundred were executed. Nor can it be said that this happened in a barbarous age. It was in the age of Hale, of Locke, of Dryden, and of many others who have done honour to the English nation and to human nature. Nor in those frightful times, when the laws, which should be the terror of evil-doers, and the protectors of the good, were so dreadfully perverted, by the base dependance of the Judges on the government, were the juries any safeguard to the subject. Burnet says, "they became the shame of the nation, as well as a reproach to religion; for they were packed, and brought in verdicts as they were directed, and not according to evidence."—"On Sidney's trial there was a packed jury, abusive Judges, and a resolution to convict him."

All these evils were terminated by the expulsion of James from the throne, and by the introduction of a new family, the choice of the nation, who brought in new and better principles of government. Yet it is strange that the convention parliament, which called the prince of Orange to the throne, did not then secure the establishment of the independence of the judiciary, the want of which had been so severely felt by the nation.

It was not until the year 1700, the last year of the life and reign of William III. that an act of parliament was passed (13th William III.) by which it was enacted, that the commissions of the Judges should be made (not as formerly, durante placito, but) quamdiu bene se gesserit, and their salaries ascertained and established. A wonderful change was immediately perceived in the conduct and tone of the Judges, after the passing this statute. We hear no more of potent peers, and favourites of the monarch, sending letters of recommendation to the Judges in favour of particular suitors. There was no longer a subservient temper in the Judges, calculated to secure their continuance in office. The stream of justice flowed in an even, unbroken course, and the English courts attained and have supported a character, for learning, impartiality, dignity, and purity in the administration of justice, unexampled, or at least unsurpassed, in any other age or nation. The Judges feeling their independence to be real and solid, disdained to lend themselves to the sinister purposes of ministers, and spurned at the interference of any power in the performance of their duties. A few years after the statute of William, abovementioned, was enacted, a singular case arose, which furnished occasion to the Judges to manifest the independence which they now felt. Some freemen of the borough of Aylesbury were refused permission to vote at an election for members of parliament. They insisted on their right, and instituted suits against the returning officers, who managed the election and had refused their votes. A question was made, whether a freeman had such a legal interest in the right of voting, as would support an action against the managers of the election who refused his vote. This was tried, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff against the returning officers—But three of the Judges decided that the action could not be supported. The lord Chief Justice Holt was of opinion, that the right to vote was an original right, founded on freehold, or charter, or prescription, or burgage tenure; all which are legal titles, and triable at law. On appeal to the house of lords, the judgment was reversed, and the action sustained. This bred great disputes between the house of commons and the lords. The commons committed all who were concerned in the suits.[17]

[15] 2d vol. Burnet's History, p. 984 to 987—See the state trials.

[16] Burnet's History, book 4th, transactions of the year 1686.

In the course of this cause, the house of commons had made an order that it should be penal for any Judge, counsel or attorney to be concerned in the trial. However the Chief Justice Holt, and several lawyers, brought the cause on. The house of commons, on this contempt of their orders, sent a serjeant at arms for the Chief Justice to appear before them—but he bade him begone: on which the commons sent a second message by their speaker, attended by as many members as espoused the measure. After the speaker had delivered his message, lord Chief Justice Holt replied to him in the following remarkable words: "Go back to your chair, Mr. Speaker, within these five minutes, or you may depend upon it I will send you to Newgate—You speak of your authority: but I tell you I sit here as the interpreter of the laws, and a distributor of justice: and were the whole house of commons in your belly, I would not stir one foot."

The speaker retired, and the house dropped the matter as far as respected the court. This was at a time when the house of commons was becoming the most important branch of the government; and resistance to its authority required more firmness than opposition to the executive power. Nor was this a solitary instance—In aftertimes the courts decided that general warrants, which had been long, if not immemorially used by the secretary of state, were illegal; and this inquisitorial branch of executive power fell to the ground.

Many of the emigrants who settled the English colonies in America, left Great Britain during the reigns of Charles I. Charles II. and James II. They brought with them a deep abhorrence of the intolerance and tyranny of those princes; and especially of the great abuses prevailing in the courts of justice: And they partook of the general joy in the prodigious securities obtained in the subsequent reigns, for civil and political liberty; among which, the establishment of the independence of the Judges formed a principal feature. Their attachment to these principles was further increased by the mischiefs resulting from the incautious appointments made by the British government, in many instances, of very inferior men, to preside in the courts of justice of the colonies, who did no honour to the mother country, and whose irregularities and improper conduct contributed in a considerable degree to weaken the attachment of the colonies to the government of Great Britain. Emphatically it may be said, that the appointments of men of worthless character and of very humble talents to the first offices in the government of the colonies, ruined the cause of the mother country, and contributed chiefly to the separation. Men of high talents and dignified character, could not brook to be ruled by such men as were sent over to govern in the name of the parent country. They felt their superiority, and the neglect of their talents. Hence the eminent men generally took part in the revolution, when the rashness of the ministry drove things to extremity between the two countries.

On the formation of the state constitutions, immediately after the revolution, care was taken by most of the states to secure the independence of the Judges of the superior courts of law and equity, on the firm grounds of holding their commissions during good behaviour, with fixed and immutable salaries. The provisions of the constitution of South Carolina on this subject, are in the following words:

"The judicial power shall be vested in such superior and inferior courts of law and equity, as the legislature shall from time to time direct and establish. The Judges of each shall hold their commissions during good behaviour; and the Judges of the superior courts shall, at stated times, receive a compensation for their services, which shall neither be increased or diminished during their continuance in office. But they shall receive no fees or perquisites of office, nor hold any other office of profit or trust, under this state, the United States, or any other power."

[17] See Ashby & Co. v. White, Lord Raymond's Reports; Salkeld, p. 19; 16 Viner, p. 194; and 1st Bro. Pl. 45, 5th vol.; Burnet's History, p. 724, 811.

To guard against the evasion of these salutary regulations, the Judges are removable under any charges of misbehaviour, only by impeachment. And by another article it is declared, "that the house of representatives shall have the sole power of impeaching; but no impeachment shall be made unless with the concurrence of two-thirds of the house of representatives."—"All impeachments shall be tried by the senate. When sitting for that purpose, the senators shall be on oath or affirmation: and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present." By another article, a majority of each house is necessary to form a quorum.

The provisions of the constitution of the United States on this subject are similar to those of the constitution of the state of South Carolina, and nearly in the same words:

"The Judges, both of inferior and superior courts hold their commissions during good behaviour, with salaries which cannot be diminished during their continuance in office. They are removeable only by impeachment. The house of representatives has the sole power of impeachment. The senate has the sole power to try impeachments, sitting under the sanction of an oath: and two-thirds of the members present must concur in a conviction."

It seemed to be necessary to state distinctly the ground on which the judiciary of this country is placed, as great misconceptions have prevailed in some parts of Europe on this subject. The learned editors of a very interesting English periodical work, have asserted, that the Judges in America are not independent of the executive power. The passage is long, but it deserves quotation. After noticing the account, apparently with disapprobation, of lawyers making speeches of three days long, and being patiently heard by the Judges, the writer proceeds: "The pure administration of the laws is the true safeguard of the liberty of person, and security of property: the best criterion of a good government is justice flowing in an even, pure, and uncorrupt current; and the surest way of securing so invaluable a blessing to the community, is to make those to whom the administration of the laws is confided, independent of the executive power. The Judges in America are not thus independent. Being elected by the president and senate, and receiving only an uncertain 'compensation at stated periods for their services,' instead of adequate and permanent salaries, as contended for by Mr. Hamilton, they become in fact the creatures of the president and senate; and the test of their 'good behaviour,' is their acting in all political matters conformably with the views of the government. Their non-compliance would infallibly forfeit their seats. In the ordinary course of judicial proceedings such men will not always act with impartiality—in many cases they cannot. A Judge may be a candidate for the office of president, governor of a state, or member of congress, and may be an elector of any, or all of them, while he holds his seat. Disappointed in his object, and continuing on the bench, with what confidence can those who have opposed him submit their cause to his decision?"

In another passage from the same review, it is said, that "occasional obliquities in the administration of the law, may perhaps be accounted for by the circumstance, that even the office of Judge in the supreme and district courts, is conferred upon persons who have not gone through any previous discipline or practice to qualify themselves for discharging it."

It would appear, that the simple statement of the provisions of the constitution, would be a sufficient answer to most of these allegations. But it seems that the English writer understands, that a compensation at certain periods for the services of the Judges, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office, means an uncertain provision, dependant on the pleasure of the president and senate; and that the test of their good behaviour, during which they are to hold their commissions, would be a conformity in political matters with the views of the government: otherwise the Judges would infallibly forfeit their seats. In America, the constitution is understood to mean that the Judges shall have fixed salaries provided by law, and immutable during their continuance in office: and that their commissions are secure against all attack whilst they perform their duties faithfully, and avoid the commission of any flagrant acts which would impeach their integrity. The practice has corresponded with this understanding. As soon as the courts of the United States were organized, salaries were fixed by law, which have remained unchanged under every change of political power. And several questions have occurred in which the Judges have felt themselves bound to decide contrary to the known wishes of the government. Upon the great change which took place in the year 1801, when power changed hands, the party which got possession of the government, found all the courts filled with Judges who had been appointed by their opponents. But it never entered into the head of any man that the salaries of the Judges could be diminished, or that their commissions, held under the constitution during good behaviour, could be taken away, whilst the courts themselves subsisted.

The Judges of this country have been called upon to exercise a power, which is a severer test of independence than any to which the English Judges are exposed. The constitution is the supreme law of the nation, and no act of congress opposed to, or inconsistent with it, can have any binding effect. In some cases the Judges have been obliged to pronounce that particular acts of congress were inconsistent with the constitution, and therefore void. No attempt has been made to shake their independence for the performance of these high acts of duty: nor could such an attempt succeed if made.

With respect to the possibility of a Judge's being a candidate for the presidency, or a governorship, and the want of confidence in his judicial character, which it is alleged might follow, it is not perceivable how a remedy can be applied, unless Judges were prohibited from being candidates for any other office—a regulation certainly unknown to the British constitution. But the evil apprehended has not been felt. Few Judges would ever be disposed, at an advanced period of life, to leave the grave and quiet duties of a permanent office, to which they were regularly bred, for the stormy controversies of political life. Few instances have yet occurred, of Judges in office having been candidates for the office of the presidency, or the government of a state. And if there had been, there would be no more reason to distrust their impartiality, whilst they remain in office, than there is in England to doubt the equity of the lord chancellor, who is appointed by the existing minister, and generally goes out of office with him, or is turned out by him if not sufficiently pliant—The eminent lord chancellor Camden was turned out by the duke of Grafton. Yet it is not understood that there has ever been any reasonable ground of complaint against the justice of the lord chancellor by any member of the opposition, who chanced to have causes depending in his court. If there be any difference between the two countries on this point, it is, that the lord chancellor in England, who exercises the highest judicial power in the kingdom except the house of lords, is not independent, but holds his commission during the pleasure of the crown: whilst all the states in America, which have chancellors, grant them commissions during good behaviour, with fixed salaries.

As to the charge that the Judges are appointed without any previous legal education or discipline to qualify them for office, there is not the smallest foundation for it—Not a single Judge has ever been appointed under the authority of the United States, who had not been regularly bred to the bar, and who had not considerable experience as a practitioner. Most of them have been men so highly gifted with eminent talents, matured by great experience, and chastened by high moral qualities, that they would bear a comparison with the greatest men who have adorned the courts of justice in England. The same careful selection of experienced lawyers has in general marked the appointment of the Judges of the superior courts in the several states.

A sneer has been thrown out at the patient hearing given by the Judges in America to the long speeches of the lawyers. It was not to have been expected that Englishmen, who justly boast of the patient investigation of truth in their courts of justice, would have brought this as a charge against the Judges of this country. In their own legal history it appears, that the trial on Mr. Hampden's resisting the payment of a tax of twenty shillings lasted twelve days. And in more modern times, the case of Fox and Mackreth, on a question of private right, turning on a single point, occupied nearly twenty days, before the master of the rolls, the lord chancellor Thurlow, and the house of lords.[18]

The famous Dr. Johnson, whose opinion on such questions amounts to authority, was of a very different opinion from this writer on the point of the patient hearing of counsel. Upon some persons saying he paid no attention to the arguments of counsel at the bar, because they were paid for speaking, Johnson said, "Nay, you cannot help paying regard to their arguments if they are good—If it were testimony you might disregard it, if you knew it were purchased."

It should be remembered that the Romans never limited the pleading in the time of the republic, till it was tottering to its fall. Pompey began the practice, and the restriction was firmly established when the imperial power trampled on the ruins of liberty.[19] Of this restriction Pliny complains with proper indignation. He says, the custom of allowing two water-glasses, (i. e., two hour-glasses,) or only one, and sometimes half a one, prevailed, because the advocates grew tired before the business was explained, and the Judges were ready to decide before they understood the question. Pliny asks with indignation, are we wiser than our ancestors? are the laws more just at present? our ancestors allowed many hours, many days, and many adjournments in every cause: and for my part, when I sit in judgment, I allow as much time as the advocate requires—for would it not be rashness to guess what space of time is necessary in a cause which has not been opened! But some unnecessary things may be said: and is it not better that what is unnecessary should be spoken, than that which is necessary should be omitted? and who can tell what is necessary till he has heard? Patience in a Judge ought to be considered as one of the chief branches of his duty, as it certainly is of justice.[20]

That virtuous and great man sir William Jones, in his first charge to the grand jury at Calcutta, told them, "that he aspired to no popularity, and sought no praise, but that which might be given to a strict and conscientious discharge of duty, without predilection or prejudice of any kind, and with a fixed determination to pronounce on all occasions what he conceived to be the law, than which no man should suppose himself wiser." His conduct on the bench was strictly conformable to his professions—"On the bench he was patient, laborious and discriminating." [21]

Lord Hardwicke, who adorned the chancery bench upwards of twenty years, was remarkable for his patience; and he granted a rehearing of a cause, reversed his own decree, and said he rejoiced at an opportunity to rectify his error.[22]

Lord chancellor Eldon, after giving his opinion on a case before him of some difficulty, offered to hear it reargued, if the parties were dissatisfied with his opinion.[23] And it is noticed in the reports of P. Williams, (3d vol. p. 32,) that a case had been argued four times.

That eminent man, our own Chief Justice Marshall, said, (in the case of Little v. Barreme, 2d Cranch, p. 179,) that the first impression of his mind was, that though the instructions of the executive could not give a right, they might excuse from damages: "But I have been convinced that I was mistaken, and I have receded from this first opinion—I acquiesce in that of my brethren."

The advantages of a pure and regular administration of justice are well stated by the English writer; and by this test the United States would willingly be tried. It may be asserted with confidence, that the administration of the laws is impartial and enlightened. The business of the courts is conducted with regularity, and generally dispatched with as much speed as is consistent with an attention to those forms which are the outworks and the safeguards of liberty. And it is prodigiously less expensive than in England. An independent judiciary dispenses justice, without fear or favour: and can neither be terrified by power, nor seduced by affection, from the strait path of duty. This great [18] See the case stated by Mr. Hargreave, in his juridical collection, and reported in 2d vol. Brown.

[19] Dialogue concerning Oratory, by Tacitus, § 38.—Pliny's Letters, 5th book, epistle 2d.

[20] Pliny's Letters, 6th book, epistle 2d.

[21] See lord Teignmouth's Life of Sir William Jones, p. 402, 403.

[22] See 2d vol. Atkens, p. 25.

[23] See 11th vol. Vezey, p. 395.

blessing is felt and appreciated by the citizens who have entire confidence in the integrity of their magistrates. These assertions are made after long experience, and a thorough knowledge of the subject; and there are certain criteria which may be considered very conclusive on the subject. The citizens of this country are certainly not of a temper to submit tamely, to oppression or injustice. Political parties also exist in every state, ever vigilant and ready to complain, where just and sometimes even imaginery causes exist; yet no serious complaints have been made of the want of purity or impartiality in the administration of justice. And it is not known that a single Judge of the courts of the United States, or of the individual states has been impeached, on the ground of corruption or partiality, since the revolution. If occasional instances of error and human infirmity are attributable to individual Judges, we have seen nothing in the administration of justice, of that barbarous and detestable temper which is ascribed by Doctor Johnson, to the English Judge who tried the unfortunate Savage. Nor can we produce any parallel to the three modern English Judges described by the learned Dr. Parr, in the following diatribe:—"With learning, taste and genius, which adorned the head, but improved not the heart, one of them was a sober, subtle, inexorable interpreter and enforcer of sanguinary statutes: with a ready penetration, keen discernment, barren fancy, vulgar manners, and infuriate passions, another indulged himself in the gibberish of a canting fanatic, and the ravings of an angry scold, before trembling criminals. With sagacity enough to make the worse appear the better cause, to superficial hearers, and with hardihood enough not to profess much concern for the bodies of men, or their souls, the third carried about him an air, sometimes of wanton dispatch, and sometimes of savage exultation, when he immolated hecatombs at the altar of public justice."

Next in consequence to the great business of securing an independent judiciary, is that of obtaining correct reports of the decisions of the courts of justice. It has the double value of fixing in an imperishable form the principles which govern the decisions of the courts, and of securing a reasonable degree of certainty and uniformity in the construction and administration of the laws. Reports of the cases decided by the courts have been made and published in all countries which could boast of public liberty; and where settled rules, not arbitrary caprice, govern the judgments of the courts.—Arbitrary princes have ever been jealous of such reports.—Whilst the Judges in England were dependant on the crown for their continuance in office, and for their salaries, their decisions, and their very language, were vigilantly watched. In one memorable instance, the reports of that great Judge, lord Chief Justice Coke, were examined, and censured and corrected by the lord chancellor Ellesmere, assisted by the attorney general sir Francis Bacon, acting under the express orders of king James I. The Chief Justice was required to attend the lord chancellor, and the attorney general, and others of the king's learned counsel, to answer for particular passages in his reports, wherein he was charged with having inserted novelties, and errors, and offensive conceits of his own, to the prejudice of the king's crown, his prerogative, his parliament, and his subjects—And he was required to answer to the charges, and to make a retraction of his errors. The Judge gave distinct answers to the instances particularly selected for animadversion, and endeavoured to explain and justify them. But so much offence was taken at the freedom of his reports, and his manly defence, that this was one of the causes of his disgrace. He was speedily dismissed from his office of Chief Justice, which was then held at the pleasure of the crown.[24]

There was no charge of corruption or misconduct of any kind on the part of the Chief Justice, whose great offence was, that he was not pliable enough to the views of the government, carried himself with too lofty an independence, and ventured to trench on the prerogatives of the king, when they bore hard on the liberty of the subject. These were the real grounds of his removal from office; and it speaks volumes for the establishment of the judiciary on the immoveable ground of independence, which will enable the Judges to resist oppression, from [24] The whole transaction is so curious that it will repay the trouble of perusing the papers relating to it. They are to be found in the letters of lord Bacon, then attorney general, 6th vol. octavo edition, p. 121 to 133.—Also a paper in same volume, page 397 to 409.

whatever source it may arise, and to maintain firmly the cause of the country and the liberties of the citizen. Indeed, the conclusion from what we have seen, is irresistible: that the firm establishment of a judiciary truly independent, learned, wise and virtuous, is of infinite importance to society, under every form of government,—and that no government can be properly called a free one, and no people can long maintain their liberties, without a judiciary, independent, in the highest and best sense.

In a country where the citizens acknowledge no master but the laws, it is becoming that they should be well informed what the laws are. These are to be found, in the first place, in the statutes enacted by the legal representatives, duly elected. But as no legislator, however learned or sagacious, ever did, or can provide by statute for the infinite variety of cases perpetually growing out of the complex and ever varying relations and transactions of men, a much greater body of law is formed by the decisions of courts of justice, pronounced upon causes requiring some exposition or construction of the statutes when these are not sufficiently explicit, or founded on the great and immutable principles of justice, where the statutes are silent.[25] These decisions become binding precedents in the courts. Hence the necessity of the publication of the reports of cases decided by the courts, to enable the people to know what the law is, under this great branch of the legal system. And this knowledge is equally important to the Judges themselves: otherwise on any change, the new Judges might make constructions, and give decisions opposite to those of their predecessors: and the greatest uncertainty would prevail in the administration of justice, and in the knowledge of those rules which are to guide men in their contracts, as well as in the relations of life which are independent of contracts.

It is on this ground that the great lord chancellor Hardwicke and other eminent Judges have laid so much stress on the maxim "stare decisis," that the law may be known.[26]

The importance attached to uniformity of decision, and an adherence to precedents, is not the opinion of mere lawyers. Sir William Jones, who was not only a great law sage, but one of the most enlightened of men, and who took the largest views of human systems from the Thames to the Ganges, has recommended it in the strongest terms. In his beautiful essay on bailment he says, that "In practice, the law certainly employs two of the mental faculties,—reason, in the investigation of points entirely new, and memory, in transmitting the reason of sage and learned men, to which our own ought invariably to yield, if not from becoming modesty, at least from a just attention to that object for which all laws are formed, and all societies instituted, the good of mankind."—And the deep reflecting mind of Dr. Johnson took the same view of the subject. He said, "the advantage which humanity derived from law, is this, that the law gives every man a rule of action, and prescribes a mode of conduct which shall entitle him to the support and protection of society. That the law may be a rule of action it must be known—it is necessary that it be permanent and stable: this law is the measure of civil right, but if the measure be changeable, the extent of the thing measured never can be settled."—"To leave a law to be modified at discretion, is to leave the community without rule—It is to withdraw the protection of that public wisdom, by which the deficiencies of private understanding are to be supplied—It is to suffer the rash and the ignorant to act at discretion, and then to depend for the legality of that action on the sentence of the Judge."[27]

Nothing certainly can contribute so much to the desired stability and uniform-

[25] These judicial decisions, reviewed and confirmed by a succession of Judges, not only form the greater part of the rules, regulating property, and governing the acts and contracts of men, in every country,—but they have made the greatest improvements in the legal polity of every country. The unshackling real estates, from the perpetual and mischievous operation of entails, and the total abolition of torture in criminal prosecutions, in the reign of James I. (at its close), were brought about by judicial decisions alone, without statute; at a time when the legislature would not interfere to remedy those evils.

[26] Lord Bacon's maxim, "that not the decision, but the reason of it, should be regarded," does not oppugn this great maxim of stability—For this is only saying of the decisions of the courts, what is said by the soundest interpreters of statute law, that not the letter, but the meaning and intent shall prevail.

[27] See 2d vol. Johnson's Life by Boswell, p. 195.

ity of decisions by the courts, as the regular publication of the judgments rendered by the Judges. It is said that lord chancellor Hardwicke expressed a wish that the arguments used in decrees and judgments were published every year, and signed by the several Judges who pronounced them.

The legislature of this state seems to have been sensible of the wisdom of this course, for it has by statute required that the Judges sitting in the courts of appeal, should give their judgments and decrees in writing, and should sign the same; thereby forming a perpetual record of the judgment and of the grounds thereof. And in order to diffuse the knowledge of these judgments and decrees, the legislature has formerly encouraged and patronized the publication of the reports of cases decided in the courts of law of this state, and has recently encouraged with liberality the publication of the decrees of the courts of equity. Under the influence of this liberal patronage, the following reports have been prepared for the press, and it is proper that some statement should be given of the materials on which they are grounded.

The decrees of the court of equity, from the establishment of the court in 1784 to the month of December 1808, when a new and very important change took place in the constitution and arrangement of the court, have been preserved with care; and they furnish sufficient materials to enable a reporter to give correct statements of the points decided.—It were desirable that more could be done. But in general the bills and answers, and documents in the causes, have been so scattered, that it would be difficult if not impossible to collect them and make out full statements of the cases. The members of the bar who were concerned in those cases, have so generally retired from practice, and so many of them are dead, that it would be nearly impossible to obtain any correct statements of the arguments of the counsel. What could be done has been attempted; and applications have been made to such gentlemen as were within the reach of the reporter to obtain briefs of the arguments. Where they have been obtained they are made use of; but very little assistance has been derived from that source. With respect to the second volume, containing the decrees from December 1808, to the present time, the materials were more within the reach and control of the reporter. The Judges who decided them are all living, with the exception of the late chancellor, Mr. Hugh Rutledge; and application has been regularly made to them to furnish or indicate such decrees as they had severally pronounced on their respective circuits, and which they considered worthy of publication on account of the importance of the principles involved in them, or of the difficulty arising from the circumstances of the cases. All such as were furnished by the Judges from their notes, and many others not furnished by them, but collected from the records, have been inserted. Recourse has also been had to the commissioners and registers of the several courts for the records and documents in the cases decided in their respective courts; and the best use has been made of the papers furnished which was in the power of the reporter.

With respect to the decrees of the court of appeals the task was easier. The decrees were all within reach, and they have been used accordingly.—They are of two descriptions. Where the court is entirely satisfied with a decree, and the reasons given for it, it is the practice of the court to affirm the decree simply. In such cases the decree of the circuit court is given at length, to enable the reader to take a view of the whole case as affirmed. Where the court of appeals is satisfied with the decree below, but not with the reasons given; or where the court is dissatisfied with the decree and the reasons, that court gives its decision fully, with the reasons for it. And wherever the court is divided in opinion, the Judges severally deliver their opinions as they have formed them.—In all these cases full use has been made of the records of the court.

As no intention existed till lately to publish reports of the cases decided in equity, no very exact care was taken of the notes of the arguments of the counsel. And very little assistance has been furnished by the members of the bar, on application made to them for their notes. So that the public and the profession will not have the benefit, to any great extent, of the arguments of the learned counsel engaged in the several causes.

No reports of cases decided in chancery having ever been published in this state, or perhaps in any of the United States, many brief notices of decided cases have been admitted into this work, which were not of very great importance in settling principles or doctrines: but as they were calculated to show the course of proceeding, and of transacting business in the court, and the nature of many of the causes brought before that tribunal, it was thought it might be useful to introduce them: more especially as the diffusion of the court, and its benefits, over the whole state, has not been of very long duration. Many such short cases, stating merely the point decided, occur in the earlier English reporters, and even down to the time of lord Hardwicke, since which it has been usual to give the statements of the cases, the arguments of the counsel, and the decrees of the court, at very great length; so that a volume of reports is filled up with comparatively few decisions. It is conceived, that it would have been improper, as well as impracticable, to have pursued this course, in a publication intended to comprize in a short compass all that has been done for many years past.

INTRODUCTION

In presenting to the public reports of cases decided in equity, the question naturally arises,—What is equity, and in what does it differ from strict law? This question has been frequently asked, and not always satisfactorily answered. It is not easy to define what equity is, but it may be described and illustrated, so as to be intelligible to every capacity. To equity, which is the refinement and perfection of law, may be ascribed in a higher degree what Hooker has sublimely said of law: "Her seat is the bosom of God; her voice the harmony of the world; all things in heaven and earth do her homage; the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempt from her power: angels and men, creatures of every condition, though each in different sort and manner, yet all with uniform consent, admiring her as the mother of their peace and joy."

"Equity," says an eminent English writer, "in its true and genuine meaning, is the soul and spirit of all law: positive law is construed, and rational law is made by it. In this, equity is synonimous to justice; in that, to the true sense and sound interpretation of the rule." [1] Another English writer says: "Equity is a judicial interpretation of the laws, which presupposing that the legislator intended what is just and right, pursues and effectuates such intention." [2]

Nor are these modern ideas. The ancients, so inferior to the moderns in experimental philosophy, and in many of the arts and sciences, had the finest conceptions where intellect alone was a sufficient guide. Their ideas of equity laid a solid foundation, on which modern jurisprudence has erected a beautiful superstructure of refined, but practical justice. Aristotle, whose great work on ethics and politics, chiefly sustains in modern times his mighty reputation, speaks thus of equity: "We proceed then to speak of equity, and to consider what relation it bears to justice. It is not precisely the same thing; nor yet is it different in kind; for it is a praise-worthy quality as well as justice, but is spoken of as something better than mere justice, and really is so; for it is the correction of strict, that is, of legal justice, which often needs to be modified by equity; because laws, being in their nature general, cannot decide rightly in the infinite variety of particular cases. The lawgiver is contented with making a rule which applies to the greater part of cases, well knowing that it will not include the whole; and the fault is neither in the law nor in the lawgiver, but in the nature of things. When an exception to the rule occurs, which the lawgiver did not foresee, this exception is admitted in equity, which thus supplies the defect of law, as the lawgiver would himself do were he present in court, and as he would have done by amending his law, had he been aware of the exception. Equity then is better than legal justice, being its amendment, and supplying that defect of laws which arises from their universality. It is therefore manifest that equity is a species of justice, and contrasted to another species, to which it is preferable." [3] We perceive in the preceding quotation, the principle of equity so clearly and fully developed and expressed by Aristotle, that the accumulated wisdom of twenty centuries has not added much to the explanation. Nor was this an impracticable chimera springing from the fertile mind of the great Stagirite: for we find that the Athenians, in whose schools Aristotle studied upwards of twenty years, entertained the notion of equity as supplemental to the written laws. Their Judges were sworn to administer relief according to the laws, where they were explicit; and in other cases to award the most equitable sentence.

At Rome the city prætor was entrusted with this delicate duty.—"The duties of the subject and the intentions of the government were proclaimed, and the civil jurisprudence was reformed, by the annual edicts of the supreme judge, the prætor of the city. As soon as he ascended his tribunal, he announced by the voice of a crier, the rules which he proposed to follow in the decision of doubtful cases, and the relief which his equity would afford from the precise rigor of ancient statutes."—"A principle of discretion more congenial to a monarchy was introduced into the republic. The art of respecting the name and eluding the efficacy of the laws was improved by successive prætors; subleties and fictions were invented to defeat the plainest meaning of the decemvirs, (in the laws of the twelve tables,) and where the end was salutary, the means were frequently absurd."—"A jurisdiction thus vague and arbitrary was exposed to the most dangerous abuse: the substance as well as the forms of justice were often sacrificed to the prejudices of virtue, the bias of laudable affection, and the grosser seductions of interest or resentment. But the errors or vices of each prætor expired with his annual office; such maxims alone as had been approved by reason and practice were copied by succeeding Judges; the rule of proceeding was defined by the solution of new cases, and the temptations of injustice were removed by the Cornelian law, which compelled the prætor of the year to adhere to the letter and spirit of his first proclamation. It was reserved for the curiosity and learning of Hadrian to accomplish the design which had been conceived by the genius of Cæsar; and the prætorship of Salvius Julian, an eminent lawyer, was immortalized by the composition of the perpetual edict. This well digested code was ratified by the emperor and senate; the long divorce of law and equity was at length reconciled; and instead of the twelve tables, the perpetual edict was fixed as the invariable standard of civil jurisprudence." [4]

[1] Sir William Blackstone's Commentaries, 3d vol. p. 429.

[2] Woodeson's Lectures, 1st vol. p. 192, 193.

[3] Gillies' Aristotle, Ethics, book 5, chap. 10.

The powers attributed to the Roman prætor evidently exceeded Aristotle's idea of equity; and amounted to a species of inferior and temporary legislation. The prætor pronounced beforehand, on his entrance into office, a code of his own, to govern him in his judgment of the cases which might come before him; and which expired with the term of his office. But the compilation of all the most approved doctrines and principles, promulgated by the prætors, into the perpetual edict, would leave the subject of equity precisely where it stood before: for as no human sagacity, guided by the longest experience, can foresee all the combinations of circumstances in human affairs and transactions, nor legislate for them with exactness, the necessity of leaving something to equitable construction and decision, seems to be invincible. The perpetual edict was supposed to have provided for every case which could arise, and to have left no room for equity. But we find new codes, the Theodosian, the Justinian, the Basilian, arising in after ages, providing for the insufficiency or supplying the defects of the perpetual edict, or wholly supplanting it. And Justinian, who employed the ablest lawyers in his courts to compile his code, considered the first attempt so imperfect, that he speedily suppressed it, and substituted another which was supposed to be more complete.

The moderns have generally approved and adopted Aristotle's idea of equity. Grotius, one of the most learned, and Puffendorff, one of the most exact, of modern jurists, have concurred in it.—Mr. Woodeston, in his Vinerian lectures, says, the thought "that 'equity is the correction of the law, wherein it is defective, by reason of its universality,' is very sagacious, and worthy of its great author, but is capable of more elucidation than he has stopped to give it. By universality then is meant, that the law deals in general expressions, at least so far general, as to include some cases within the words which are not within the reason or spirit of its coercion, and to omit other cases which required the like provisional institutions. For it is impossible that any premeditation should discover, or ever so voluminous a code should express, that endless series of complicated occurrences which may vary the moral fitness of applying positive ordinances. In these instances the law is defective, and leaves out something which it is the province of equity to supply. Equity therefore, regarding the intent, and not scrupulously fettered by the letter of the law, has to this end a two-fold operation, sometimes abridging the comprehensiveness of the text, and sometimes extending the words so as to include other cases within parity of reason." [5] [4] See the 8th volume of Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, p. 13, 14, 15, 16, &c.—Mr. Gibbon has condensed with much precision the doctrines of the Roman or civil law into a single chapter.

[5] 1st vol. Woodeson's Lectures, p. 193, 194.

Mr. Justice Blackstone agrees with this general idea of equity. He says: "the most general and effectual way of discovering the true meaning of a law, when the words are dubious, is by considering the reason and spirit of it; or the cause which moved the legislator to enact it. For when this reason ceases, the law itself ought to cease with it. From this mode of interpreting laws by the reason of them, arises what we call equity, which is defined by Grotius, (nearly in the words of Aristotle,) 'the correction of that wherein the law is deficient, by reason of its universality.' For since in laws all cases cannot be foreseen, or expressed, it is necessary that when the general decrees of the law come to be applied to particular cases, there should be somewhere a power vested, of defining those circumstances, which had they been foreseen by the legislator himself, would have been expressed. And these are the cases, which, according to Grotius, 'lex non exacte definit, sed arbitrio boni viri permittit.' Equity thus depending essentially upon the particular circumstances of each individual case, there can be no established rules and fixed precepts of equity laid down, without destroying its very essence, and thus reducing it to positive law."

It ought however to be noticed, that the English jurists have agreed, and surely with good reason, though against the opinion of Grotius, that the operation and effect of penal laws may not be extended by equitable construction. "By the tenderness of our criminal code an offender may evade the punishment due to his offence, if his case does not come within the letter of the law; and he would also escape if his case came within the letter, and not within the spirit. The rigor of penal laws may be mollified, but not enlarged by equitable construction." If it were otherwise, the enjoyment of life and liberty would be rendered precarious and insecure, dependant on the passions and prejudices of the magistrate, and the citizen exposed to continued and painful apprehensions.

Lord Bacon illustrates the expedience of strict adherence to the doctrine that penal sanctions are not to be enhanced by equity, by a striking case. "If the law be, that a man should lose his right hand for a certain offence, (as was the case by the statute of 33d Henry VIII. chap. 12,) and the offender hath had his right hand cut off before, (perhaps in war,) he shall not lose his left hand, but the crime shall rather pass unpunished, than the letter of the law be extended."

Whilst the English jurists have so completely adopted the opinion of their great predecessor, Aristotle, in the general notion of equity, there is great diversity of opinion, and a good deal of jealousy, as to the manner and extent, in which equity serves for correction of the law. Thus sir William Blackstone, as if afraid of the extent of the doctrine he had been laying down, immediately subjoins, "that on the other hand the liberty of considering all cases in an equitable light, must not be indulged too far, lest thereby we destroy all law, and leave the decision of every question entirely in the breast of the Judges; and law without equity, though hard and disagreeable, is much more desirable for the public good, than equity without law, which would make every judge a legislator, and introduce most infinite confusion, as there would then be almost as many different rules of action laid down in our courts, as there are differences of capacity and sentiment in the human mind." And the learned commentator takes great pains to explain the nature of equity, as understood and practised in the municipal courts of England; and to show that it is not an arbitrary, capricious system, depending on the crude notions of abstract equity, entertained by each succeeding Judge, but that it is as much an artificial system, founded on the principles of justice and positive law, as the common law. He insists that all the ideas of foreigners, such as Grotius and Puffendorff, on the subject of equity, as they relate to the English system, are founded in misapprehension, and tend only to mislead. And that even lord Kaims, and the English writers Coke, Selden, and lord Bacon, have not given correct views of the English system of equity. So too professor Woodeson, stating that sir John Trevor, a great Judge, after many years spent in his profession, as an advocate and a Judge, described equity as "qualifying, moderating and reforming the rigor, hardness, and edge of the law, as assisting it where it is weak and defective, and defending it from crafty evasions and new subleties against the justice of it," immediately guards against the too great latitude of this opinion, by adding, "we are not to suppose that all this is accomplished by the unrestrained arbitrament of the reigning Judges. The use of precedents, and their binding authority, were understood soon after the practice of these jurisdictions became so extensive, and equal reverence was paid to them in courts of equity as of law. To which may be added, that the great number and variety of suits which have been determined in equity within the last century, have rendered its rules of decision proportionably less vague, and discretionary. The wisdom of the maxim, 'stare decisis,' became obvious and striking, when the business of the court of chancery became so extensively increased. Else the utmost uncertainty and even contradiction might take place in the rules of property; and no reliance could be placed on the stability of titles."

Mr. Woodeson in another passage of his lectures states, that "the correction of law, by equity, is not by way of control, but of exposition. It does not oppugn, but promote the meaning of the law. For if the law, understood according to the unquestionable intention of the legislator, has descended to particulars, and has described the very matter under consideration, it is not in such case defective by reason of its universality, nor is there any room for the interposition of equity, or any warrant or authority for that kind of juridical redress. Perquam durum est, sed ita lex scripta est, was the expression of the famous Ulpian, in a case where the terms were sufficiently explicit to exclude that equitable construction which reason would otherwise have dictated." And we find among the Judges themselves of great name and authority, a considerable difference of opinion in their estimate of the value of equity as a correction of law. Lord Chief Justice de Grey was accustomed to say he never liked equity so well as when it was like law: whilst lord Chief Justice Mansfield frequently said, he never liked law so well as when it was like equity.[6]

The necessity of the existence of the equity powers to the perfection of the administration of justice, is admitted and vindicated in the famous code civil, which has been matured by the wisdom of some of the ablest men in France. In a report made by the enlightened Portalis, he states, "that the tribunals would not fulfil the object of their establishment, if under the pretext of the silence or obscurity, or insufficiency of the laws, they should refuse to give judgment. There were Judges before there were laws, and the laws cannot foresee all the cases which may be offered for adjudication. The administration would then be perpetually interrupted, if the Judge should refrain from judging, whenever the point in contest submitted to him had not been foreseen by the law. The office of the law is to provide for the cases which most generally arise. Accidents, fortuitous cases, and extraordinary cases, do not form the subject of a law. Amongst those things which deserve the solicitude of the legislature, it is impossible to fix every thing by precise rules. It is a wise foresight to discern that every thing cannot be foreseen. There are then necessarily a multitude of circumstances in which a Judge finds himself without law. It is therefore proper to leave to the Judge the power of supplying the law by the natural lights of reason and good sense. Nothing would be more puerile than to endeavour to take such precautions, that a Judge should never be without a precise text to apply to the cases which come before him. To prevent arbitrary judgments, society would be exposed to a thousand iniquitous judgments; and what would be worse, to be deprived of the power of having justice administered. With the foolish idea of legislating on each case, it would make legislation itself an immense labyrinth, in which reason and the memory would be equally lost. When the law is silent, nature speaks; and if the foresight of the legislator is limited, nature is infinite. She applies to every thing interesting to man. Why then should he despise the resources she offers him. In all ages it has been said, that equity is the supplement to the law; and it may be defined to be, a return to the law of nature, in the silence, obscurity or insufficiency of the positive law. It is this equity which is the true supplement of legislation, and without which the ministry of the Judge, in a great number of cases, would become impracticable. For it is rare that any contest arises about the application of a precise text. It is always because the law is obscure, or imperfect, or silent, that litigation arises. It is necessary then that the Judge should never pause. No question of property should ever remain undecided. The power of judging is not always governed in its exercise by formal precepts: it is by maxims, usages, examples and doctrines. Thus the virtuous chancellor D'Aguesseau said, very properly, that the temple of Justice is not less consecrated to the sciences than to the laws; and that the true doctrine which consisted in the knowledge of the spirit of laws, was superior to a knowledge of the laws themselves." The legislative body to which this report was addressed, adopted its reasoning, and enacted, in the language of the reporter, "That the Judge who should refuse to decide, under the pretence of the silence, obscurity, or imperfection of the laws, should be subject to prosecution, as guilty of a denial of justice." [7]

[6] In the case of Dursley and Fitzhanding, reported in 6th vol. Vesey.

The great chancellor lord Camden agrees substantially with this opinion of the French jurists, in the judgment which he rendered in the case of mutual wills. The case was as follows: A man and his wife, who was entitled to a separate estate, joined in a will expressed to be their mutual last will. By this will the residuary estate of both seems to have been made a common fund, and to have been so bequeathed as to go to the survivor for life, with a limitation over on the death of the survivor to certain relations. The husband died first: the wife then proved the will, acted as executrix, took possession of the husband's property, and enjoyed it equally with her own separate estate for many years. She afterwards died, leaving a will by which, disregarding the mutual will, she gave her own property to another relation, in exclusion of those entitled under the mutual will.

The case was considered so new and without precedent, that the counsel resorted in their arguments to the authors of foreign countries, where such wills are in use. Lord Camden said, "I am of opinion that this case must be decided by the laws of this country—The mutual will was made here, the testators were subjects of this kingdom, and the estate devised was lodged in our own funds: so that this disposition, notwithstanding the uncommon form of the testament, must be ruled by the law of this court. And I trust that the everlasting maxims of equity and conscience upon which the jurisdiction of this court is built, are capacious enough, not only to comprehend this, but every other case that may happen; and that the justice of this court is co-extensive with every possible variety of human transactions. He then proceeded to consider the case in two views—First, how far the mutual will shall operate as a binding engagement, independent of any confirmation by accepting a legacy under it: Secondly, whether the survivor can depart from this engagement, after she had accepted a benefit under it. He said that this court is never deceived by the form of instruments. The actions of men are here stripped of their legal cloathing, and appear in their first naked simplicity. Good faith and conscience are the rules by which every transaction is judged in this court; and there is not an instance to be found since the jurisdiction was established, where one man has ever been released from his engagement, after the other has performed his part. On these principles he decided in favour of the claimants under the mutual will, and made the devisee heir and executor under the wife's will, a trustee to perform the contract. He did not deny that the mutual will was, like other wills, a revocable act. He admitted that it might be revoked by joint consent clearly; and by one of the parties only, if he gave notice.[8]

There is a peculiarity in the English and American system of equity, which distinguishes it, at least in modern times, from the system of all other countries. It is that the branch of jurisprudence called equity is administered in a distinct tribunal from the law tribunals. Mr. justice Blackstone says this distinction is not at present known, and does not seem ever to have been known in any other country. And yet the difference of law from equity when administered by the same tribunal was perfectly familiar to the Romans; the jurisdiction of the prætor being very distinct from the leges or standing laws. But the power of both centered in the same magistrate, who was equally entrusted to pronounce the rule of law, and to apply it to particular cases by the principles of equity.

[7] See the 1st vol. of the Code Civil, p. 49, 4th section, octavo edition.—In the original it stands thus: "Le Juge qui refusera de Juger sous prétexte du silence, de l'obscurite, on de l'insuffisance de la loi, pourra etre poursuivi comme coupable de deni de Justice."

[8] See Lord Camden's argument stated in the 2d vol. of Hargreave's juridical arguments, p. 304–311.

Mr. Mitford, who has since presided with great ability as lord chancellor of Ireland, (under the title of lord Redesdale,) has briefly but powerfully touched this subject. He says, in his treatise on the pleadings in a suit in chancery, "that it is difficult to discover by what means the courts of justice in England, usually termed courts of equity, have obtained the jurisdiction they now exercise. Their authority, and the extent of it, have been subjects of much question; but time has given them full establishment; and the limits of their duty seem now to be in a great degree, though perhaps not completely, ascertained." [9] The exercise of this jurisdiction by courts distinct from those to which the ordinary administration of justice is entrusted, seems to be a peculiarity in the jurisprudence of this country. In the construction of every system of laws, the principles of natural justice have been first considered; and the great objects of municipal laws have been to enforce the observance of those principles, and to provide a positive rule where some rule has been deemed necessary or expedient, and natural justice has prescribed none. It has also been an object of municipal law to establish modes of administering justice. The wisdom of legislators in framing positive laws to answer all the purposes of justice, has ever been found unequal to the subject; and therefore, in all countries, those to whom the administration of the laws has been entrusted, have been compelled to have recourse to natural principles, to assist them in the interpretation and application of positive law, and to supply its defects; and this resort to natural principles has been termed judging according to equity. Hence a distinction has arisen in jurisprudence between positive law and equity. In prescribing forms of proceeding in courts of justice, human foresight has also been defective; and therefore it has been commonly submitted to the discretion of the courts themselves to vary or add to established forms, as occasion and the appearance of new cases have required. In England a policy somewhat different has prevailed. The courts established for the ordinary administration of justice have, as in other countries, recourse to principles of equity in the interpretation and application of the positive law. But they are bound to established forms of proceeding; and those usually stiled courts of common law, to which the ordinary administration of justice principally belongs, have been embarrassed by a rigid adherence to rules of decision, which though originally framed for wise purposes, have in their application been frequently incompatible with, or not equal to the principles of natural and universal justice: and the modes of proceeding in those courts, though admirably calculated for the ordinary purposes of justice, are not adapted to the full investigation of all the intricate and complicated subjects of litigation which are the result of the increase of commerce, of riches, and of luxury, and the consequent variety in the necessities, the ingenuity, and the craft of mankind. Early therefore in the history of our jurisprudence, the administration of justice by the ordinary courts, appears to have been incomplete. To supply the defect, the courts of equity have gained an establishment; assuming the power of enforcing the principles upon which the ordinary courts also decide when the powers of those courts, or their modes of proceeding, are insufficient for the purpose; of preventing those principles, when enforced by the ordinary courts, from becoming (contrary to the original purpose of their establishment) instruments of injustice; and of deciding on principles of universal justice where the interference of a court of judicature is necessary to prevent a wrong, and the positive law is silent.[10]

The courts of equity also administer to the ends of justice, by removing impediments to the fair decision of a question in other courts; by providing for the safety of property in dispute, pending a litigation; by restraining the assertion of doubtful rights in a manner productive of irreparable damage; by preventing injury to a third person from the doubtful title of others; and by putting a [9] The liberality with which of late years the courts of common law have noticed and adopted the principles of decision established in the courts of equity, though it may have been conducive to the great ends of justice, has tended to prevent the bounds between the two jurisdictions from being completely ascertained.

[10] Principles of decision thus adopted by the courts of equity, when fully established and made the grounds of successive decisions, are considered by those courts as rules to be observed with as much strictness as positive law.

bound to vexatious and oppressive litigation, and preventing unnecessary multiplicity of suits: and without pronouncing any judgment on the subject, by compelling a discovery which may enable other courts to give their judgment; and by preserving testimony when in danger of being lost before the matter to which it relates can be made the subject of judicial investigation." [11]

"This establishment has obtained throughout the whole system of our judicial polity: most of the inferior branches of that system having their peculiar courts of equity: and the court of chancery assuming a general jurisdiction in cases not within the bounds, or beyond the powers of other jurisdictions. The power thus exercised by the court of chancery is commonly termed the extraordinary jurisdiction of the court, to distinguish it from the several other jurisdictions attributed to the chancery as part of the general establishment for the administration of justice according to the course of the common law. The existence of this extraordinary jurisdiction, entirely distinct from the ordinary courts, though frequently considered as an enormity requiring redress, has perhaps produced a purity in the administration of justice, which could not have been effected by other means: and it is in truth a consequence of that jealous anxiety with which the principles and forms established by the common law have been preserved in the ordinary courts; as the bulwarks of freedom, and of the absolute necessity of preventing the strict adherence to those principles and forms, from becoming intolerable."

The opinion of that pre-eminent man Bacon, lord Verulam, is entitled to great weight in considering the question, which is to be preferred, the blended jurisdiction of law and equity, in the same tribunal, or the separation, in different tribunals. And his opinion was in favour of a separation of the jurisdictions. His words are, "apud nonullos receptum est ut jurisdictio quæ decernit secundum æquum et bonum, atque, illa altera, quæ procedit secundum jus strictum, iisdem curiis deputentur: apud alios autem ut diversis: omnino placet curiarum separatio. Neque enim servabitur distinctio casuum, si fiat commixtio jurisdictionum, sed arbitrium legem tandem trahet."

Lord Kaims, an eminent Scotch Judge, in the introduction to his principles of equity, notices this peculiarity of the English system, and examines the propriety of it. He professes the highest reverence for the judgment of Bacon, and he admits the weight of the argument that the mixture of the law and equity jurisdictions in the same tribunal would be apt to confound the distinction between cases of a legal and of an equitable nature; and thus arbitrary discretion be substituted in all cases for law. And he himself (lord Kaims) reinforces the argument by the following remarks: "In the science of jurisprudence, it is undoubtedly of great importance that the boundary between equity and common law be clearly ascertained, without which we shall vainly hope for just decisions. A Judge who is uncertain whether the case belongs to equity or to common law, cannot have a clear conception what judgment ought to be pronounced. But a court that judges of both, being relieved from determining this preliminary point, (whether the case belongs to the law or equity jurisdiction,) will be apt to lose sight altogether of the distinction between common law and equity."—Lord Kaims then proceeds to urge some reasons on the other side of the question, and in favour of the united jurisdiction, and concludes with giving a preference to that system: But with his accustomed modesty he suggests those reasons and his opinion with great diffidence, acknowledging that he felt the bias that naturally is produced by custom and established practice, as it was in his own country.

The English have not only scrupulously separated the jurisdictions of law and equity, but they have been remarkably jealous of any attempt in practice to blend them. Lord Mansfield, the Chief Justice of the court of king's bench, than whom a greater magistrate never presided in a court of justice, was reproached with a disposition to introduce the rules and principles of equity into his court of law; and the reproach brought much obloquy on him. It was said, that being "more [11] It is not a very easy task accurately to describe the jurisdiction of our courts of equity: those who have attempted it have generally failed: and the apparent necessity of making the attempt for the purpose of elucidating the subject, must be the apology for what is here offered.

versant in the Roman than in the English jurisprudence, he was guided more by general rules of equity than by principles of law. That he was apt to assume an unpardonable latitude in the construction of statutes, and to decide upon them, not as they are, but as he conceives they ought to be: he would submit the acts of the legislature to the discretion of a Judge." He was charged with "attempting to change the king's bench, a court of common law, into a court of equity; and that instead of those positive rules by which the judgment of a court of law should be invariably determined, he has introduced his own notions of equity and substantial justice."

In opposition to lord Mansfield's plan of administering justice in a court of common law according to the principles of equity, it was observed, that "written law establishes the rights both of prince and people. Its certainty, and the determinate and invariable discriminations with which it is replete, not only mark the boundaries between right and wrong, but preserves them inviolate, and diffuses general tranquillity by enabling us to judge with certainty, when we stand within the limits of security. However therefore we may admire the wisdom which established courts of equity to remedy those evils which the forms of common law could not reach; yet the utility of this precaution will not only be lost, when the modes of decision practised in the courts of equity are adopted in courts of law, but that this extension, to the general system of our jurisprudence, of those principles which were only admitted for the remedy of particular defects, will eventually, by violating the settled rules of justice, instead of removing partial exceptions, annihilate the grand distinction between law and despotism, and leave us exposed, if not to the oppression, at least to the insecurity of arbitrary dominion."

"The advantages to the subject (of transplanting equity principles of decision into the courts of law) have been even hitherto problematical, the future consequences are extremely to be dreaded. When the court of king's bench assumes legislation, the learned world may continue to witness and admire the wisdom and beauty of its decisions, but the palladium of the British constitution is removed, and liberty exists no longer."

That eminent Judge, lord Eldon, said, (in a case under consideration before him,) "he thought that the character of the law of England suffered more by the circumstance of the courts of law acting upon what they conceive to be the rules of equity, than by any other circumstance. He thought it impossible a court of law could exercise the equity jurisdiction at all." And that, "he was seriously apprehensive that courts of law, supposing they are administering the rules of this court, (chancery,) have totally misunderstood them." [12]

An able foreign writer, who has given an excellent account of the British constitution, has noticed this anomaly of a court of equity exercising distinct powers from the courts of law, and he appears to have understood the subject better than any other foreigner. De Lolme remarks, on the false notions of the office and powers of the English courts of equity entertained by many who suppose that the Judges are to pursue the rules of natural equity alone, following the dictates of their own private feelings, and grounding their decisions on the peculiar circumstances of the case before them. He judiciously observes, that certainly the power of the Judges in equity cannot be to alter by their own private judgment the written law, that is, acts of parliament, and thus to control the legislature. Their office, he insists, consists in producing remedies for those cases, for which the public good requires that remedies should be provided, and in regard to which the courts of law, shackled by their original forms and institutions, cannot procure any. He also remarks with judgment on the causes which have prevented the courts of law and equity from encroaching on each other, and thus dangerously uniting in themselves the powers of Judges of equity and Judges of the common law. De Lolme's own conclusion as to the real character of the court of equity in England, is too curious to be omitted. "From all the above observations," he says, "it follows, that of the courts of equity, as established in England, the following definition may be given, which is, that they are a kind of experimental legislature, continually employed in finding out and providing law remedies for those new species of cases, for which neither the courts (of law) nor the legislature, have as yet found it convenient or practicable to establish any: in doing which they are to forbear to interfere with such cases as they find already provided for. A Judge of equity is also to adhere in his decisions to the system of decrees in his own court, of which regular records are kept for that purpose. From this latter circumstance it again follows that a Judge of equity, by the very exercise he makes of his power, is continually abridging the arbitrary part of it; as every new case he determines, every precedent he establishes becomes a land-mark or boundary, which both he and his successors in office are afterwards expected to regard." And he adds, that the appeals carried up to the house of lords, shews that the Judges in equity are subjected to certain positive rules, besides those of nature and conscience only: an appeal being naturally grounded on a supposition of some rules of that kind which were neglected or violated.

[12] See 6th vol. Vesey, p. 12 to 41.

It is proper however to remark, that De Lolme's idea of the court of equity being a kind of experimental legislature, is fanciful, and not founded in fact. In the famous case of Chesterfield v. Janssen, reported in 1st volume of Atkins, lord chancellor Hardwicke expressly says, "whatever may be called legislative authority in this court, I utterly disclaim. But so far as the court has already gone in cases; so far as lord Nottingham, lord Cowper, lord King and lord Talbot have gone in the cases before them, I think myself under an indispensable obligation of following."

An additional reason of great importance, for the separation of the equity from the law jurisdiction, in England and America, is founded on their peculiar institution of trial by jury. As juries are essentially a component part of the law tribunals, it would be dangerous to allow the exercise of equity powers to those tribunals. Juries are apt enough already to feel themselves exempt from the authority of fixed rules of law, and to adjudicate in all cases according to their own crude undisciplined notions of mere natural equity. And the salutary check of the court, over the verdicts of juries, would be in a great measure, if not wholly, lost, if they were sanctioned in considering themselves endued with equity powers.

Nor could the narrow forms of the pleadings in the courts of law, which necessarily bring the question in controversy to a single and precise point, admit of that latitude which would embrace the great variety and extent of matter which is generally included in the proceedings in equity. And a simple judgment rendered in the forms of law could not provide for that variety of points, which are amply regulated and settled by a plenary decree in equity. Those who are in favour of blending the law and equity jurisdictions, would soon feel in practice the imperfections and incapacity of the legal forms, to reach all the cases of equitable cognizance; and would be obliged to alter the forms of law proceedings, and enlarge them according to the equity model. This would speedily supercede all the legal forms, and every thing would soon become of equitable cognizance, and be decided by equity principles alone, and positive law would be overwhelmed and lost.

In all those countries where the jurisdictions of law and equity are united, there exists no trial by jury: and the forms of proceeding are altogether upon the civil law plan, which is adopted and followed in the court of equity. So that the example of those nations does not seem fit to be followed by those who reverence and desire to preserve the trial by jury in mixed questions of law and fact. The trial by jury, and the pleadings according to the civil law forms, seem to be incompatible with each other. If it be alledged that the jurisdiction both of law and equity cases may be given to the same Judges, with power to hold the courts separately, and to follow in each the forms peculiar to each, that would in effect be giving up the question—for that would admit the propriety of separating the jurisdictions themselves, though entrusted to the same hands. Nor would it be easy to find men competent to sit and to decide correctly, as Judges in equity to-day, and as Judges at law to-morrow; and carefully to separate in their minds, and in their practice, the proper objects of the jurisdiction of each. The danger would be, that gradually every thing would slide into the equity jurisdiction, to the utter subversion of mere law. The experience in the courts of the United States is quite insufficient to enable us to pronounce that this danger is imaginary. Besides, the business of the law courts already fills up all the time, and employs all the learning and talents of the Judges at law. The superaddition of the duties of the courts of equity would leave no time for the persevering course of study necessary for the enlightened discharge of their duties. It is only in the tribunal of the last resort, the highest court of appeals in civil cases, without any original jurisdiction, that it would be proper to blend the law and equity powers, in order by its supreme controlling power to keep the decisions of all the courts uniform and consistent.

There is a reason of a higher order in favour of the separation of the jurisdictions of law and equity, founded on the nature of free governments. It is a part of the wise jealousy of republics to divide power into many branches, so that too much power should not be accumulated in the same hands. As a result of this principle, the legal and equitable powers should be placed in different hands —and perhaps the criminal jurisdiction ought to be separated from the civil. The union of all three in the same persons would be hazardous in the extreme. It has produced great mischiefs and oppression where it has been tried. Aristotle informs us, that the constitution of the judiciary power, in the Carthaginian government, was highly oligarchical; the whole of that power being vested in one court, which tried all kinds of causes, and decided all of them without appeal.[13] And the Roman historian Livy observed, long after Aristotle's time, "judicum ordo Carthagine ea tempestate dominabatur; eo maxime quod iidem perpetui judices erant. Res, fama, vitaque omnium, in illorum potestate erat. Qui unum ejus ordinis, idem omnes adversos habet."[14]

The Greeks and Romans, jealous of the accumulation of power in the same hands, divided the jurisdiction of the courts, and placed the cognizance of some causes in one tribunal, and others in other tribunals.

The chief magistrates of Athens were nine in number, and were called archontes, or rulers.[15] To each of them was assigned a particular portion of jurisdiction and duty. The chief of the nine archons had jurisdiction in many cases of an ecclesiastical as well as civil nature. He also determined all causes between men and their wives; concerning wills and testaments, dowries and legacies, and some other subjects.—The other archons had other subjects appropriated to them.[16] When Solon new modelled the Athenian republic, he respected and preserved the venerable tribunal of the areopagus, and the election of the archons; but he invented and established the popular constitution of the judiciary power. Pericles abridged the power of the areopagus, and by debasing the composition, he increased the tyranny of the Athenian tribunals. The people, once masters of the courts of justice, and consequently of the lives and fortunes of all ranks of men, soon drained and exhausted every source of authority in the state, not flowing from themselves.[17] And exercising the judicial powers themselves, the most monstrous tyranny and injustice followed. Socrates and others, the wisest and best men of the republic, were condemned by the tumultuous assemblies of several hundred Judges.

The Romans also divided the jurisdiction over various branches of causes, among different bodies of Judges: but they committed the error of composing their courts of too great a number of persons. In such multitudes it could not be expected that many individuals could be learned in the laws, or enlightened in the application of them. The great advantage of deliberation and mutual interchange of ideas, could not exist among such numbers; and all responsibility was lost; for the Judges voted in such a manner that the public neither knew the opinions of the individual Judges, or the reasons of these opinions.

The modern have a great superiority in this respect over the ancient systems. The courts are composed generally of a few Judges, with a divided jurisdiction. These are, or ought to be, selected, at least for the superior courts, for their [13] Aristotle's Politics, book ii. p. 116, 117.

[14] Livy, lib. 33, chap. 46.

[15] Potter's Greek Antiquities, 1st vol.

[16] Potter's Greek Antiquities, 1st vol. p. 76, 77.

[17] Aristotle's Politics, 2d vol. book ii. p. 120.

learning, experience and probity. And possessing high character, with great responsibility, they hear patiently, deliberate maturely, and decide impartially, giving their reasons publicly. These are essential and inestimable advantages in the administration of justice.

It is not intended to go into a full statement of the peculiar objects of the equity jurisdiction, as established in England and in the United States of America. The subject is treated luminously by sir John Mitford, in his treatise of equity pleadings, enlarged subsequently by Mr. Cooper, and by some of the elementary writers. The jurisdiction grew to its present extent by degrees, according to the exigencies of the times, and the changes of circumstances and manners. Nor was its growth permitted to take place without some struggles on the part of the courts of law; particularly on the subject of injunctions, granted by the courts of chancery to interfere with judgments at law. As early as the time of sir Thomas More, doubts were entertained of the propriety of these injunctions;[18] and the subject produced open hostility between the courts in the time of lord chancellor Ellesmere, in the reign of James I. As this was the last struggle to restrain the court of chancery in the exercise of this, or indeed any other branch of its jurisdiction, it may be worth while to state the case more fully:—It will show more forcibly the necessity of the equity jurisdiction, in a separate court.

One Glanvill sold to a young man named Courtney a jewel, which he pretended to be of the value of three hundred and sixty pounds, (whereas it was in truth worth but twenty,) and three other jewels of the value of a hundred pounds: and for his security he took a bond of six hundred pounds, in the name of one Hampton; and procured an action to be brought in Hampton's name, and the action to be confessed, in the vacation. Glanvill paid all the costs of both parties. Afterwards Courtney finding the deceit, exhibited his bill in chancery for relief; and also brought a writ of error to reverse the judgment, but the judgment was affirmed. Upon the hearing in chancery it was decreed, that Glanvill should take back his jewel and an hundred pounds, and that he should procure the said Hampton to release and acknowledge satisfaction of the judgment. Glanvill not complying with the decree, was imprisoned by the court of chancery. He then applied to the court of law, by a habeas corpus, to be discharged. Lord Coke, the Chief Justice, said that this decree in chancery and imprisonment, being after a judgment at the common law, was unlawful: and that this court ought to relieve him. And he cited for proof a judgment in the 5th of Edward IV. between Cobb and Moore, when Cobb procured an action of debt to be brought against Moore, and the action to be confessed by attorney; and a writ of error to be brought thereon, and the judgment to be affirmed: all this was done in the absence of Moore, who being beyond sea, upon his return exhibited his bill in chancery to be relieved concerning this practice, there being no debt due. And it was resolved, that after a judgment at common law he could not be relieved, but was enforced to exhibit his bill in parliament, and there was a special act made for his relief. Lord Coke also cited another case of a judgment at law, in 39th of Elizabeth, between Finch and Throgmorton, to the same point. In that case all the Judges were assembled, and the matter debated before them; and it was resolved by them all, that although the said bill contained much matter of equity, and there was very good cause the complainant should have been relieved, if he had complained before the judgment obtained at the common law, yet now, having suffered a judgment at the common law, he comes too late to be relieved in a court of equity; and cannot now examine any pretence of equity, after a judgment at the common law. Wherefore lord Coke and all the court held, in Glanvill's and Courtney's case, that Glanvill ought to be bailed; and they let him go on bail till the next term, and he was then discharged.[19] [18] Sir Thomas More being lord chancellor, was informed that the Judges had expressed their disapprobation of the injunctions he had granted. He caused a docket to be made of every injunction, and the reasons of it, which he had granted: and inviting all the Judges to dine with him, he introduced the subject after dinner: when upon full discussion of every one of them, the Judges confessed that he could not have acted otherwise than he had done.—Roper's Life of Sir T. More, p. 58.

[19] The case of Glanvill and Courtney is reported in Moor, p. 838. 1st Roll. iii. and Cro. Jac. p. 343.

This decision of lord Coke and his court being questioned, the subject was brought before the king in council, in the year 1616, and the matter debated; and upon the opinions and certificate of the king's council, judgment was finally given in favour of the chancery jurisdiction, in cases of injunction after judgments at law. And the lord chancellor was commanded in future not to desist to give to the subject, on complaint thereafter to be made, such relief in equity, (notwithstanding any proceedings of the common law against them,) as shall stand with the justice or merit of their cause, and with the former ancient and continued practise and presidency of the court of chancery. And this judgment was ordered to be enrolled in the chancery, there to remain on record, for the better extinguishing of the like differences and questions that may arise in future times. All which proceedings were enrolled in chancery.

Lord Coke is said by sir William Blackstone to have been clearly in the wrong, and to have submitted, with dignity. He never questioned that judgment, though he lived many years afterwards, and was in four parliaments, where he had both opportunity and power to have done it, if he had not known that judgment to have been given according to justice, and the laws of the realm: but he desisted, and openly professed before the privy council that he would not maintain a difference between the two courts, nor bring it into question,—whereof entry was made in the council book.[20]

Since that time the subject has been considered to be settled, and no controversy has arisen as to this branch of equity jurisdiction. And surely it was highly proper that this jurisdiction should exist somewhere. The case of Glanvill and Courtney, upon which the question arose and the point of jurisdiction was settled, shews the importance and even necessity of it. A great fraud had been committed, and so dexterously managed and fenced in by a judgment at law, that the court of law could not or would not give relief. If the court of equity was prohibited from interfering by its injunction, as the court of law attempted to do, frauds must prevail. This would be a reproach to the justice of a nation, and a libel on the wisdom of its judiciary arrangements. The attempt failed, and the court of equity was supported in its jurisdiction, to give relief where all remedy at law was at an end. The court of equity carries this principle to the utmost extent, not only against judgments at law, founded in fraud or imposition, but against its own decrees, obtained by fraud, or by imposition on the court. It has been repeatedly decided that such decrees may be opened by a new bill charging the fraud or imposition: and that the defendant should not protect himself by pleading the former decree.[21] And this is founded on a great principle, that it is the duty of courts of justice to relieve parties from any injustice which is occasioned by their own acts or oversights, which took place at the instance of the party against whom the relief is sought.—It is their duty to act with decision, and without scruple on this point.[22]

Whatever may have been the origin of the equity jurisdiction, it has been firmly established for two centuries; and it extends over a great variety of the most important branches of jurisprudence: and justice has been so wisely and beneficently administered, by a succession of wise and great men, who filled the chancery bench from the time of lord chancellor Nottingham down to lord Camden, and even later, that a finer body of doctrine, of the most refined principles of justice, lies scattered through the reports of decisions in the court of chancery, than is any where else to be found; and would furnish abundant as well as excellent materials to a scientific legal mind, to digest a most beautiful system of practical justice. It is greatly to be lamented that such a work has never been executed. It is a desideratum in legal science. Mr. Fonblanque has given great assistance to the student, and even the practising lawyer, by his learned notes and collections of cases appended to a text of uncommon brevity, learning, and obscurity. Mr. Roberts, Mr. Sugden and others have undertaken to state systematically the doctrines of the court of equity, on particular subjects; and have illustrated their works by a selection of the cases decided, which support those doctrines. But no great work has yet appeared, embracing the entire range of the equity principles, and reducing them to a clear, connected system. Whoever may undertake this task, and execute it with learning and skill, will render a great service to the public, as well as to the profession. And it would be easy to shew in such a work that the chancery doctrines are wise expositions of the law, with happy and just applications of its best principles, to the extraordinary cases constantly arising in the transactions of men; and that they are founded on the eternal principles of justice applied to a refined and complicated state of society:—That the court borrows light, and learning, and wisdom, from every source, but above all from the civil law, that great fountain of the jurisprudence of the modern nations of Europe. This fact is generally admitted by the jurists on the continent of Europe; but the English writers do not so willingly make the concession. Sir William Jones however, whose great mind disdained all concealment, makes the acknowledgment in the amplest form. He says, "the great work of which Justinian has the credit, consists of texts collected from law books of approved authority, which in his time were extant at Rome; and those texts are digested according to a scientific analysis; the names of the original authors, and the titles of their several books being constantly cited. But although it comprehends the whole system of jurisprudence, public, private and criminal, yet that vast compilation was finished, we are told, in three years. It bears marks indeed of great precipitation and of a desire to gratify the emperor, by quickness of dispatch: But with all its imperfections, it is a most valuable mine of judicial knowledge; it gives law at this time to the greatest part of Europe; and though few English lawyers dare make such an acknowledgment, it is the true source of nearly all our English laws, that are not of a feudal origin." [23]

[20] See a small treatise on the jurisdiction of the court of chancery, where this whole controversy and its result is stated.

[21] See 2d P. Wms. p. 73, 74. Lloyd v. Mansell.—1st P. Wms. 737. Richmond v. Tayleur.—3d P. Wms. iii. Sheldon v. Fortesque: cases Temp. Talbot 201, Gally v. Baker.

[22] See 6th Vesey, p. 92, 93, Pultney v. Warren.

The United States of America generally having borrowed their judicial system, the organization of their courts, the principles of decision, the rules of evidence, and the very forms of proceeding in suits, from England, the equity branch of jurisprudence forms an essential and interesting part of our legal polity. And so far as the principles derived from the civil law have weight or authority in the court of chancery, a proper knowledge of the civil law doctrines, becomes more interesting to us, than they are even in England; since the universal abolition of most of the feudal doctrines, and particularly those which relate to the tenure and descent of landed property; and the introduction of a more equal division of estates among the wife and children, or other relations of a person dying intestate, have brought our systems of jurisprudence nearer to the civil law than the English laws have yet approached.

In a few of the United States, the equity system, operating in a distinct tribunal, has not been adopted: nor have the general equity powers been entrusted to the courts of law. Hence it is said that there is a sensible defect in the administration of justice in those states: the courts of law, from the narrowness of their organization, and their modes of proceeding, not being able to give that relief in many important cases where equity would furnish full remedies. And where the law Judges in their zeal to do justice have had recourse to the equity principles of decision, they have been applied in an imperfect and halting manner: and the evils of a mixed jurisdiction foreseen by the sagacious mind of Bacon, must be produced. In one of the states at least, the attempt has been made to blend the jurisdictions by investing Judges of the courts of law with the equity powers, to be exercised separate and apart from the law court, on what is called the equity side, with power to refer all disputed facts to a jury. If the information received is to be credited, this plan has not succeeded in practice. The law court having a preference in the order of transacting business, on account of the attendance of a multitude of jurors, the greater part of the time of the Judge is occupied therewith, and little leisure or opportunity is left for the dispatch of business on the equity side: and the multiplied issues made up to try the facts of the causes, have increased the delay and expense of suits to an intolerable degree.

[23] Life of sir William Jones, by Lord Teignmouth, Philadelphia edition, p. 315, 316.

The legislature of the United States have placed the civil and criminal, the legal, equitable and admiralty powers, in the same courts; rather it is presumable from the desire to avoid the multiplication of expensive courts, to administer justice in a very limited extent of causes, than from a conviction of its propriety.

In this state, the court of equity is distinct from the courts of law.[24] The question of the propriety of blending the jurisdictions, has been repeatedly discussed with great ability in our state legislature; and the result has been a clear conviction that the separation of the common law and equity systems, in distinct tribunals, was the safest plan for a free country, whose policy requires a division of power, as well as the best adapted to ensure justice effectually and speedily to the suitors. The powers of the court of chancery as they exist in England, are exercised in this state by the Judges in equity, in a distinct court a little modified by statutary provisions. And the want of regular ecclesiastical courts has necessarily thrown some branches of that jurisdiction into the court of equity.[25] Alimony is allowed to wives on making out proper cases to entitle them to relief, without the necessity of a divorce a mensa et thoro; not a single instance of divorce of either kind having ever occurred in this state, since the revolution; either by the sentence of a court of justice, or by act of the legislature.

The court of equity is composed of five Judges, holding their commissions during good behaviour, with salaries fixed by law and immutable whilst they remain in office. They have no fees of any kind.

For the convenience of the citizens the state is divided into eleven equity districts, in each of which the court of equity is held twice every year at stated periods, by a single Judge, for the trial of causes. From his decrees, the parties dissatisfied, may appeal to the full bench of the Judges in equity, who are convened twice in each year, in order to hear and determine on all appeals. The decision of this court is final and conclusive. The reports of cases decided in the court of chancery in England, are received as authority in the court of equity in this state, to the commencement of the American revolution. Those of a subsequent period are read, as illustrating the doctrines of the court; but they are not of authority, further than their reason warrants, no more than the adjudications of any other foreign tribunals.

A commissioner is appointed for each of the equity districts, with the powers of the register, and of the master in chancery, somewhat enlarged by statute, in order to prepare the business of the court by the necessary interlocutory orders, and by reports on cases of account referred to him by a Judge.

The forms of proceeding in the court are upon the English model, by bill and answer, pruned of some redundancies, and moulded to suit the circumstances and habits of the country.

Witnesses are examined viva voce, in open court, which method has been supposed to possess great advantages over the course formerly pursued of examination in private on interrogatories. Exceptions are made to this rule, with respect to witnesses living out of the jurisdiction of the court, and also in favour [24] A court of chancery appears to have existed in this state, very early after the settlement of the colony. There are distinct traces of it under the proprietary government—and soon after the royal government superceded the proprietary, the court of chancery was regularly established, and endued with the powers of the court of chancery in England. The court was composed of the governor and council, who dispensed this branch of justice. It could not be expected that a court so constituted could have been celebrated for its learning or legal judgment. Governors appointed for their military skill, or their parliamentary connections, and a council composed generally of private and unlearned men, could not be expected to be eminent Judges. The effect was natural. Little confidence was reposed in their judgment, and no valuable decrees are recorded which illustrate the science, or furnish lights to guide succeeding times.

[25] As we have nothing of an ecclesiastical establishment in this country, but the clergy of all denominations depend on the voluntary contributions of their people, for support, we have very little of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. An ordinary is appointed for each district, with power to receive the probate of wills, and to register them; but he has little original power, and all his acts are subject to revision by the courts. We have nothing of that vast system of ecclesiastical jurisdiction which exists in England, as stated by Mr. Richard Washington, in his book on that subject, published in 1688.

of aged and infirm persons unable to travel, who are examined by commissions and interrogatories.

The decrees of the court are enforced by execution against the estate of the defendant, as well as by process against his person. This system has succeeded in practice. Justice is administered with as much speed as in the courts of law, and as is consistent with mature deliberation.

Many of the causes are heard and determined within one year, and most of them within two years, from their commencement—the few which are of longer duration, owe their procrastination to the necessity of collecting testimony from abroad, or to other peculiar circumstances, which make some delay necessary, that substantial justice may not be sacrificed to speed. Scarcely a single case in the court of appeals remains undecided one year after the appeal is made, and a great majority of the cases are decided within six months.

It hath repeatedly happened that on the rising of the court of appeals, not one case has been left undecided—a circumstance which certainly is rare in any country, and it is probable, has never occurred in the court of chancery in England, since the time of sir Francis Bacon, who once boasted when lord keeper, that he had determined all the business of his court.[26]

The expenses of a suit in equity are very moderate; not amounting in any case to a tenth part of the expenses of a suit in chancery in England; and in general not to a twentieth part of those expenses.

[26] See his letter of the 8th June, 1617; 6 vol. of his works, p. 149. in which he says "this day I have made even with the business of the kingdom for common justice: not one cause unheard; the lawyers drawn dry of all the motions they were to make; not one petition unanswered, and this I think could not be said in our age before. This I speak not out of ostentation, but out of gladness when I have done my duty. I know men think I cannot continue, if I thus oppress myself with business: but that account is made; the duties of life are more than life."

†

RULES OF THE COURT OF EQUITY

ESTABLISHED BY ORDER OF THE JUDGES,

1 Desaus. *57

*Rule 1st. No subpœna or other process for appearance shall issue (except in cases to stay waste) till after the bill is filed.

2d. All subpœnas ad respondendum shall be served personally, or where the defendant cannot be found, but is within the state, by leaving a true copy of the writ at the dwelling house, or most usual and notorious place of residence or habitation, of the person to whom directed.

3d. In case the defendant do appear, he shall constitute a solicitor to appear and act for him, so far as a solicitor can or may lawfully act, during the continuance of the suit, and file the warrant or order to appear for him in the register's office.

4th. In case the complainant reside out of the state, the defendant may, at any time after the service of the subpœna, obtain an order for the complainant to put in security for costs, before the master or commissioner; and if such security be not put in within thirty days after the service of such order on the complainant's solicitor, the bill shall stand dismissed, unless the master or commissioner, on cause shewn, shall grant further time.

5th. Every demurrer shall express the several causes of demurrer, and shall be determined in open court.

6th. Upon any slip or mistake in the bill, the plaintiff on motion before the master or commissioner may, (within thirty days after demurrer put in, and notice thereof,) amend on payment of costs.

7th. If the demurrer be admitted by the plaintiff to be good within thirty days after filing it, and he doth pay the defendant, or his solicitor, the costs, then the bill shall be dismissed of course, without motion; unless both sides agree to the amendment of the same: But such dismission is no bar to a new bill to be exhibited by the plaintiff.

*58

*8th. In case the plea or demurrer be allowed, the complainant's bill shall be dismissed with costs; and if the defendant's plea or demurrer be overruled, the defendant shall pay costs.

9th. If the defendant plead that there is another suit depending for that very cause, or that the cause had been formerly dismissed, and the dismission signed and enrolled in the court of equity, if the plaintiff be not satisfied therewith, the same shall be referred to the master or commissioner in equity; and if it be determined against the plaintiff, he shall pay costs to the defendant; but such reference must be procured by the plaintiff, and a report thereon, within thirty days after filing such plea, otherwise the bill to be dismissed of course.

10th. Pleas to the jurisdiction, and pleas of any matter of record, or of matters recorded in this court, need not be upon oath: but pleas in bar, founded on matters in pais, are to be on oath.

11th. Upon demurrer being overruled, the defendant shall pay costs, and put in plea or answer, within thirty days thereafter; in like manner if a plea be overruled, the defendant shall pay costs, and put in an answer within the same time; and in like manner if a defendant on exception taken, be ordered to make a better answer, he shall pay costs, and put in his amended answer within the same time: otherwise in such cases, an attachment shall be granted, or the bill be taken pro confesso, at the election of the complainant; unless in either case further time be obtained according to the 13th section of the act of assembly passed in December, 1808.

12th. If the defendant appears by solicitor, upon affidavit made that such defendant is absent from the state, then a commission shall be granted by the register or commissioner, directed to two or more persons of credit to take and certify the answer; and the form of the oath shall be endorsed on the answer, be subscribed by the defendant, and be certified by the commissioner, as having been subscribed and sworn; and where the defendant shall reside within the state, and shall have appeared as aforesaid, he shall be at liberty to swear to his plea or answer, before any judge or justice of the peace of this state, and the form of *the oath shall be endorsed on the answer or plea, be subscribed by the defendant, and be certified as aforesaid, by such judge or justice of the peace; and where it may be necessary that any bill or petition be sworn to, the same may be sworn to, certified in the same manner.

*59

13th. An answer, charged as a defendant's own act, must be without saying to his remembrance or as he believeth, if laid to be done five years before, unless the court upon exception taken shall find special cause to dispense with so positive an answer: and if he deny the fact, he must traverse or deny it directly, and not by way of negative pregnant.

14th. In case the answer is imperfect, the complainant in thirty days after he can procure a copy of the answer, shall put in his exceptions: otherwise none to be admitted without a particular order of the court, if sitting, or the master or commissioner in equity in case the court is not sitting—But in cases of injunction or ne exeat, the court on cause shewn, may require exceptions to be filed within a shorter period.

15th. If the defendant shall fail to amend his answer, the exceptions within fifteen days after filing thereof, and notice to the defendant, shall be heard before the master or commissioner, in equity.

16th. The exceptions taken and specified to be alone insisted on, and no new exceptions put in.

17th. If the answer be certified insufficient, the defendant is to pay costs; but the defendant may have liberty to appeal from the report of the master to the court.

18th. If the answer be reported good, the plaintiff shall pay the defendant costs.

19th. The complainant upon bill filed, and thirty days after subpœna served, and defendant on plea or answer filed, may obtain a commission to examine witnesses resident out of the state on application to the register or commissioner, giving ten days notice thereof to the opposite party, and serving him at the same time with a copy of the interrogatories to be annexed; and if he does not put in cross interrogatories before the expiration of that time, a commission shall be granted to the party applicant ex *parte: There shall be four commissioners, two to be named by each party, unless the opposite party shall not join in the commission, in which case they shall be named exparte by the applicant, and the commission may be executed by any two or more of them.

*60

20th. Witnesses unable to travel from age, sickness or infirmity, may be examined by commission if ordered by a judge or commissioner on motion and affidavit; the applicant giving the same notice, and taking out his commission in other respects, as prescribed by the preceding rule.

21st. Commissions when executed shall be sealed up by the commissioners, who shall execute the same, and directed to the register or commissioner of the court from whence they issue, and shall not be opened but on motion in open court, or by consent of parties in writing.

22d. If the plaintiff shall fail to appear and prosecute his suit, the bill shall be dismissed, unless the court on cause shewn shall allow him further time; such dismissal however shall not be a plea in bar to a new bill, but a second shall.

23d. If the defendant shall not appear and defend the suit, the bill and answer shall be read; if the court upon hearing shall find cause to decree for the plaintiff, yet a day shall be given for the defendant to shew cause against the same; but before he be admitted thereunto, he shall submit to such conditions as the court shall see fit to impose.

24th. Decrees may be enrolled at any time, not exceeding twelve months, after they shall be pronounced; unless by special order of the court.

25th. No execution or attachment for the enforcement of a decree shall issue, until thirty days after the rising of the court during which such decree was pronounced: and if there be an appeal, then such execution or attachment shall not issue until thirty days after the adjournment of the court of appeals at which the cause shall be determined, and all executions shall be returnable on the first day of the term next after the same shall issue: unless otherwise ordered by the court.

*61

*26th—(For Charleston.) The master or commissioner in all cases of reference having prepared his report shall issue a summons for the parties to attend him and peruse the same. And if either party is dissatisfied therewith, he shall within ten days after the time fixed for attendance, state his exceptions in writing, and take out a summons to be heard thereon; a copy of which he shall serve on the adverse party, or his solicitor, at least three days before such hearing: and the master or commissioner shall thereon finally determine and report.

27th—(For the Country.) On the circuit, notice of all reports made in vacation shall be served on the parties, or their solicitors, on or before the first day of the next term; and the party dissatisfied therewith, shall file his exceptions and give notice thereof on or before the second day of the same term: Notices of all reports in term time shall be immediately served on the parties or their solicitors: and the party dissatisfied therewith, shall within one day after such notice file his exceptions; that in all cases where such exceptions are filed and notice given, the commissioners shall immediately proceed to hear, and thereon finally determine, unless he shall allow further time.

28th. The injunction to stay proceedings at law must be served either on the party himself, his counsel or solicitor, as the cause requires, and afterwards filed in the office of the clerk of the court of common pleas.

29th. All causes shall be docketted ten days before the meeting of the court; and no cause shall be docketted until the pleadings are complete and filed.

30th—(For Charleston.) Briefs shall be served with the registers of the respective circuit courts and courts of appeal, three days before the meeting of the courts; and no cause will be heard, unless briefs are so delivered.

31st—(For the Country.) On the circuit all briefs shall be served, on or before the meeting of the court.

32d. A decree being fully performed, the party satisfied shall, on application made to him, enter satisfaction in a book to be kept for that purpose by the register or commissioner, and on the enrolled decree, (if the same be enrolled,) and the register or *commissioner shall grant certificates of satisfaction on application therefor.

*62

33d. When the bill or petition is dismissed, the costs shall be paid by the complainant; when sustained, by the defendant, unless otherwise ordered by the court: the party in either case entitled thereto, may have an attachment or execution for enforcing payment thereof.

34th. Sundays are to be included in all the calculations of time under the preceding rules.

35th—(For Charleston.) The bill being taken pro confesso, the order therefor can only be set aside where the defendant shall give ten days written notice in Charleston, prior to the ensuing term, of his intention to apply for the same on the first day of such term, and shall have previously filed, or on making the application shall produce a full and explicit answer or plea, with a brief for the court, and shall docket the cause for hearing at the said term, and submit to any further conditions the court may impose. If complainant be dissatisfied with the answer, he may within ten days tender exceptions, and if on reference thereof the answer shall be adjudged insufficient, the bill shall be absolutely ordered to be taken pro confesso. But in making a final decree, where a bill has been taken pro confesso, the court will require such proofs as shall satisfy it of the justice of the complainant's demand; and the defendant may be heard touching the merits so disclosed, and may take advantage of any matter which would have been good cause of demurrer, but not of such as ought to have been presented by plea or answer.

36th—(For the Country.) The bill being taken pro confesso the order therefor can be set aside only where the defendant shall apply for the same on the first day of the meeting of the court, and shall have previously filed, or, on making such application shall produce a full and explicit answer or plea, with a brief for the court, and shall docket the cause for hearing at such court, and submit to any further conditions the court may impose.—If the complainant be dissatisfied with such answer, he shall forthwith file exceptions, and if on reference thereof the answer shall be adjudged insufficient, the bill shall be absolutely *ordered to be taken pro confesso, as to the points not satisfactorily answered, unless otherwise ordered by the court; but in making a final decree where a bill has been taken pro confesso, the court will require such proofs as shall satisfy it of the justice of the complainant's demand, and the defendant may be heard touching the merits so disclosed, and may take advantage of any matter which would have been good cause of demurrer, but not of such as ought to have been presented by plea or answer.

*63

37th. The register and commissioners of the respective courts shall keep books in which they shall cause to be transcribed all reports made to the court, as soon as the same shall be confirmed.

38th. No cause shall be continued on the docket for a longer time, or on other terms than those prescribed by law.

39th. Gowns and black coats shall be the habit of the bar, and no member thereof shall be permitted to address the court unless in such habit.[1]

20th March, 1810.

---

[1] See various rules and regulations for the proceedings in the court of equity, in different acts of the legislature respecting that court; and particularly the 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th and 17th sections of the act of December, 1808.

The rule of the court of chancery, as to supplementary bills, and bills in nature of bills of review, made by lord chancellor Hardwicke, is to be found in 2d vol. Atkins, p. 139, in a note.

---

1 Desaus. 63

RULES OF COURT CONTINUED.

South Carolina. In the Court of Appeals.
Fall Term, 1810.

In all cases brought up to the court of appeals, costs may be directed to be paid by either the complainants or defendants, as the court shall see fit, notwithstanding the decree or order of the circuit judge respecting them should not be made a ground of appeal.—(A copy from the minutes.)

*64

*Ordered that the master and the commissioners in the equity circuit courts of this state, shall at the first sitting of their respective courts in every year, severally make report to the court of the different estates in their hands severally, under and by virtue of any decree or order of the court, with a full and particular account of the monies received and paid relating to said estates: And the said masters and commissioners shall also at the time abovementioned severally report what executors, administrators, guardians or trustees have been ordered by any decree of the court, to account annually before them respectively, and which of them have complied therewith: and it shall be the duty of the said master and commissioner respectively to take out rules against those who may be in default, so as to enforce the due execution of the orders and decrees of the court on that subject.

April 23d, 1811.

When the defendant is out of the limits of the state, and an order is taken out for him to plead, answer or demur, or that the bill be taken pro confesso, the defendant appearing in person or by his attorney before the expiration of the time contained in the said order, shall be at liberty to move at chambers, before any one of the judges, and giving four days notice thereof to the complainant or his attorney, for a dissolution of the said order.

Henry Wm. Desaussure, Theodore Gaillard,
Thomas Waties,
William D. James,
Waddy Thompson.

March 26th, 1814.

ACTS OF THE LEGISLATURE,

ESTABLISHING, ORGANIZING, REGULATING, OR GIVING AUTHORITY TO THE COURT OF CHANCERY

---

1 Desaus. *65

*An act to establish a Court of Chancery in the province of South Carolina.—Passed the 9th September, 1721.

The first section authorizes and empowers the governor and the majority of the council, for the time being, "to hold a court of chancery, and to have, exercise, and use the same jurisdiction, power and authority, in granting and issuing forth all original and remedial writs, and other process whatsoever, and in hearing, adjudging and determining all causes and suits in equity, in as full and ample a manner as any chancellor, or court or courts of chancery, in America, can, may or ought to do."[1]

*66

*II. And be it further enacted, That all writs and process issuing out of the said courts of chancery, (except such writs as are herein after excepted,) shall be signed by the register of the same court, and shall be granted of course by the said register to any person or persons whatsoever, who shall apply for the same, such persons paying the fees allowed by law for such writs and process.

III. And be it further enacted, That no injunction for staying suits at law, or for staying execution, shall at any time hereafter be granted out of the court of chancery of course, or by surprise, but upon the bill of complaint being first filed in the said court, and two days notice at least given by the party complainant, to the adverse party, his or her counsel or solicitor, in writing, that he intends to move the said court for such injunction, expressing in the said notice in writing, the place where and the time when he intends to move for the same, to the intent that the adverse party may have due notice, and attend to oppose the granting such injunction, if he shall see fit.

*67

*IV. And whereas the parties do often obtain injunctions upon notorious, false, and

---

[1] It is not clear from this act what power was intended to be vested in this court, in relation to the issuing of original writs and other process. It was probably intended that the powers and duties of the court should correspond to the high court of chancery in England. But in that court there are two distinct tribunals: the one ordinary, being a court of common law; and the other extraordinary, being a court of equity. The jurisdiction of the ordinary legal court extends (among other things) to the fabrication and emission of original writs. This is the officina justitiæ, always open for any one who may have occasion for a writ of any description that may suit his case, and which is demandable ex debito justitiæ, as a matter of right. These writs were, in ancient times, kept in a hamper; hence it was called the hanaper office.—See 3 Bl. Com. ch. 4.

If the practice of issuing writs out of chancery, whereon to ground proceedings at law, ever existed in this country, it appears not to have continued long; and the circuit court act of 1769, and other subsequent acts, have totally abolished it.

With respect to the hearing and determining of causes, the power of the court does not appear to be very certain or determinate. It is not easy to ascertain in what manner, or in what cases the chancellors, or courts of chancery in America, exercised, or might, or ought to have exercised equitable and other powers, in the year 1721.

It has never been determined in this state, whether the courts of equity have jurisdiction to repeal letters patent, or original grants, by scire facias. This is a branch of the royal prerogative which belonged *formerly to the grand justiciar. The scire facias was returnable to the officina brevium et cartarum regiarum, because the patents of the crown were there registered.—See Forum Romanum of Ch. Baron Gilbert, 21.

*66

The chancellor, who was anciently the king's chaplain, and keeper of his conscience, as well as a keeper of the records of all grants, was well acquainted (as he is still supposed to be) with the reasons and suggestions on which all grants issued: and if there was any deception practised, or false suggestion made, he was competent to inquire into it, and to cancel the grant if he thought proper.

The scire facias is sometimes returnable to the king's bench, when the question depends on an issue of fact to be tried by a jury.—See 3 Bl. Com. 261. 5 Com. Dig. 282. Dyer 197. 4 Inst. 72.

In the case of Mounce v. Ingram and others, decided in the constitutional court of appeals at Columbia, in April, 1802, the plaintiff in an action to try the titles to a tract of land, claimed under an original grant, which by mistake, and through the fraud of a third person, had been post dated. The grant ought to have issued and borne date in 1785, but the person, who had fraudulently obtained a copy of the plat annexed to the grant, and had procured the same to be certified, &c. interposed a caveat, by which the issuing of the grant was delayed; and in the mean time, he surreptitiously obtained another grant for the same land, dated prior to the date of the plaintiff's, which afterwards issued in 1786. The caveat was never prosecuted: and when the plaintiff's grant was issued, instead of dating it at the time when it would have been dated, *had no caveat been interposed, (which was the usual and correct practice,) it was dated at the time it issued, or was delivered to the grantee, in consequence of the caveator's failing to follow up and support his caveat. All this could have been established by satisfactory evidence; but the court, at the trial of the cause, refused to admit any proof groundless suggestions in the bill of complaint set forth; for the prevention of such abuses, be it enacted, that the party complainant, or his or her solicitor, shall make oath (if required) that he or she believes the allegations in his or her bill of complaint, for obtaining injunctions, to be true.

*67

V. (The first part of this section repealed by act of assembly of 1784.)—"No injunction whatsoever shall continue in force any longer than till the sitting of the next court, after the party defendant shall have put in his answer to the bill of complaint, unless the court shall see cause to continue the same. Provided, That nothing in this act be construed or deemed to extend to injunctions for staying of waste, but that all injunctions for staying of waste be granted of course, on affidavit made before the master of the same court, that the party praying such injunction hath been three years in the quiet and peaceable possession of the lands, where such waste shall be said to be committed."

*68

*VI. (The first part of this section altered by the 7th section of the act of assembly of 1784. The remainder not now applicable.)

VII. VIII & IX. (Obsolete, and new provisions made by subsequent acts.)

X. And be it further enacted, That the said court shall proceed, adjudge and determine in all causes brought into the said court, as near as may be according to the known and established rules of his majesty's high court of chancery in South Britain.

XI. (Repeals all former acts of the legislature relative to the court of chancery in the province of South Carolina.)

Extract from an act of 17th February, 1746.

"Be it enacted, That the master of the said court, (chancery) for the time being, shall have power to hear all motions of course, and make orders thereon."

An act for establishing a Court of Chancery. —Passed 21st March, 1784.

Whereas by the constitution or form of government, it is declared, that the lieutenant-governor of the state, and a majority of the privy council, for the time being, shall, until otherwise altered by the Legislature, exercise the powers of a court of chancery: And whereas many inconveniences arise from so frequent a rotation of the members who compose the said court, as is required by the constitution in the office of privy counsellors:

*69

*I. Be it therefore enacted, That from and immediately after passing this act, the power and authority of the court of chancery, as established by the constitution or form of government of this state, on the 19th day of March, A. D. 1778, shall cease and determine.

II. The court of chancery shall in future consist of three judges, to be chosen by joint ballot of the senate and house of representatives, and commissioned by his excellency the governor, during good behaviour, removeable nevertheless on the address of both houses of assembly.

III. Every person elected and commissioned as aforesaid, before he shall enter upon the duties of his office, shall take and subscribe the oath of fidelity to the state; and shall also take the following oath of office, which the governor or commander in chief is hereby directed to administer, to wit:

I A. B. do swear that I will well and truly serve the people of this state, in the office of judge of the court of chancery, and that I will do equal right to all manner of people, great and small, high and low, rich and poor, according to equity and good conscience, and the laws and usages of South Carolina, without respect of persons, according to the best of my knowledge, skill and abilities.—So help me God.

And if any person shall presume to execute the said office without being qualified as this act directs, he shall forfeit and pay the sum of 10,000*l.* sterling, to be applied to the use of the state, and which shall be sued for and recovered by the governor or commander in chief for the time, ex officio.

IV. All the powers and authorities which to impeach the validity or sufficiency of the grant under which the defendants claimed, or for the purpose of giving a priority to that under which the plaintiff claimed. On appeal to the judges at their sittings at Columbia after the conclusion of the circuit courts, it was contended on the part of the plaintiff, 1st, That the courts of equity had no power to examine the matter in question, and decide thereon by way of scire facias, as the lord chancellor in England may: and, 2d, That the courts of common pleas were competent to examine and try the validity of patents, or original grants, in all cases where the matter comes fairly in issue before them in the ordinary course of justice, in suits between party and party, according to the established rules of evidence, and the principles of the common law. And it was attempted to be shewn that this had been frequently done in the law courts of England and the United States; and for this purpose the following cases and authorities were quoted: 10 Co. 109, Legat's case. 1 Co. 41, the case of Alton Woods. Barwick's case, 5 Co. 94. The king v. Pasmore, 3 Durnf. and East's Rep. 212. White v. Jones, 1 Wash. 117. Haywood's Rep. 135, 375, 129, and Tarrant v. Terry, 1 Bay 238.

---

*68

*But the whole court refused the application for a new trial: and although no opinion was expressed with respect to the propriety of an application to a court of equity for relief, yet it was understood it was the opinion of a majority of the judges that that was the proper tribunal to grant it. The court decided on the ground that parole evidence was inadmissible, to impeach the validity of a grant under the great seal.

have been at any time vested in, or exercised by a court of chancery in this state, for the purpose of making such rules and orders as may be thought expedient and necessary for carrying on the proceedings in the said court, either before or since the revolution, shall be, and they are hereby vested in, or they may be exercised by the said judges, or any two of them. And the said judges, or any two of them, are hereby fully authorized and empowered to hear and finally to determine, all such matters and causes, as shall from time to time be brought before the said court.

*70

*V. The said judges, or any two of them, shall have full power and authority to establish such standing rules and orders, (not repugnant to this act,) for regulating the practice of the said court, as they shall deem most consistent with justice and equity, and as may effectually tend to the dispatch of business, without unnecessary delay to suitors.

VI. [2]No suit or petition in chancery, on which a decree or dismission has not been yet obtained, shall be considered as dismissed, or discontinued, for any past delay of prosecution; but that all suits and petitions shall be deemed to be pending in the court hereby established, and to be, now, in the same state as they were in when the last proceeding was had thereon; and every such suit or petition shall be finally determined, within one year from and after the passing of this act; and every petition or suit which shall be hereafter preferred to, or instituted in the said court, shall be finally decided within one year after the same shall have been preferred or commenced, unless upon application, in full and open court, in termtime, and for special reasons, to be assigned on account of the absence of material witnesses, or of some of the parties, or any other equitable cause, the court shall think proper to extend the time (not exceeding [3]twelve months longer) for the determination of the suit.

VII. The said court shall be considered as always open for administering justice to suitors, and in the vacation, any one of the said judges may make such rules and orders preparatory to hearing in any suit or cause depending in the said court, as may be necessary.

VIII. The stated terms for holding the said court, and for the full and solemn hearing of causes, shall be on every second Monday in March, June, September, and on every third Monday in December; and the said court shall sit at the said terms, de die in diem, (Sundays excepted,) at the place where the courts of common pleas are usually held in Charleston, until all the causes ready for hearing, *(and which shall be set down, or entered for hearing, with the register of the said court, ten days previous to the first day of each term,) shall be heard.

*71

IX. And whereas the obliging a complainant seeking relief from a verdict or judgment at law, to deposit the sum for which such verdict or judgment was obtained, before an injunction can issue to stay execution, although his prayer is manifestly founded in equity, hath been, and would be attended with much inconvenience to suitors, and, in many instances, may amount to a denial of justice.

Be it therefore enacted, That a party applying for an injunction to stay proceedings in an action at law, or judgment, or execution, or the levying of execution, shall be entitled to such injunction, on making oath, or giving his affirmation, (according to the form of his profession,) to the truth of his bill, and giving bond to the plaintiff at law, with security to be approved by the master in chancery, for such sum, and with such condition as the court shall direct, if upon the merits of the motion for such injunction (of which motion due notice shall always be given to the adverse party) the complainant shall appear from the equity stated in his bill, to be entitled to an injunction.

X. And there shall be a register of the said court, to be appointed by the governor, with the advice of the privy council, and commissioned during good behaviour.

XI. The sheriff of the district in which the party against whom any process of the said court issues resides, or the estate to be affected thereby lies, shall execute and make a proper return of all such process, writs of subpœna only excepted.

XII. If in any suit in the said court, a defendant, against whom a process shall issue, shall not cause an appearance to be entered thereupon, as it ought to have been, if such process had been duly served, and affidavit shall be made, to the satisfaction of the court, that such defendant is without the limits of this state, or that, on enquiry at his or her usual place of abode, he or she could not be found to be served with such process, the said court may make a rule, or order, directing and ap*pointing such defendant to appear at a certain day, therein to be mentioned; and a copy of such order shall, within ten days after making thereof, be inserted in the South Carolina Gazette, and continued for three months; and another copy thereof pasted up at a door of the statehouse in Charleston; and, if the defendant shall not appear within the time limited by such order, on proof made, to the satisfaction of the said court, of the publication thereof, as aforesaid, the court may order the complainant's bill to be taken pro confesso,

*72

[2] See 2d section of act of assembly of 16th March, 1783.

[3] See last section of act of assembly of 7th March, 1789, to continue judicial proceedings.

and make such decree thereon, as to the said court shall appear just and equitable, and issue the process necessary to enforce the execution, or compel the performance of the said decree, the complainant first giving sufficient security, in such sum as the court shall think proper, to abide such order as may be made on the defendant's appearing to the suit, and paying such costs to the complainant as the court shall order.

Provided, That if any person against whom such decree shall be made, or his or her legal representative, shall within four years after passing the said decree, if without the limits of the United States, and within two years if absent from this and within the United States, appear in court, and petition to be heard, with respect to the matter of such decree, and shall pay down, or give security for payment of such costs as the court shall think proper, the person so petitioning shall be admitted to answer, plead, or demur to the bill, and such proceedings shall be thereupon had in the said suit, as there might have been in case the party had originally appeared, and as if no former order, or decree, had been made in the said cause.

XIII. If neither the person against whom such decree shall be made, or his legal representative, shall appear, and petition for a rehearing, and pay, or give security for payment of such costs, within the time abovementioned, such decree shall stand absolutely confirmed against the person against whom it was made, his legal representatives, and all claiming under him. But if such defendant shall be in custody at the time a decree shall be made, upon refusal or neglect to enter appearance, or to *appoint an attorney as aforesaid, or shall be forthcoming so as to be served with a copy of the decree before any process shall issue to compel the performance thereof; and if such defendant shall die in custody before such copy is served on him or her, then the heir at law, if any real estate be affected thereby, or if only personal estate, the executors or administrators shall be served with such copy within six months after such death; or if the heir, executor, or administrator, be out of the state, then the said decree to be published in the South Carolina Gazette, and also posted up at the front door of the state-house in Charleston, for three weeks previous to further proceedings.

*73

XIV. If any person brought into the said court, on process issued therefrom, shall refuse or neglect to enter an appearance, according to the rules of the court, the court may appoint a solicitor to enter an appearance for such defendant, and thereupon such proceedings shall be had in the said cause, as if the party had actually appeared.

XV. Each of the said judges shall be allowed a salary of five hundred pounds sterling per annum, payable quarterly at the treasury of this state, in lieu of all fees and perquisites of office whatsoever.

An act for the more speedy and effectual enforcing the execution of decrees in the Court of Chancery.—Passed 12th March, 1785.

Whereas the present mode of enforcing obedience to decrees in the court of chancery is tedious and often defective: Be it therefore enacted, That in all cases where payment of money is decreed by the said court, it shall be lawful for the party to whom such payment is to be made, to sue forth (at his option) either the usual process for compelling performance of the said decree, or a writ, in nature of a fieri facias, to make the estate both real and personal of the party by whom such money is to be paid, liable to satisfaction thereof, in the same manner as it is on *such a writ from the court of common pleas, and that the sheriff of the district in which the estate levied upon lies, shall have the same power and authority to sell and convey the same, as he hath on a fieri facias from the court of common pleas, and be entitled to the like fees for the execution thereof.

*74

Extract from an act of the legislature, passed on the 7th March, 1789.

Whereas, by an act for establishing a court of chancery, it is enacted, that every petition or suit, preferred to, or instituted in the said court, shall be finally decided within one year after the same shall have been preferred or commenced, unless upon application in full and open court, in term time, and for special reasons to be assigned on account of the absence of material witnesses, or of some of the parties, or any other equitable cause, the court shall think proper to extend the time (not exceeding twelve months longer) for the determination of the suit: and whereas, it has been found, that the time limited by the said act, for the duration of suits, is too short, and productive of inconvenience and expense, when one of the parties or witnesses are very remote from this state:—Be it therefore enacted, that the said court shall have full power on application in term time, and for special reasons to be assigned on account of the absence of material witnesses, or of some of the parties, or any other equitable cause, to extend the time, for the determination of such suit or petition (not exceeding twelve months longer) than the time allowed by the recited act.

An act to establish a Court of Equity within this state.—Ratified on 19th February, 1791.

Whereas by the constitution of this state it is declared, that the judicial power shall be vested in such superior and inferior courts of law and equity as the legislature shall, from time to time, direct and establish: and where*as it is expedient that a court of equity, with adequate powers, be established in this state:

*75

I. Be it therefore enacted by the honourable the senate and house of representatives, now met and sitting in general assembly, and by the authority of the same, That the laws now of force for establishing and regulating the court of chancery within this state, be and they are hereby declared to be and continue of force in this state, until altered or repealed by the legislature thereof; subject, nevertheless, to such alterations, amendments and restrictions as are herein after directed.

And whereas great inconveniencies have been experienced in the remote parts of the state, on account of the court of chancery having been hitherto held in one part of the state only: in remedy thereof,

II. Be it enacted, That all future sittings of the court of equity, for the full and solemn hearing of causes, shall be held at the times and places herein after directed; that is to say, at Columbia for all causes wherein the defendant shall reside in Camden, Orangeburgh or Cheraw districts, on the fifteenth days of May and December; at Cambridge for all causes wherein the defendant shall reside in the district of Ninety-six, on the fifth days of May and December; and at Charleston for all causes wherein the defendant shall reside in either of the districts of Charleston, Beaufort or Georgetown, on the second Monday in March, on the second Monday in June, and the third Monday in September; and the same days in every succeeding year; and that the court shall continue to sit from day to day (Sundays excepted) at Columbia and Cambridge respectively, until all the causes which shall be brought before them shall be heard; provided the time of their sitting shall not exceed six days at each place; and at Charleston till all the business ready for the said court shall be heard.

And whereas it will be conducive to the more perfect investigation of the truth that the testimony of witnesses be taken in open court, in presence of the parties:

III. Be it therefore enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the examination of all witnesses who may be called *upon to give evidence in the said court, shall be taken by word of mouth, and in open court, subject to such regulations and exceptions as the said court may, from time to time, order and direct.

*76

IV. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the master of the court of equity for the district of Charleston, Georgetown and Beaufort, shall give good and sufficient security, to be approved of by the governor or commander in chief for the time being, for the faithful discharge of his duty, in the sum of five thousand pounds sterling; which said bond, and any other bond, to be given by the commissioners to be appointed by virtue of this act, shall be deposited in the office of the secretary of the state, and be liable to be sued on by any party aggrieved by the misfeasance or default of the said master or any of the said commissioners respectively.

V. And be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, That there shall be, in each and every of the districts aforesaid, one commissioner, who shall be commissioned and appointed by the governor or commander in chief for the time being, during good behaviour, and who shall give security, to be approved by the governor, in the sum of one thousand pounds, well and faithfully to administer his office; whose business it shall be to file and keep all bills, answers and papers whatever, relating to any cause depending in any of the said districts respectively; swear and examine all witnesses, where necessary or ordered by the court, upon interrogatories and cross interrogatories, who may be brought before any of them, touching any matter or thing depending, or to be commenced in any of the said several and respective districts; swear defendants to answers; take recognizances and affidavits, and to do and perform all other matters and things, which are usually done either by the master or register of the said court, previous to the hearing of any cause. Provided always, That where it may be necessary to examine aged, sick, or infirm persons: or witnesses out of the state, then and in every such case it shall and may be lawful for the said court to issue out one or more commission or commissions to examine the said witnesses *upon interrogatories, whose depositions, when taken, shall be read in evidence in any of the districts within this state.

*77

VI. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the said commissioners in their said several and respective districts, shall attend at the sitting of every court to be held in and for the said several districts, and shall there take and enter down the decrees, orders and minutes thereof, and make up and report upon all matters and things referred to them in the said court; and shall also make all sales under the decree of said court.

VII. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the said commissioners respectively shall be entitled to receive for their services aforesaid, the same fees, perquisites and emoluments as are or may be fixed and established by law for the master or register of said court for similar services.

And whereas, in cases under the value of one hundred pounds, and in cases which may not be litigated, it may be unnecessary to proceed by bill and answer in the said court:

VIII. Be it therefore enacted by the authority aforesaid, That in all such cases it shall and may be lawful for the parties complaining to present his or their petition to the said court, on oath, setting forth the true nature of the case, or sum really due; a copy of which said petition shall be served on the opposite party, at least thirty days before the sitting of the court, with notice thereon to appear on a certain day in court, in order to answer, if necessary, the contents of said petition: and if the party so served with a copy of said petition, shall not appear at the time and place in the said notice mentioned, or if appearing, shall not offer some substantial defence, then the said court shall proceed to make such order or decree therein as to justice and equity shall appertain. Provided always, That if the defendant or defendants should appear at the return of said petition, and shew sufficient reasons to the said court, on oath, for going into a more ample investigation of the case, then and in every such case, the said parties shall and may be at liberty to go *into the examination of witnesses to prove and substantiate their respective allegations, as in other cases.

*78

IX. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the judges of the said court are hereby authorized and required to make and establish all such rules, orders and regulations as may be necessary for the better and more effectually carrying into execution the terms of this act, for the benefit of the citizens of this state.

X. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That it shall and may be lawful for any one of the judges of the said court to hear all motions, and to make all orders necessary in any cause previous to the hearing and making the final decree.

XI. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the judges shall cause the principal facts and reasons on which they found their decree in each cause to appear upon record.

XII. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That suits in equity shall not be sustained in any case where plain and adequate remedy can be had at common law.

XIII. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all suitors and defendants in the court of equity may do their own business without application to any counsellor or solicitor of the court.

XIV. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That each and every of the judges of the court of equity shall ride the circuit, unless prevented by sickness or unavoidable accident.

Extract from an act for establishing the annual Salaries of the Public Officers of Government, and for ascertaining and regulating the fees to be taken by those who by law may be entitled to them, throughout the state.—Ratified 19th February, 1791.

Whereas it is expedient and necessary that the salaries of the public officers of government should be fixed upon a regular and permanent footing, during their continuance in office; and that the fees to be received and ta*ken in the public offices and by those who by law shall be entitled to the same, may be regulated and ascertained, to the end the citizens thereof may know with certainty the sums they are to pay, and the services to be performed for such payment:

*79

I. Be it therefore enacted by the honourable the senate and house of representatives, now met and sitting in general assembly, and by the authority of the same, That from and after the fifth day of April next, the annual salaries herein after specified and enumerated, and no others, shall be paid, taken and received by the public officers of government herein after mentioned, in lieu of all other sum and sums of money whatever; any law, usage or custom to the contrary thereof in any manner notwithstanding.—(The salaries are then enumerated.)

II. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the several and respective fees herein after mentioned, and no others, shall be paid, received and taken in the respective public offices in this state, and by those entitled to fees throughout the same, for the different services in the respective suits in this act specified and contained, in lieu of all other demands whatever for said services; any law, usage or custom to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding.

FEES IN EQUITY.

Master and Commissioners in Equity.

	l.	s.	d.
For every summons		1	9
For every copy of a charge or discharge		1
Taking every affidavit in writing		1	6
For every oath administered			6
Taking every recognizance		2
For every day's attendance in court on any cause		3	6
Taking the oaths for every defendant, to answer out of office, and attendance		5
Every attendance in office, on summons of either party, or their solicitors		3	6
Hearing and determining any contested matter, and order thereon		5

*80

	l.	s.	d.
*Making up and returning every report into court, but only one report to be charged in each suit		14
Commissions on sales under decrees of the court, three per cent. for the first hundred, and one per cent. on all sums above.
Drawing each set of conveyances	1	5

REGISTER, AND COMMISSIONERS IN EQUITY.

For affixing the seal of the court to subpœna, or other writ, and signing the same		2	6
For affidavit of service of subpœna, or other writ		2	6
For examining every witness, drawing depositions, exemplifications of proceedings in any cause, if required, containing minutes of a decree, all orders of court, or for copies thereof, per copy sheet of ninety words			5
For every search			8
For entering every cause for hearing		1
For attending court in each cause		3	6
Reading all papers in a suit		2
Examining decree, affixing seal thereto, and attending the judges in court to sign certificates of examination		4
Notification to insert in gazette, by order of court, and attendance on printer		1	6
For affixing every seal, and signing every commission to take answers and examine witnesses, or for other purposes		2	6

SOLICITOR IN EQUITY.

Complainant's Solicitor.

Preparing and filing a bill in equity, with all necessary exhibits	7
Drawing interrogatories in chief for complainant's witnesses, and cross interrogatories, drawing and engrossing commissions, and attending to strike commissioners, where necessary, with proper instructions	3	10
Arguing exceptions on points of law before the master or judge at chambers when necessary, *and attending thereon, including all charges incidental thereto	2
For all other services in the cause, including briefs served on judges, except the decree	3
Drawing and engrossing decree, per copy sheet			5

*81

Defendant's Solicitor.

For preparing and filing defendant's answer, and all necessary exhibits	7
Drawing interrogatories in chief for defendant's witnesses, drawing and engrossing cross interrogatories, commissions, attending to strike commissioners where necessary, with instructions	3	10
Arguing exceptions on points of law before the master or judges at chambers, when necessary, including notices, attendance, and all incidental charges relative thereto	2
For all other services in the cause, including serving judges with briefs, and except the decree	3
Drawing and engrossing decree, per copy sheet			5

III. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That if any of the public officers of this state, or other person or persons entitled to fees by this act, and in the foregoing lists particularly mentioned, shall take or receive any further, other or greater fee or reward for any of the services in the said foregoing lists respectively mentioned, or shall invent or contrive any other or further fee or reward for any of the said services, then, and in every such case, the person or persons so offending, upon due proof and conviction, shall forfeit for the first offence, four times the amount of the sum so taken, paid or received, to be recovered in any court of record in this state; one half to be paid to the person who shall sue for the same, and the other moiety to be paid into the public treasury for the use of the state, except in such counties where county courts are established, in which cases the said last mentioned moiety shall be paid for the use of the county; *and for the second offence, shall stand divested of his office, and be rendered incapable of re-appointment to the same; and on information from the court, under hand and seal, the governor shall fill up the vacancy, if the legislature should not be sitting; and if in the county courts, the vacancies shall be filled up by the justices of the said county.

*82

IV. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the following officers, to wit, the secretary of state, register and commissioners in equity, register of mesne conveyances, ordinaries and surveyor-general, shall, and they are hereby directed to keep their several offices open from nine o'clock in the morning until three o'clock in the afternoon, each and every day throughout the year, (Sundays, Christmas day, and the anniversary of the independence of America excepted;) and the sheriffs, and the clerks of all courts, are hereby obliged to give constant attendance at their offices, either by themselves or deputies, in their several and respective offices; which said offices shall be kept in the city, town or village, where the respective court-houses are established. And no person shall be compellable to pay any of the aforesaid fees, unless at the time of demand, or before distress of goods is made, an account thereof shall be delivered, signed by the officer to whom the same is due, specifying distinctly every article in words at length, with the particular fee charged for it, and shall give a receipt for the same, if required.

V. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the several clerks and registers of the courts of justice, and sheriffs, throughout the state, shall collect in and receive their own fees from the different suitors or persons who are liable to pay the same in the said courts of justice respectively; except where the plaintiffs or complainants in any suit shall reside in foreign countries, or without the limits of this state; in which case the agents or attornies of the said plaintiffs or complainants shall be answerable for the payment of said fees; except the clerks of county courts, whose fees shall be collected as heretofore.

*83

*VI. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all former and other acts for regulating or establishing salaries and fees throughout this state, or in the districts or counties thereof, and every of them, shall be, and the same are hereby repealed. And this act shall be held, deemed and taken as and for a public act, and taken notice of as such without pleading the same, by all judges, justices, magistrates and courts of justice, within this state.

VII. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That this act shall be and continue in force for the term of four years, and from thence to the end of the next meeting and sitting of the legislature.—(Since extended.)

Extract from an act for the abolition of the rights of primogeniture, and for the giving an equitable distribution of the real estate of intestates, and for other purposes therein mentioned.—Passed 19th February, 1791.

Be it enacted by the honourable the senate and house of representatives, now met and sitting in general assembly, and by the authority of the same, That from and after the first day of May next, it shall and may be lawful to and for any person who may be entitled to a distributive share of any estate, real or personal, and shall have arrived to the age of twenty-one years, or be married, to apply by petition to the court of equity or common pleas, (at the option of the party) for a writ of partition, to be directed to certain commissioners, authorizing and requiring them to divide the said estate; and the court shall thereupon issue a writ of partition in the same manner as is directed for the admeasurement of dower, by an act, entitled, "An act for the more easy and expeditious obtaining the admeasurement of dower to widows, of the lands of which their deceased husbands were seized in fee at any time during their marriage." And the commissioners so to be appointed, being first duly sworn, fairly and impartially to discharge their duty, shall proceed to execute the said writ, and return the same to the court. And when the *said estate cannot, in the opinion of the commissioners, be fairly and equally divided between the parties interested therein, without manifest injury to them, or some or one of them, then they shall make a special return of the whole property, and the value thereof truly appraised, and certify their opinion to the court whether it will be most for the benefit of all parties, to deliver over to one or more of the parties interested therein the property which cannot be fairly divided, upon the payment of a sum of money, to be assessed by the said commissioners, or to sell the same at public auction; and the court shall proceed to consider and determine the same: And if it shall appear to the court that it will be for the benefit of all parties interested in the said estate, that the same should be vested in one or more persons entitled to a portion of the same, on the payment of a sum of money, they shall determine accordingly; and the said person or persons, on the payment of the consideration money, shall be vested with the estate so adjudged to them as fully and absolutely as the ancestor was vested. But if it shall appear to the court that it would be more for the interest of the parties that the same should be sold, then they shall direct a sale to be made on such a credit and on such terms as to them shall seem right, and the property so sold, shall stand pledged for the payment of the purchase money.

*84

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the judges of the respective courts shall be, and they are hereby authorized from time to time to make such rules and orders as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying the foregoing clause into effect.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That this act shall commence its operation on the first day of May next, but not sooner.

---

*85

*Extract from an act for establishing an easier and cheaper mode of recovering money secured by mortgage on real estates, and barring the equity of redemption, and for other purposes.—Ratified 19th February, 1791.

Whereas mortgages are generally meant merely as securities for debts, and no actual estate is intended to be conveyed by the mortgagor to the mortgagee; but the mortgaged estate is intended, and ought to be considered only as a pledge for the payment of the principal and interest due on the debt meant to be secured. And whereas, the present mode of foreclosing mortgages of real estates is tedious and expensive, and the right of the mortgagor to his equity of redemption is, in the present mode of exercising that right, attended with inconvenience: Now for the easier and speedier advancement of justice, in obtaining the payment of debts secured by mortgage, and for ascertaining when the equity of redemption of the mortgagor shall be barred:

I. Be it enacted by the honourable the senate and house of representatives, now met and sitting in general assembly, and by the authority of the same, That on judgment being obtained in the court of common pleas on any bond, note or debt, secured by mortgage of real estate, it shall and may be lawful for the judges of the court of common pleas, in case of any judgment having been obtained subsequent to the property's being mortgaged, and prior to the obtaining judgment in the action hereby allowed to be commenced, to order the sale of the mortgaged property for the satisfaction of the monies secured by the said mortgage, and to give a reasonable extension of the time when the sale is to take place, not exceeding the term of six months from the judgment; and also to give a reasonable credit on the sale of the mortgaged premises, not exceeding the term of twelve months from the sale; and the mortgagor shall be forever barred and foreclosed by such sale from his equity of redemption in as complete a manner as if the same had been foreclosed in a court of chancery; any law, usage or custom to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding:

*86

Provided always, That if at any *time before such sale, the mortgagor shall tender to, or pay into the hands of the plaintiff, or his agent or attorney, or to the sheriff, all the principal money and interest meant to be secured by such mortgage, and also all the costs of the suit, the sale shall not take place, but the mortgagee shall enter satisfaction on the said mortgage, and the mortgaged premises shall be for ever exempt from the said mortgage.

II. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That no mortgagee shall be entitled to maintain any possessory action for the real estate mortgaged, even after the time allotted for the payment of the money secured by mortgage is elapsed, but the mortgagor shall be still deemed owner of the land, and the mortgagee as owner of the money lent or due, and shall be entitled to recover satisfaction for the same out of the land in the manner above set forth. Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall extend to any suit or action now pending, or when the mortgagor shall be out of possession, nor to contravene in any way, the ordinance, entitled, "An ordinance to encourage subjects of foreign states to lend money at interest on real estates within this state, nor to deprive any person or persons of any right which he, she or they may have at the time of passing this act.

III. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That where the same lands are mortgaged at divers times, the debts meant to be secured by such mortgages shall be paid in the order the same are recorded agreeably to law, and in no other order; any law, usage or custom to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding.

Extract from an additional act to the act entitled "An act to establish a Court of Equity within this state," passed the 19th February, 1791.—Ratified 20th December, 1791.

(The first section alters the regulations for the times of the sitting of the court of equity, which have been since changed.)

*87

*II. Be it enacted by the honourable the senate and house of representatives, now met and sitting in general assembly, and by the authority of the same, That whenever any person shall be dissatisfied with a judgment at law, and shall think himself relievable in equity, he may, at any time within forty days after the adjournment of the court at which such judgment was obtained, give notice by himself or his attorney, in writing, to the sheriff of the district with whom execution may be lodged, that he means to file his bill in the court of equity, praying for a writ of injunction, and shall annex thereto an affidavit of such intent; and such sheriff, on being served with such notice and affidavit within the said time, whereof he shall make true entry in his books, shall be bound, on receiving security as herein after prescribed, to stay further proceedings on such execution. Provided the said notice and affidavit be served on him before actual sale of the property; and in cases where levies shall have been made on any movable property, the complainant, on giving bond to the sheriff, with two good sureties to be approved by him, subject to the future approbation of the court, in a sum equal to double the real value of the property so levied on, and conditioned to return in good order to such sheriff, the whole of the said property, if the complainant does not procure from the court of equity, and cause to be served on him, a writ of injunction within thirty days from the date of such bond, shall be entitled to receive back and retain all such moveable property; and the said complainant shall be bound to proceed to file his bill and apply for an injunction, according to the rules and practice of the court of equity, within twenty days after giving such bond to said sheriff; and if no writ of injunction issuing out of the court of equity be served on said sheriff within thirty days after his taking said bond, commanding him to stay proceeding in said suit at law, he shall then proceed to seize and again take into his possession said property; and sell the same under the said execution, after giving the legal notice; and if the said complainant shall not forthwith surrender and deliver up such property, the said sheriff shall assign the said bond to the plain*tiff in the suit at law, who may commence suit thereon and proceed to recover from the said defendant at law and his securities, the amount of the penalty of the said bond with costs of suit, in which suits no imparlance shall be allowed.

*88

Extract from an act entitled "An act to enable the circuit court of Georgetown to meet," &c. and for the better advancement of justice in the courts of law and equity, &c.—Ratified 21st December, 1793.

V. Whereas the act entitled, "An act to establish a court of equity within this state," directs that the said court shall sit at Columbia for all causes where the defendant shall reside in Camden, Orangeburgh and Cheraw districts; at Cambridge, for all causes where the defendant shall reside in the district of Ninety-six; and at Charleston, where the defendant shall reside in either of the districts of Charleston, Beaufort or Georgetown; but the said act makes no provision for the trial of causes where there are two or more defendants, some residing in districts ranged under one of said courts, and some in districts ranged under another:

Be it enacted by the honourable the senate and house of representatives, now met and sitting in general assembly, and by the authority of the same, That where there are several defendants, residing in different districts, ranged under different courts, the complainant shall commence and pursue his proceedings in that court which takes cognizance over the districts in which the greatest number of defendants shall reside; but where an equal number of the defendants reside in districts ranged under different courts, the complainant may elect in which of such courts he will commence his proceedings; and the judges of the said court of equity shall and may make all proper and necessary rules for carrying the intention of this clause into effect.

---

*89

*An act to enable trustees to surrender their trusts in the manner therein mentioned. —Ratified the 19th December, 1796.

Whereas doubts exist whether the court of equity have power to permit trustees to resign their trusts, with the consent of the parties entitled to the use of the trust estate, and to substitute other persons to support the trusts:

Be it therefore enacted by the honourable the senate and house of representatives, now met and sitting in general assembly, and by the authority of the same, That in every case of a trust estate, where the person or persons entitled to the use of any property or estate, vested in trust, being of age, or his, her or their guardian, if under age, may be willing to have other trustees substituted, in the room of those in whom the legal estate is vested, or to have any one or more trustees substituted in the room of any one or more of the first or former trustees, the court of equity shall be, and they are hereby authorized to permit such one or more of the first or former trustees, to surrender his, her or their trust, and to appoint such one or more trustees, in his, her or their room, as to the court of equity may appear fit, proper and advisable; and the trustee or trustees so appointed and substituted, shall then be considered to all intents and purposes, as vested completely and absolutely with all the estate, right, title, interest, powers, privileges and authority, and as liable to all the conditions, terms and restrictions as that trustee or those trustees were vested with or liable to, in whose stead, room or place, he, she or they may be so appointed or substituted: and the first or former trustee or trustees, shall be therefrom completely exonerated and discharged. Provided always, That a certificate of such appointment and substitution shall be endorsed by the register or commissioner in equity, upon the original trust deed, if the trust be created by deed, and the deed can be found, and that such a certificate shall be annexed to the original will, if the trust be created by will, and be lodged therewith, in the office where the will may be lodged, and that such a certificate shall also be recorded in the secretary's *office, or other office wherever the deed or will may be recorded or lodged, or ought to be recorded or lodged.

*90

Extracts from an act, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled an act to establish an uniform and more convenient system of judicature."—Ratified the 21st December, 1799.

(The first twenty-three sections have no relation to the court of equity.)

XXIV. Be it enacted by the honourable the senate and house of representatives, now met and sitting in general assembly, and by authority of the same, That so much of an act passed the twentieth December, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, as relates to the times and places of holding the courts of equity for Charleston, Columbia and Cambridge, be, and the same is hereby repealed.

(The twenty-fifth section regulates the times of the sittings of the court of equity, which are since altered.)

XXVI. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the sheriffs of the districts within the respective limits of which said courts shall be held, are enjoined and required to execute, or cause to be executed by his lawful deputies, all process from the court of equity in the several districts belonging to its jurisdiction as aforesaid; and that he shall attend, or cause his lawful deputy so to do, the said court of equity during the time of its sitting; that two of the said chancellors shall attend at each court of equity hereby established.

XXVII. And be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all causes of equitable cognizance, arising within any of the districts of this state, shall be tried and determined in the jurisdiction or circuits herein before described and marked out, and that commissioners in equity and registers shall be appointed for each of the said equity circuits or districts, in the manner prescribed by an act passed on the nineteenth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, entitled, "An act to establish a court of equity in this state."

*91

*(The subsequent clauses of this act not applicable to the court of equity.)

An act for the better arrangement of the sittings of the Courts of Equity; for the establishment of a Court of Appeals for the same, and for other purposes therein mentioned.—Passed the 15th December, 1808.

Be it enacted by the honourable the senate and house of representatives, now met and sitting in general assembly, and by the authority of the same, That the state shall be divided into three circuits for the court of equity, to wit: the southern, the northern and the western; that the present common pleas districts of Charleston, Colleton, and Beaufort, united, shall form the southern circuit of the court of equity; that the present common pleas districts of Georgetown, Horry, Marion, Williamsburgh, Darlington, Marlborough, Chesterfield, Lancaster, Kershaw, Sumter, Fairfield, Richland and Lexington, united, shall form the northern circuit of the court of equity; and the present common pleas districts of Orangeburgh, Barnwell, Edgefield, Abbeville, Pendleton, Greenville, Spartanburgh, Union, York, Chester, Laurens, and Newberry, united, shall form the western circuit of the court of equity.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the districts of Charleston, Colleton, and Beaufort, united shall form one equity district, to be called Charleston district, the courts for which shall sit at Charleston court-house on the third Monday of February and the first Monday of November in every year; that the districts of Georgetown, Horry, Marion, and Williamsburgh, united, shall form one other equity district, to be called Georgetown district; and the districts of Orangeburgh and Barnwell, united, shall form one other equity district, to be called Orangeburgh district; the courts of Georgetown and Orangeburgh districts shall be held at Georgetown and Orangeburgh court-houses on the first Mondays of February and June in every year; that the districts of Darlington, Marlborough and Chesterfield, united, shall *form one other equity district, to be called Cheraw district; and the districts of Edgefield, Abbeville and Pendleton, united, shall form one other equity district, to be called Ninety-six district: the courts of Cheraw and Ninety-six shall be held at Cheraw and Abbeville court-houses on the second Mondays of February and June in every year; that the districts of Lancaster, Kershaw, and Sumter, united, shall form one other equity district, to be called Camden district; and the districts of Greenville, Laurens and Newberry, united, shall form one other equity district, to be called Washington district: the courts for the districts of Camden and Washington shall be held at Kershaw and Laurens court-houses on the third Mondays of February and June in every year; that the districts of Fairfield, Richland and Lexington, united, shall form one other equity district, to be called Columbia district; and the districts of Spartanburgh, Union, York, and Chester, shall form one other equity district, to be called Pinckney district: the courts for Columbia and Pinckney districts shall be held at Richland and Union court-houses on the fourth Mondays of February and June in every year.

*92

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That one of the judges of the court of equity is hereby authorized and required to attend at the several times and places above mentioned, and to hold the courts of equity for the several districts hereby established; and that the orders and decrees of the said judges, in all cases wherein appeals shall not be made to the courts of appeals hereinafter established, shall have the same effect with decrees sanctioned by the courts of appeal.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That a court of appeal for the court of equity, shall be, and the same is hereby established; which said court shall exercise appellate jurisdiction in all cases brought up from the circuit, and shall be holden at Charleston court-house for the southern circuit, on the first Monday in January, and on the second Monday in March in every year, and at Richland court-house for the northern and western circuits, on the first Tuesday next after the ending of the common pleas circuits in every spring and fall of the *year; and it shall be the duty of all of the judges of the court of equity to attend at the said courts of appeal, and to hear and try all appeals that may be brought up from the circuits hereby annexed to the said courts respectively.

*93

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That any person who wishes to appeal from any order or decree of any judge presiding on the circuit, shall, before the rising of the court at which such order or decree is made, state in writing, the grounds upon which he intends to appeal, and deliver the same to the said judge, and serve the opposite party, or his solicitor, with a notice thereto annexed, that he intends to appeal from the said order or decree at the next court of appeals for the said circuit, and that the said appellant shall thereafter be at liberty to move to have copies of all the necessary papers sent up to the court of appeals, and to place his cause upon the docket of the same at any time before the sitting of the court, without being subject to any other rules or forms heretofore adopted.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That it shall hereafter be in the power of any one judge in equity, in chambers, to make orders of reference to the master or commissioner, in any cause depending in the court of equity, which is ready for a reference, before the final hearing of the same: Provided the party applying for such reference, shall have given ten days notice to the opposite party, of the time and place, and judge, before whom he means to make a motion for such reference.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That it shall be the duty of the judges in equity to make all further rules and regulations which may be necessary to carry this act and all former acts respecting the said court more fully into effect.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all papers appertaining or relating to causes in the court of equity, which have heretofore arisen in those districts by this act comprehended in Columbia district, shall be transferred to the office of the commissioner of the said district; and that a commissioner in equity shall *be appointed as heretofore by the governor, for the said district, who shall exercise all the powers of master and register in equity, both for the circuit court and the court of appeals to be holden at Richland court-house, as by this act is directed.

*94

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the sheriff of Richland, for the time being, is hereby authorized and required to exercise all the duties of a sheriff in the court of equity, both for the district of Columbia and the court of appeals hereby established at Richland court-house.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That in addition to the present number of judges of that court, there shall be elected two judges, who shall be commissioned in the same manner, and perform the same services as the present judges of the said court.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all the judges of the court of equity, who shall be hereafter appointed, shall receive the same salaries as the judges of the courts of common pleas and sessions are at present entitled to receive by law.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all writs of subpœna ad respondendum, issuing out of the said court of equity, shall require the defendant or defendants to appear in the said court on a day certain, and shall also require the defendant or defendants to file his, her or their plea, answer or demurrer, within thirty days next after the day so appointed and expressed in the said writ for his, her or their appearance as aforesaid, and that the said writ shall be served at least ten days before the appearance day therein expressed.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the master or commissioner of the said court, or one of the judges in chambers, shall have power, on good cause shewn on oath, to extend the said time to plead, answer or demur, for such period as shall be deemed necessary: Provided the same does not extend beyond the time appointed for docketing the causes for the next court in the district where the cause may be depending in which such order for extension is made.

*95

*And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That in case the said defendant or defendants shall not file his, her or their plea, answer or demurrer, within the time limited as aforesaid, for the same to be filed, that the register or commissioner of the court where the cause may be depending, shall, at the expiration of the said time, grant an order that the bill shall be taken pro confesso; and unless the said order shall be set aside as hereinafter directed, the court shall make such decree therein as to the said court shall appear just and equitable, and issue the process necessary to enforce the extenuation or compel the performance of the said decree.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That whenever an order shall be granted as aforesaid, that the bill shall be taken pro confesso, the court shall have power, on application of the defendant or defendants, to set aside the same on such terms as the said court may prescribe.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That whenever there shall be granted as aforesaid, an order that the bill shall be taken pro confesso, on application of the complainant or his solicitor, stating that the answer of the defendant or defendants is necessary to enable the court to pronounce their final decree, the commissioner or register shall issue an attachment against the said defendant or defendants, to compel such answer in the usual form; and that no previous rule, requiring the said defendant or defendants to shew cause why such attachment should not issue, shall be necessary.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the master of the court of equity shall, in all cases arising or pending within the equity district of Charleston aforesaid, have the same power and authority as a judge at chambers, to grant order for writs of ne exeat and attachment, in all cases of practice, and that the commissioners in equity, in the several other districts, shall, in all cases arising or pending within their respective districts, have power to issue writs of ne exeat and attachments, in all like cases, without any previous order, upon such evidence and under such circumstances as *would authorize a judge at chambers to make orders therefor.

*96

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all acts or parts of acts, usages and customs repugnant to this act, be, and the same are hereby repealed.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That from and immediately after the passing of this act, there shall be no other or higher fees taken in any suit in the court of equity than the following, viz.

Master and commissioner in equity's fees.—For every summons, thirty-seven and a half cents; taking every affidavit in writing, twenty-five cents; for every oath administered, six and a quarter cents; taking every recognizance, forty cents; taking the oaths for every defendant to answer, out of office, and attendance, one dollar; for every attendance in office on a reference by order of court, on the summons of either party, or their solicitors, seventy-five cents; hearing and determining any contested matter, or order thereon, other than by order of reference, one dollar; making up and returning every report into court, but only one report to be charged in each suit, three dollars; commissions on sales under decrees of the court, two and a half per cent. for the first hundred, and one per cent. on all sums above; for drawing each set of conveyances, five dollars.

Register and commissioner in equity's fees.—For affixing the seal of the court to subpœna or other writ, and signing the same, twenty-five cents; for affidavit of service of subpœna or other writ, twenty-five cents; for examining witnesses and taking down their depositions, nine cents per copy sheet; exemplifications of proceedings in any cause, if required, nine cents per copy sheet; for all other office copies, if required, nine cents per copy sheet; a copy sheet to consist of ninety words; for every search, twelve and a half cents; but not more than one dollar for all searches which may be necessary in any cause; for entering every cause for hearing, twelve and a half cents; examining decree, affixing seal thereto, and attending the judges in court to sign certificates of examination, one dollar; notifications to *insert in gazette by order of court, and attendance on printer, thirty-one and one quarter cents; for affixing every seal, and signing every commission to take answers and examine witnesses, or for other purposes, fifty cents.

*97

Solicitors' Fees in Equity,—Complainant's Solicitor.—Preparing and filing a bill in equity, with all necessary exhibits, twenty dollars; drawing interrogatories in chief for complainant's witnesses, and cross interrogatories, drawing and engrossing commissions, and attending to strike commissioners where necessary, with proper instructions, ten dollars; arguing exceptions on points of law, before the master, or judge at chambers, where necessary, and attending thereon, including all charges incidental thereto, five dollars; for making and serving the briefs on the circuit judge, five dollars; and on the judges of appeal, ten dollars; drawing and engrossing decree, per copy sheet of ninety words, nine cents.

Defendant's Solicitor.—For preparing and filing defendant's answer, and all necessary exhibits, twenty dollars; drawing interrogatories in chief for defendant's witnesses, drawing and engrossing cross interrogatories and commissions, attending to strike commissioners, attending where necessary with instructions, ten dollars; arguing exceptions on points of law, before the master, or judges at chambers, when necessary, including notices, attendance, and all incidental charges relative thereto, five dollars; for making and serving briefs on the circuit judge, five dollars; and on the judges of appeal, ten dollars; drawing and engrossing decree, per copy sheet of ninety words, nine cents; for drawing and presenting any petition, and all exhibits which may relate thereto, and briefs if necessary, ten dollars.

And be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the foregoing list of fees shall be, and the same is hereby established by law; and that if any of the officers therein mentioned, shall take or receive any or greater reward for the services therein mentioned, or shall invent or contrive any other or further fee or reward for any of the said services, with intent to evade this law, then and in every such case, the person or persons so offending, upon due *proof and conviction, shall forfeit and pay the sum of two hundred dollars for each and every such offence, one half to the informer, and the other half to the state.

*98

And be it enacted, That no charge shall be allowed for copies not actually granted.

Extracts from an act to vest in the Court of Common Pleas, the powers appertaining to and exercised by the Courts of Equity, as to the appointment of guardians, so far as may relate to the rights of minors in any estate to be divided under the act passed in the year of our Lord 1791, and for other purposes.—Passed 17th December, 1808.

Whereas by an act entitled, an act for the abolition of the rights of primogeniture, for giving an equal distribution of the real estates of intestates, and for other purposes therein mentioned, passed the nineteenth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety one, the estate of intestates may be divided by an application to the court of common pleas: And whereas the rights of minors are often involved in such divisions, and no sufficient powers vested in the said courts of common pleas to protect the said rights of minors:

Be it therefore enacted by the honourable the senate and house of representatives, now met and sitting in general assembly, and by the authority of the same, That all the power and authority appertaining to and exercised by the court of equity, as to the appointment of guardians of the persons and estates of minors, be, and the same is hereby vested in the judges of the courts of common pleas, or either of them, holding such court, as far as the rights of minors may be concerned in any real or personal property, to be divided under the said act of assembly, passed on the nineteenth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety one; as well as all other acts, relative to the partition of estates, real or personal, together with all other powers necessary for carrying into effect the above recited act; any law, usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

*99

*II. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That whenever it shall be necessary to bring any prisoner into court, as a witness in any case, it shall be lawful for the presiding judge to order such prisoner to be brought into court, without the necessity of a writ of habeas corpus; and when the said prisoner shall have given his evidence, to cause him to be remanded to the custody of the officer to whose keeping he shall have been originally committed; any law, usage or custom to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding.

III. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the judges of the court of common pleas shall be, and they are hereby declared, in all cases of idiocy or lunacy which may hereafter occur, to be vested with jurisdiction concurrent with that exercised in like cases by the judges of the court of equity; and the judges of the several circuit courts of this state, be, and they are hereby declared to be vested with the like powers and authority which the judges of the court of equity, by law, or by the style, usage and practice of the court of equity, now have and exercise, either as to inquiring into the lunacy or idiocy of any lunatic or idiot, or as to the appointment of guardians of the person or property of such lunatic or idiot, according to the usage and practice of the court of equity in like cases.

V. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That in all cases which may hereafter arise, or be now depending, wherein the rights of the state may be involved, it shall be the duty of the persons claiming under the state, to call on the attorney-general or solicitors, in their respective districts, to defend the right of the state; on failure whereof, the record of such case shall not be adduced as evidence to substantiate any claim against the state.

VII. And be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, That it shall in future be the duty of the sheriff to serve all writs of subpœna which may be delivered to them for service, and that they shall be entitled to receive the same fees therefore as for the service of summary processes, and mileage on each ticket.

---

*100

*An act establishing a Court of Equity in and for the district of Beaufort, and for other purposes.—Passed the 19th December, 1810.

Whereas sundry inhabitants of Beaufort district have, by their petition to the legislature, represented the great inconveniences they suffer from their remote situation from the court of equity:

I. Be it enacted by the honourable the senate and house of representatives, now met and sitting in general assembly, and by the authority of the same, That from and after the passing of this act, the district of Beaufort shall constitute an equity district, in the southern equity circuit.

II. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That one of the judges of the court of equity is hereby authorized and required to attend and to hold a court of equity at Coosawhatchie court-house, on the last Monday of January and May in each year, for the trial of all causes of equitable cognizance arising within the district, subject to the same rules and regulations that the courts of equity in other districts in this state are by law subject to: Provided nevertheless, that the said court shall not continue its sittings longer than six days at any one time.

III. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That a commissioner in equity, having all the powers, and being liable to perform all the duties of a master and register in equity, be immediately appointed by the governor, who shall give bond with two sureties, to be approved of by the governor, in the sum of four hundred dollars, for the faithful performance of the duties of his office.

IV. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the sheriff of Beaufort district for the time being, is hereby authorized and required, to attend upon the said court, and to exercise all the duties of a sheriff in the court of equity.

V. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all suits which have arisen in Beaufort district, and been commenced in the court of equity in Charleston, and all papers appertaining or relating thereto, shall be *transferred to the office of the commissioner in equity for Beaufort district.

*101

VI. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the first court to be holden under this act, shall be holden on the last Monday in May next.

And whereas doubts have been expressed whether the court of equity can continue any cause in the said court for a longer time than three years, even with the consent of the parties:

VIII. Be it therefore enacted, That the said court of equity may, and they are hereby authorized to continue any cause depending in the said court for a longer term than three years, by consent of the said parties; and without such consent, on good and sufficient cause shewn, in any case where there shall have been pronounced any decretal order within the term of three years from the time of filing the bill.

X. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the courts of equity and appeals shall be holden in Charleston, at the times following, instead of the times now established by law, that is to say: the court of equity to sit on the third Monday in February, and the court of appeals on the second Monday in March; any law to the contrary hereof notwithstanding.

XI. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all acts or parts of acts repugnant to this act, be, and the same are hereby repealed.

Extracts of an act for regulating the courts held by the associate judges of this state, at the conclusion of their respective circuits, and of the courts of appeals held by the judges of the court of equity within this state, and for other purposes therein mentioned.—Passed December, 1811.

Whereas, in and by an act of the general assembly of this state, passed on the fifteenth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and eight, entitled, "An act for the arrangement of the sitting of the courts of equity, *for the establishment of a court of appeals for the same," &c. such courts of appeals have been established, to be holden at Charleston court-house and at Richland court-house. And it is thereby declared to be the duty of all the judges of the court of equity, to attend at the said courts of appeal, and to hear and to try all appeals that may be brought up to the said courts respectively; but that the suitors of the said courts of equity, and others, may know the grounds and reasons whereon the decision of the said courts of appeals shall be made:

*102

IV. Be it enacted by the honourable the senate and house of representatives, now met and sitting in general assembly, and by the authority of the same, That the grounds and reasons on which the decisions on those appeals respectively shall be made by the said judges, shall be given and subscribed by them in writing, and shall be recorded at Charleston, by the register of the court of equity there, who shall also be register of the court of appeals so as aforesaid directed to be held at Charleston court-house; and at Columbia, by the commissioner of the court of equity for Columbia district, who shall also be register of the court of appeals, so as aforesaid directed to be held at Richland court-house, and who shall respectively keep proper books for that purpose, which shall be indexed in such a manner that the decisions therein recorded, shall be promptly and readily come at; which books shall be furnished at the public expense, and belong to the public as the property thereof; and the registers of the said courts of appeal, shall be entitled to fees for their services therein, which shall be regulated as near as may be by the fees allowed for similar services to the register and commissioner of the courts of equity.

And whereas, by the act of the general assembly last aforesaid, the court of equity for Charleston district was directed to be held at Charleston court-house, on the third Monday in February, and the first Monday in November in every year; and the court of appeals was directed to be held there on the first Monday in January, and on the second Monday in March in every year. But by an act, entitled, "An act establishing a court of equity *for the district of Beaufort," &c. passed on the nineteenth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and ten, it is enacted, that the courts of equity and appeal shall be holden in Charleston, at the times following, instead of the times theretofore established by law, that is to say: the court of equity to sit on the third Monday in February, and the court of appeals on the second Monday in March; and as it is manifestly an error as to the last mentioned regulation:

*103

V. Be it therefore enacted, That the said regulations, as far as respects the times of the sitting of the said courts, be hereby repealed, and that hereafter the court of equity for Charleston district shall be held at Charleston court-house aforesaid, on the third Monday in February, and on the second Monday in November in every year; and that the said court of appeals shall be held there on the first Monday in January, and on the second Monday in March in every year; the said law, or any other law, to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding.

An act for appointing an additional commissioner in equity, for the court of equity in Charleston, and for other purposes therein mentioned.—Passed December, 1813.

Whereas much inconvenience has arisen to the suitors and others in the court of equity of Charleston district, by reason of the great increase of business in that court, and of there being but one master of the same; and whereas the business of the said court is greatly impeded thereby:

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives, now met in general assembly, That a commissioner in equity shall be appointed, who, as well as the present master, shall exercise all the powers and authorities of, and perform all the duties incident to the office of the said master, and be entitled to receive for his services the same fees and compensations as are allowed by law to the master of the said court: and the said commissioner in equity shall give the same security for the faithful dis*charge of his duty as is now required to be given by the master in equity for Charleston.

*104

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the judge presiding in the said court shall be, and he is hereby authorized to apportion the business of the said court now performed by the master, between the said master and commissioner, in such manner as shall appear to him most proper to expedite the same and best promote the interest of the said suitors and others, in the said court: Provided always, that when the parties interested shall agree to refer their business either to the master or commissioner aforesaid, as they may choose, on application being made to the judge aforesaid, he shall be and is hereby required to permit them so to do, unless he should for some substantial reason think it expedient to refuse such permission.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That in case of any clashing or interference between the master and commissioner in equity in the exercise of the powers, and in the performance of the duties of their respective offices, the judges of the said court shall be, and they are hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as shall prevent the same in future, and shall be necessary to carry into effect this act, and the purposes intended thereby.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all registers and commissioners in equity who are or shall hereafter be appointed, shall respectively execute a bond with good and sufficient securities to the state of South Carolina, in the sum of twenty thousand dollars, for the faithful performance of the duties of their respective offices of registers and commissioners in equity, and that such bonds shall be taken in the several districts throughout this state by the commissioners appointed to take bonds and securities from the sheriffs of the several districts of this state, which said bonds shall be transmitted and deposited as heretofore directed by law.

---

*105

*An act to establish a Court of Equity for Edgefield district. Passed 21st December, 1814.

Be it enacted by the honourable the senate and house of representatives, now met and sitting in general assembly, and by the authority of the same, That hereafter there shall be held by some one of the judges of the courts of equity, at Edgefield court-house, for Edgefield district, on the first Monday of February and June in each year, a court of equity, to hear and determine all causes and matters cognizable in a court of equity, and which may arise in said district; which said court of equity shall continue to sit one week, if necessary to finish the business of the same; and the said court of equity so established, shall exercise all the powers and jurisdiction now exercised by the courts of equity of this state.

And it be further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That a commissioner in equity for the said district of Edgefield, shall be appointed in the same manner as other commissioners in equity are by law appointed, and he shall be required to give the same security, perform the same duties, and exercise the same powers; and that immediately after said appointment, he shall receive from the commissioner in equity for Ninety-six district, all papers and records which may relate to any business or suits already commenced or determined, wherein the parties defendants are resident in the said district of Edgefield; and it shall be the duty of the said commissioner of Ninety-six district, to deliver all and every such paper or record accordingly.

And it be further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the sheriff of Edgefield district, for the time being, shall attend the courts of equity in said district, and shall have the same powers, and perform the same duties, as the sheriffs of other districts wherein courts of equity are already established.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the commissioners in equity, except the commissioner in equity of Cheraw district, shall keep their respective offices at the town or village where such courts *shall be held, on Tuesday and Friday in each and every week. And should any commissioner in equity neglect to attend at their respective offices on the days aforementioned in each and every week, he shall forfeit and pay to the clerk of the board of commissioners of the poor, for the use of the poor in the district in which he shall reside, the sum of five dollars; to be recovered by complaint and proof thereof made before any justice of the quorum, according to the rules of common law, which fines and forfeitures shall not be recovered if the commissioner shall make it appear to the satisfaction of the justice that such neglect was in consequence of indisposition or other unavoidable accident.

*106

Extract from an act entitled an act to postpone the meeting of the Court of Appeals at Columbia, &c. &c.—Passed 15th December, 1815.

Be it enacted, That the fall meeting of the court of appeals in equity in Columbia, shall hereafter be held at Columbia on the second Tuesday next after the ending of the common pleas circuits in November, instead of the first Tuesday, as heretofore, so as to enable the judge who holds the circuit court of equity in Charleston to prolong the sitting of the said court in November, until the period hereby required by law for the meeting of the court of appeals in Columbia.

Extract of an act entitled, an act for the prevention of frivolous appeals.—Ratified 13th December, 1815.

Be it enacted, That on any appeal to be made from the decision of any circuit court of law or equity within this state, if the decision shall be against the appellant, or he shall withdraw his appeal, interest on the amount recovered shall be allowed, at the rate of seven per cent. from the day the verdict or decree was given, to the time when such appeal shall be dismissed or withdrawn.

And be it further enacted, That the amount of the interest hereby allowed, shall be endorsed on the back of the execution, and collected by the sheriff with the original debt.

REPORTS OF CASES

ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE

COURT OF CHANCERY IN THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA

FROM SEPTEMBER, 1784

1 Desaus. *107

*The first sitting of the court of chancery, erected by the act of the legislature, of the 21st day of March, 1784, was at Charleston, on the 14th day of June, 1784, and was continued for several days successively. There were present the three judges who had been then recently elected by the legislature—John Rutledge, Richard Hutson and John Mathews: Alexander Moultrie, attorney general; William Hasell Gibbes, master in equity; and William Fraser, register.

Many petitions were presented, and much business of course was transacted, but no causes were heard, and no decisions made, which involved any principle of importance.

Present—John Rutledge, Richard Hutson, and John Mathews.

Many petitions were presented, and much business of course transacted. Many important causes were brought on, in some of which orders of reference to the master were made, with instructions to guide him; and in others decretal orders were made establishing and deciding the rights of the parties litigating. But decretal orders were at that time made without stating in writing the reasons of the court or the grounds of the decision: so that little information can be drawn from a number of the earlier cases. But the various applications made to the justice of the court, and the orders made upon them, are well *calculated to shew the nature of the business brought into the court, as well as the mode of transacting it: and the knowledge of which will, it is supposed, be useful to young practitioners.

*108

1 Desaus. 108

Case. I.

In the case of HUNTER and Others v. BOYKIN.

(September, 1784.)

[Judgment ⇦416.]

[Where a judgment was recovered upon a contract made during the Revolutionary War, chancery restrained the plaintiff from enforcing the judgment, in order to give the defendant the benefit of the act for the depreciation of the paper currency.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 787; Dec. Dig. ⇦416.]

This was a bill filed by the complainant to obtain an injunction against a judgment at law, which Boykin had recovered against the complainants, on a contract made during the revolutionary war, when the paper money, then in circulation, was greatly depreciated. The legislature had passed an act, on the 16th March, 1783, entitled, "An ordinance for settling a depreciation table."† By this act it was ordained, that the table of depreciation, annexed to the act, stating the progressive depreciation of the paper currency monthly, from the month of May 1777, to the month of May 1780, should "be the rule for the determination of all differences which may arise on any contracts which have been made in this state, by any private persons, and which still subsist." And that "in the settlement of the depreciation on such contracts, the value of the money shall be fixed at the time the contract was made, and not at the time the contract was to have been fulfilled."

To prevent the enforcement of the judgment at law, on the nominal amount of the debt, and to have the benefit of the depreciation act, was the object of the bill of the complainant.

Upon the hearing of the case, the court ordered, "that the debt in this case be liquidated by the master according to the table of depreciation, and that on payment of the balance of the debt and costs at law, and of this suit, the defendant Boykin acknowledge satisfaction on the judgment obtained by him against the complainants."††

† Public Laws, p. 325, 326.

†† Although the depreciation act speaks only of contracts, it was extended by construction, and upon the reason of the thing, to legacies, and all other transactions arising during the progress of the depreciation of the paper currency: and payments made during depreciation were also reduced by the scale established by law. In the case of Ro*berts v. the executors of Cattell, the complainant sought by his bill the payment of a legacy bequeathed to him by the will of William Cattell. A large payment had been made to the complainant Roberts, on the legacy, during the time of depreciation. In the settlement, the court ordered that the sum so paid should be reduced by the scale of depreciation. The debts and credits in executors' accounts were also subjected to the scale of depreciation.—See the case of De Brahm & others v. the executors of Fenwicke. Register's book, No. 1, p. 20.

*109

1 Desaus. *109

*Case II.

Present—Judges Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

DINCKLE and Wife v. TIMROD and Others.

(December, 1784.)

[Partition ⇐=39.]

[Chancery has jurisdiction to decree a partition of land.]

[Ed. Note. For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 93; Dec. Dig. ⇐=39.]

[Partition ⇐=77.]

[Cited in Pell v. Ball, 1 Rich. Eq. 387; Chalmers v. Jones, 23 S. C. 469; Holley v. Glover, 36 S. C. 419, 15 S. E. 605, 16 L. R. A. 776, 31 Am. St. Rep. 883, to the point that the court of chancery has power to order a sale of land in partition.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 211; Dec. Dig. ⇐=77.]

Bill and answers read with exhibits, whereupon ordered that the country lands be divided by commissioners, or any three of them, into five equal parts or shares, for the benefit of the children of Michael Muckenfuss, and the representatives of his son Andrew: and that the lands in Charleston be sold by the master after six weeks public notice on a credit of two years, (subject to the claim of Catharine Friend) on interest, and security to be approved by the master, for the benefit of the complainant, and the other children of the said Michael Muckenfuss. †

† It will be seen by this case, that the partition of real estates, is within the jurisdiction of the court of equity in South Carolina. And the power of ordering sales, where a division cannot be made advantageously, or where the land is unproductive to the children, is of very great importance in a country where landed property is held by almost every man, and is transferred from hand to hand, with the facility of personal estate; and which is very frequently uncultivated, and unproductive of any immediate revenue, though of increasing value.

1 Desaus. 109

Case III.

JOHN GLAZE v. CHARLES and JOHN DRAYTON.

(December, 1784.)

[Specific Performance ⇐=24.]

Decree for specific performance against the representatives of one of the contracting parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. ⇐=24.]

The object of complainant's bill was to obtain specific performance of a contract for the purchase of land, made by him with William Henry Drayton, the father of the defendant John, who was his heir at law, and the brother of defendant Charles, who was his administrator. The decretal order of the court is as follows:

Bill and answer read, whereupon ordered, that the defendant John Drayton execute titles in fee simple to the *complainant, for the land in bill mentioned, on his paying to defendant Charles, as administrator of said William H. Drayton, interest from the 26th January, 1782, on the balance of the purchase money of the said land, and giving bond with security to be approved by the master for payment of the said balance and remaining interest, by instalments, at the times mentioned in the acts of assembly respecting the recovery of old debts; † and that the defendant's costs be paid by complainant; and that the said minor (John Drayton) have six months after coming of age, to shew cause against the decree.

*110

† The legislature, in consideration of the distressed state of the country, after the war, had passed an act, preventing the immediate recovery of debts, and fixing certain periods for the payment of debts, far beyond the periods fixed by the contract of the parties. These interferences with private contracts, became very common with most of the state legislatures, even after the distresses arising from the war had ceased in a great degree. They produced distrust and irritation throughout the community, to such an extent, that new troubles were apprehended; and nothing contributed more to prepare the public mind for giving up a portion of the state sovereignty, and adopting an efficient national government, than these abuses of power by the state legislatures.

1 Desaus. 110

Case IV.

MILLER v. CAPE and Others.

(December, 1784.)

Compensation for dower. Vide post for report.

Bill and answer read, whereupon ordered, that on payment of one hundred and sixty pounds by the complainant to the defendant Mary Miller, an injunction do issue to stay proceedings at law: and that it be referred to the master to state and report the present value of the said Mary Miller's dower in the estate of the said Stephen Miller, and what is a reasonable compensation for her not having hitherto received any satisfaction for the same; and in what shares or proportions respectively the said sums should be rated or charged on the complainant and such of the defendants as in justice and equity are liable to pay the same.

1 Desaus. *111

*Case V.

Mrs. MILLER v. Executors of MILLER and Others.

(December, 1784.)

Vide ante. Allowance for dower, in money, with interest.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Gibson v. Marshall, 5 Rich. Eq. 260.]

The master's report was read, whereupon ordered, that the master's report be confirmed, and that the executors pay the seventy pounds sterling, assessed (as dower) with interest from the 23d November, 1783, in March next. That the defendants, Bernard Beckman and Thomas Harvey pay one-third of the money assessed on the respective sums due by them, with interest, and give bond with security for the remainder, payable the first day of January, 1786, with interest: And that the executors do pay all the costs at law and in equity.

1 Desaus. 111

Case VI.

DE BRAHM and Others v. Executors of FENWICK.

(December, 1784.)

[Wills ⟸826.]

The court ordered estates devised to a son, to be sold, to pay legacies charged on it; and to reimburse estate for property taken away by the legatee and devisee.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Williams v. McCardell, 14 S. C. 222.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 2128–2138; Dec. Dig. ⟸826.]

Ordered that the master's report be confirmed, except in the following particulars. Several unimportant particulars are stated in the order, but there were two of a peculiar kind which merit notice. The testator had left a large estate, and a numerous family, consisting of a widow and many children, some of whom were adults, and some of them minors. During the troubles and confusion of the war, Thomas and Edward Fenwick, two of the testator's sons and legatees, had taken and removed some of the negroes of the estate, and appropriated and disposed of them to their own use. They then went and remained out of the jurisdiction of the court.

Upon this part of the case the court ordered, "that so much of Thomas Fenwick's estate (under his father's will) be sold as will be sufficient to satisfy the proportion that is to be raised out of it to pay the portions of his sisters, charged on it by their father's will, and to compensate the loss the estate of the testator has sustained by negroes and other property taken away by him. Ordered that the master do enquire and ascertain the loss the estate has met with by Edward Fenwick's having taken away some of the negroes, and other property belonging to the said estate, and report thereon next March."

1 Desaus. *112

*Case VII.

CLARKE v. TODD.—Vide post.

(December, 1784.)

Issue directed to try a fact.

Bill and answer read, with exhibits, and counsel heard on both sides: Whereupon ordered, that the honourable judges of the court of common pleas be requested to direct a jury of merchants to be impannelled to ascertain whether John Todd did ship from Bermuda in the year 1781, on board a ship the British Grenadier, captain Cheney, any and what quantity of rum; and whether said John Todd did consign any and what part thereof to defendant, S. Clarke, at Charleston; and that said judges be requested to certify the verdict of said jury in the premises to this court.

1 Desaus. 112

Case VIII.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

TODD v. CLARKE.

(December, 1784.)

Decree for an account according to the finding of the jury.

On reading the certificate from the justices of the court of common pleas, ordered, that it be referred to the master to state and report the account between complainant and defendant, charging complainant with the nett proceeds of the goods, sold by him for defendant, and charging the defendant with the value of the rum shipped to him by complainant, as found by the verdict on the issue at law, which was directed by the court.

1 Desaus. 112

Case IX.

In the case of the master's report, HAIG and Others v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF CONFISCATED ESTATES.

(December, 1784.)

[Judicial Sales ⟸28.]

Attachment for non-compliance with terms of sale.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Pope v. Frazee, 5 S. C. 271.

For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. ⟸28.]

[Judicial Sales ⟸28.]

[Cited in Peake v. Young, 40 S. C. 55, 18 S. E. 237, to the point that a purchaser may be ordered to show cause why he has not complied with the terms of a judicial sale.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. ⇐28.]

It was ordered, (a rule having been before taken out,) that an attachment do peremptorily issue against James Neilson, unless the term of sale are complied with in three weeks from this time.

---

1 Desaus. 112

Case X.

BROWN and Wife v. Executors of WILLIAM CATTELL.

(December, 1784.)

[Executors and Administrators ⇐295.]

Order for payment of legacies, on giving bond to refund.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1187; Dec. Dig. ⇐295.]

Ordered, that the master's report be confirmed, and that the executors assign to the complainant, in right of *his wife, (who was the widow and legatee of the testator,) bonds to the amount of £8775 1s. 10d. and that the complainant give bond with security to be approved by the master to refund in proportion to the legacies bequeathed to his wife by the will of the late William Cattell, in case other debts against the estate shall hereafter appear; and for the payment of £3000 on the death of the wife, (given to her for life,) to the executors of the said William Cattell: That the costs of this suit be paid by the said executors out of the assets in their hands.†

*113

† In this case the court was induced to authorize the payment of large legacies before the debts of the testator were paid, or fully known. The estate was known by all concerned to be very large, and no apprehensions were entertained by the executors, the counsel, or by the court, that the estate would be unable to pay its debts, after the large appropriation of its funds for legacies. But from various causes this actually happened; and it furnishes a strong caution, never to sanction the division of an estate, or the payment of legacies, till the debts are paid or completely secured.

---

1 Desaus. 113

Case XI.

ANONYMOUS.

(March, 1785.)

Decree ordering a settlement; and protecting wife in living apart.

[Husband and Wife ⇐12.]

[At the suit of a wife, her husband was ordered to give bond to keep the peace, and also to settle on her, subject to her disposition, certain property descended to her, and to allow her children free access to her when she should wish to see them.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 58; Dec. Dig. ⇐12.]

"Ordered, that the defendant enter into recognizance to the master for £1000 with two sureties for £500 each, for keeping the peace towards the complainant (his wife;) and that the defendant be enjoined from proceeding at law against any person for receiving or entertaining her. That the estate which devolved to complainant on the death of her brother, be settled by defendant to the use of complainant and her children, and subject to her disposition amongst them; and that the defendant execute the necessary deeds before the master for conveying the same to ———— as trustees, for the purpose aforesaid: That it be referred to the master to examine into the value of the estate which defendant obtained on marriage with complainant, and of the defendant's estate, and to report thereon: That the complainant have free access to her children; that they be allowed to visit her when she shall desire to see them; and that in case of their sickness, she may have the care of them until their *recovery: That the parties may apply by petition from time to time for further or other directions; and that all the costs of this suit be paid by the defendant."†

*114

† Many members of the bar were dissatisfied with some parts of this decree. It was alleged to have trenched too deeply on the marital rights: And as there had been no settlement at the time of the marriage, it was supposed to have gone too far in ordering a settlement to the extent, and in the unqualified manner which the decree did; including all the property acquired by the marriage, as well as what descended to the wife on the death of the brother, without making any provision for the husband or his creditors.

---

1 Desaus. 114

Case XII.

CARMICHAEL v. ABRAHAMS.

(March, 1785.)

[Judgment ⇐764.]

[Chancery may create a lien directly by decree for that purpose.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1322; Dec. Dig. ⇐764.]

In this case the court under special circumstances, decreed, that "the defendant should have a lien in nature of a mortgage on a house and lot, (of complainants,) for the balance, if any, which might be due him on a settlement of accounts between the parties;" which accounts were referred to the master.—Each party to pay his own costs.

1 Desaus. 114

Case XIII.

DE BRAHM and Others v. Executors of FENWICK.

(March, 1785.)

[Wills ⟸821.]

Eldest sons' estates chargeable with daughters' portions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 2114–2119; Dec. Dig. ⟸821.]

[Improvements ⟸4.]

One of the son's estate ordered to be sold, without allowance to the purchaser from the son.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Improvements, Cent. Dig. § 14; Dec. Dig. ⟸4.]

The court on considering the master's report in this cause, ordered and decreed, "that the three eldest sons' estates, (devised to them by their father the testator,) should each be chargeable with one of the three eldest daughters' portions: That the remainder of the defendant Thomas's real estates should be sold by the master, giving ——— week's notice: That the lot on the bay devised to Thomas Fenwick, be sold, without any allowance being made to the purchaser of the lot, Jonathan Simpson, for the buildings, which were put up contrary to the express notification of the executor, who gave Mr. Simpson notice that Thomas had no right to dispose of the same.††

†† The testator had devised and bequeathed large estates real and personal to his sons, charging them with legacies to his daughters, which had not been raised. During the confusion of the war, and the occupation of the country by the enemy, Thomas and Edward, two of *the sons, had possessed themselves of great part of the estates without consent of the executors, carried off part of the negroes, and sold part of the lands; Thomas sold this lot to Mr. Simpson.

*115

1 Desaus. *115

*Case XIV.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

Executor of CLIFFORD v. CHARLES CLIFFORD, a Minor.

(June, 1785.)

[Infants ⟸33.]

Sale of minor's estate, and compensation for dower.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Gibson v. Marshall, 5 Rich. Eq. 260.]

For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. § 66; Dec. Dig. ⟸33.]

Bill and answer read, whereupon ordered, that it be referred to the master to enquire whether it will be to the advantage of the minor to sell the land in bill mentioned, in preference to the personal estate: Also to report what will be a compensation to the widow for her dower, and in what manner the monies arising from the sale of the land shall be applied most to the advantage of the minor.

The master afterwards made a report recommending a sale of the land, which was confirmed; and a sale was ordered on a credit—the purchase money was to be paid by five instalments.

1 Desaus. 115

Case XV.

DE BRAHM and Others v. Executors of FENWICK.

(June, 1785.)

[Wills ⟸731.]

Devisee restricted from selling his share, until he accounted for property taken away by him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1793–1800; Dec. Dig. ⟸731.]

The master's report was read, whereupon several orders were made. Amongst others it was ordered, that Edward Fenwick be restrained from disposing of any part of the estate left him by the testator, until he has fully accounted for the negro slaves taken away by him, from the estate, (without the assent of the executors,) and paid the incumbrances (legacies to his sisters) chargeable on his estate by the father's will.

1 Desaus. 115

Case XVI.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

HAASUM ERNST v. THARON and MULLER.

(June, 1785.)

Master to put money out to interest.

The master's report was read by Gen. C. C. Pinckney, and ordered to be confirmed by consent; and that the balance of money in the hands of the defendant be paid to the master, to be by him put out to interest, on security, subject to the further order of the court.

1 Desaus. *116

*Case XVII.

[Ex parte DRAYTON.]

(September, 1785.)

[Insane Persons ⟸12.]

[Upon petition, supported by affidavits, chancery may issue a commission in the nature of a writ de lunatico inquirendo.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insane Persons, Cent. Dig. § 20; Dec. Dig. ⟸12.]

A petition signed by W. Drayton and St. Drayton was presented by Mr. Bee, praying that a commission in nature of a writ de lunatico enquirendo may issue, to enquire of the lunacy of Thomas Drayton.—Whereupon, on motion of Mr. Bee, and on reading the affidavits of doctor Turnbull, and John Pritchard the goaler, ordered that the commission do issue.

---

1 Desaus. 116

Case XVIII.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

RALPH IZARD v. MIDDLETON, Executor of John Izard.

(March, 1785.)

[Wills ⇐58.]

Court refused to decree in favour of an agreement to make mutual wills, for want of sufficient proof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 164, 165; Dec. Dig. ⇐58.]

[Frauds, Statute of ⇐52.]

[Under the provision of the statute, rendering void all contracts not to be performed within one year from the making thereof, unless in writing, signed by the party to be charged, it is not sufficient that the contract may be performed within the year, if the performance depends upon a contingency which does not occur until after the expiration of the year.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 79; Dec. Dig. ⇐52.]

[Frauds, Statute of ⇐129.]

[Where A. and B. entered into an oral agreement to make mutual wills in favor of each other, it was held that a will by A., the survivor, in pursuance of the agreement, was not such a performance as to take the case out of the statute as against B., who died more than a year after making the agreement.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 288; Dec. Dig. ⇐129.]

[Specific Performance ⇐24.]

[Cited in McKeegan v. O'Neill, 22 S. C. 467, to the point that a contract to make a will may be enforced against the representatives of the party failing to perform.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 54, 55; Dec. Dig. ⇐24.]

[Disapproved as to construction of statute of frauds in Turnipseed v. Sierrine, 57 S. C. 559, 577, 35 S. E. 757, 76 Am. St. Rep. 580.]

This cause came on to a hearing on the 23d March, 1785; and on the 2d April following, this entry is made in the register's book, "Ordered, that this bill be dismissed with costs." There are no reasons or grounds of the decree of the court put on record; for it was then the general practice of the court to assign the reasons of their judgment verbally.† But on examination of the papers of the late Chancellor Mathews, a brief of the bill and answer, together with his notes of the argument of counsel, and remarks on the cases cited were found.—That brief is as follows:

*117

*"The complainant by his bill charges, that in or about the year 1766, he and the late John Izard, Esq. of the state of South Carolina, being young men, and heads of two collateral branches, sprung from one common ancestor, who early settled in this country, entered into the following mutual agreement, viz. that if either of them should die without male issue, he should give and bequeath by will, the sum of five thousand pounds sterling to the survivor, for the purpose of keeping up the name and consequence of the family—but that being a young man, little informed of the formality required by law in such transactions, being likewise nearly related to and acquainted with the said John Izard, and having reliance on his honour and integrity in fulfilling the said agreement, the

† It is greatly to be regretted, that the minutes which remain of this case, which was very ably argued, by the eminent counsel concerned in it, are so imperfect. The evidence appears to be irrecoverably lost. But it seems that the alledged agreement between Mr. Ralph Izard and Mr. John Izard, to make mutual and corresponding wills, was not fully made out by sufficiently positive and legal proof; and that the court did not consider the presumption arising from Mr. Ralph Izard's having made two successive wills conformably to his understanding of a subsisting agreement, sufficient evidence to establish such an agreement, binding on Mr. John Izard. The court therefore, dismissed the bill of complaint.

This curious subject of agreements by two parties, to make mutual wills, in favour of each other, on certain contingencies, has not been often litigated in the courts either of England, or of this country—But some cases have occurred. The learning upon it is collected by Mr. Hargreave, in the 2d vol. of his juridical arguments and collections, from p. 272, 290 to 315. It appears that there is one class of cases in which actions have been brought at law, and have succeeded, for breach of agreements, upon the faith of which a person has made his will, or otherwise settled his affairs in a particular manner, or has omitted to *make provisions which otherwise he would have made.—1 Leon. 192, Croke Eliz. 163, Rockwood v. Rockwood 1 Ventr. 318, 2 Lev. 210. T. Raym. 302. 2 Freem. 285, case of Dutton and wife v. Poole.

*117

Another class of authorities, on compacts, connected with promises of testamentary or other settlements, consists of cases, in which the courts of equity have enforced such compacts by decreeing specific performance at the suit of those for whose benefit the promises were intended to enure.—Berenger v. Berenger, lord Nottingham's cases; see 2d Hargr. 291. Chamberlaine v. Chamberlaine, Prec. Ch. 3. 2 Freem. 34. Thynn v. Thynn, 1 Vern. 296; another case in 1689, Prec. in Ch. 5. Leicester v. Foxcroft, cited in Gilb. Eq. Rep. 11. Devernish v. Baines, Prec. in Ch. 3. Reech v. Kennigale, decided by lord Hardwicke in 1748, taken from Mr. Capper's ms. notes, 2d Hargr. 294. Goilmer v. Battison, by Lord Nottingham, 1 Vern. 48. Cassey v. Fitton, by lord Nottingham, 2 Hargr. 296. Jones and wife v. Martin, Anstruther's Rep. 882; see important notes to this case, 2 Hargr. 298.

But the great case on this subject is, that of Durour and wife and others v. Perrara and wife and others defendants, in which lord Camden, who has treated the subject very luminously, decreed in 1769 that such agreements to complainant neither demanded nor thought it necessary to demand, that the same should be in writing and subscribed by them, (in which opinion he was confirmed at a considerable time afterwards by speaking of the said agreement to the said John Izard, who neither denied nor disapproved of the same) —The complainant farther declares, that the said agreement when made, was neither unreasonable, nor unfavourable on the part of the said John Izard, as he the said John

*118

Izard was then a healthy *young man, and married to a young lady, who had already borne him a child, and the complainant himself was unmarried—That considering himself bound in honour and conscience to perform his part, he constantly inserted in every will which he afterwards executed, a clause bequeathing the sum of five thousand pounds sterling to the said John Izard, in such case as aforesaid, as may appear by a will ready to be produced, which was executed by him when embarking for Europe in 1769; and was further confirmed, except in some particulars not relative to the present matter, by a codicil in the year 1778; which said will and codicil were never cancelled till after the death of the said John Izard; and he refers to them as a proof of his having executed in part the said agreement; and as a further proof remarks, that at the time of executing the said will he was married, and had two daughters alive—that his wife was ensient of another, and that it would have been very extraordinary under such circumstances, that he should give away so large a sum from those children (and that to one already possessed of a large increasing estate, without any family but a wife,) if he had not considered himself obliged thereto by the said agreement—That in effect the said John Izard had very nearly succeeded to the said legacy, in consequence of the complainant's having narrowly escaped with life from a shipwreck on his return from Europe in 1770, in which case the said John Izard would have reaped all the advantage now claimed by him, as survivor, according to the said agreement, although at that time the complainant would have left a wife and two daughters alive—In consideration of all which he hoped, that the said John Izard had on his part equally provided for the performance of the said agreement by bequeathing to him five thousand pounds as aforesaid:

*119

But that the said John *Izard hath since died without any issue whatever, and hath not made any such provision as aforesaid, but by his will hath devised and bequeathed the bulk and residue of a very large estate to his sister Mary Middleton, of which will Arthur Middleton, of the state aforesaid, is sole acting executor, who refuses to execute the said agreement, as it ought to be on the part of the said John Izard, but gives out that the same was not made seriously and with intention to be executed, whereas the truth is otherwise, and it was in part executed by the complainant. Wherefore, that the said Arthur Middleton may be compelled fully to perform the said agreement, and to pay the said sum of five thousand pounds with interest from the death of the said John Izard, and that he may be relieved in the premises is the prayer of the bill.

"The defendant, Arthur Middleton, by his answer admits, that he is possessed of a considerable real and personal estate, formerly the property of John Izard, Esq., deceased, which was devised to defendant's wife, although he is not sole surviving executor of the will, nor has qualified, having been sent a prisoner from this state soon after, and not having returned till after the death of Mrs. Izard, the widow of John Izard, on which event the estate devolved into his hands—He denies that any formal requisition was ever made to him by complainant for payment of sum in bill mentioned, though he allows if there had, he should not have complied, and in his opinion with good reason, as by such compliance he should not only have failed in duty to his wife and children, for whom he considers himself a trustee, but also would have thrown a slur on the memory of his friend and benefactor—Says that he was a stranger to all the circumstances mentioned in bill, relative to agreement therein charged, never having heard the deceased utter a syllable upon the matter, although he lived in intimacy with him, and attended him in his dying moments. Nor does he believe that deceased ever considered any words which may have passed on the subject, as creating a positive agreement, or obligatory on either party, because being a man of known honour, had he thought so, he *would have fulfilled the same, more especially as there was nothing to prevent it, and his fortune was affluent—nor can defendant conceive that such omission could proceed from want of recollection, as deceased made several wills, in neither of which, as defendant is assured, was any notice of such agreement, or any legacy to complainant—And as complainant has appealed to his own will, as proof of his sense of the supposed agreement, defendant hopes he may offer to the court the last will of the deceased, as sufficient voucher, that his sentiments on the subject were very different—Defendant looks upon the will, as fully declarative of the fact, but if thought necesmake mutual wills, when properly proved, are *118 binding *on the parties, and will be enforced by the court of equity.—See 2d Hargr. 304 to 311.

*120

---

In a later case, lord Walpole v. lord Orford, the lord chancellor Loughborough, without denying the doctrine of lord Camden, refused to sustain such an alledged agreement, for want of sufficient proof to establish it.—See 3 Vesey, jun. 402, and 2 Hargr. 272 to 315.

sary, the testimony of several persons can be produced, who have heard the deceased speak of the matter in a manner no way indicating an idea of his having bound himself by a promise—Defendant therefore hopes, that the court will not decree in favour of complainant, and thereby compel him to give away the property of his wife and children, vested in them by the will of her brother—a decree which would stigmatize the memory of the deceased, and though apparently advantageous to complainant, may hereafter affect his family by opening the way to a new and easy mode of diminishing their wealth: He trusts that your honours will never admit a principle, fraught with consequences pernicious to society, by exposing not only the unwary but the cautious to the wiles of the designing, which would be sufficient to shake the foundation of society, loosen every tie of property, and tend to corrupt the morals of a whole people. By expressing these sentiments and apprehensions, he declares that he does not mean to impute any sinister views to complainant, nor to cast the slightest aspersion upon one whose integrity and honour he holds in high estimation. Defendant insists on the benefit of the Statute of Frauds††—denies combination—and prays to be dismissed with costs."

*121

*The case was argued by Mr. William Drayton, Mr. Bee, Mr. Edward Rutledge, and General Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, who were counsel in the cause. The arguments of the counsel are not preserved, but the following cases appear to have been cited: For complainant, 1 Vern. 16, 17, 48. 1 Eq. Cases abr. 19-21. 1 Bac. abr. 75. 1 Bla. Rep. 353. 2 Vern. 98, 200, 253, 455. 2 Atk. 98–100. 1 Atk. 447, 13. 3 Atk. 4. 2 Chanc. Ca. 164. 1 Reps. in Eq. 3. 1 Domat. 34, 431—For the defendant, Parl. Cases, 76. 2 Vern. 215, 269, 291, 627. 2 Atk. 136, 467. 2 Eq. Cases, 45. 1 P. Wms. 618, 770. Cas. in Eq. 37. 1 Vesey, 279, 305. 1 Inst. 52. 3 P. Wms. 130. 5 Burr, 2804. 3 Bro. 257. 6 Bro. 45. 2 Cas. in Eq. abr. 48, 15. Lofft's Reps. 804. Gilb. in Eq. 238.

Chancellor MATHEWS commented on these cases; remarking, that in the case cited for plaintiff from 1 Vern. 48, the party in whose favour the agreement was decreed to be executed, was heir at law to the land in dispute. That the cases from Eq. Cas. abr. 2 Vern. 1, 2, & 3 Atk. and 2 Chanc. Cas. had no application: And that the decree stated in 1 Rep. in Eq. appears to have been founded on the acquiescence of the defendant for twenty-one years after he came of age, therefore an agreement strongly presumed to have been made between the parties: That the case from 1 Bla. Reps. 353, does not appear to contradict the case in Viner: That lord Mansfield does not deny the law on the statute of frauds; but said it was a fit case for the consideration of a jury. But it was widely different from the principal case—for the party contracting had received a valuable consideration, viz. the service of the plaintiff at very inferior wages, with a prospect of being compensated at a future day; therefore he sustained an injury by the defendant's testator not having fulfilled his part of the contract. But in the principal case, no injury has been done to the complainant, Mr. Ralph Izard, it being ab initio, a mere affair of chances. The chancellor stated his agreement with Viner and 1 Raymond, 316, who are opposed to Salkeld, 1 vol. 280.

*122

*The chancellor then proceeded as follows: "There are several points to be considered in this case—1st, Is it within the statute of frauds? If not, is there, 2dly, sufficient parol proof of the agreement? 3dly, has there been a performance of the agreement by either of the parties? On the first point, I am of opinion it is within the statute. The words of the statute which apply to this case are, 'or upon any agreement which is not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof, unless in writing and signed,' &c. This agreement rested on a contingency whether either of the parties died within the year, or not. This is the only doubtful point. But if the words and intent of the statute are thoroughly considered, the doubt vanishes, and gives place to certainty. I consider it as a catching bargain; in which cases it is an invariable maxim, 'that contingency shall be of no avail.' The first object of the statute was to prevent improvident and loose bargains from being carried into execution, as they had been repeatedly found to have been productive of frauds and consequent perjuries. In most of those agreements contingency was set up as the ground for the apparent inequality—but it has been uniformly reprobated. If it were not so, how easily it might be evaded in every instance. It would be requisite only to make the agreement executory within the year, with a condition annexed to extend the time on any probable contingency; and which might be carried on to the end of a man's life. Would not this pave the way for the perpetration of those very frauds against which the statute meant to apply a remedy? Would it not be too lax a construction of the statute to say, that because the agreement might have taken effect within the year, that this circumstance alone is to be regarded? And that the probability that it might not have taken effect within twenty years, is to be totally laid out of the case? And yet it is by this construction alone that such an agreement could be taken out of the statute. I think the words

†† ("Or upon any agreement that is not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof, unless in writing, and signed by the party to be charged.") do not admit of that construction: because it would be opening the door for the admission of fraud, when the statute intended to exclude it. I admit there are many cases *which have been taken out of the statute, which by a very rigid construction might have been included. But these cases invariably are, where any evident injustice would arise, if it were not so; or where one of the parties would be a considerable loser by having fulfilled his part of the agreement, and the other not. Then consider, ought the clause in Ralph Izard's will to be considered as an execution on his part. I think not, for it does not even take notice that it was in consequence of such an agreement—but more especially it ought not, because it had neither substance nor permanency, for it was alone in his power each day to modify it, as suited his own interest, and finally to destroy every vestige of it. For these reasons I am of opinion that this case is clearly within the statute of frauds; because the fact is that Mr. John Izard did not die for many years after the agreement is said to have been made; consequently it could not have been carried into execution within one year. Therefore it not having been "reduced to writing, and signed by the party to be charged," the complainant can derive no benefit therefrom, but that defendant's plea ought to be admitted—and the complainant decreed to pay costs."

*123

---

1 Desaus. 123

Case XIX.

MORTON and Wife v. JOSIAH SMITH, Executor of Corker.

(September, 1784.)

[Executors and Administrators ⟸105.]

[Cited in Doud v. Sanders, Harp. Eq. 280; Pope v. Mathews, 18 S. C. 448, to the point that where an executor deposited funds in the state treasury without an order of court, but it appeared that the funds would have perished if retained in his hands, the court refused to charge him with a loss by depreciation of the state securities.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 399; Dec. Dig. ⟸ 105.]

This was a bill filed by persons entitled to certain parts of Mr. Corker's estate. The only question made in the case was respecting certain indents or certificates of the state, which were offered by defendant (the executor) as part of the estate. These were at that time considerably depreciated, and the complainants insisted that the executor had had funds of the estate in his hands, and had placed them in the state treasury improperly, and eventually to the prejudice of the heirs of the estate.

The court after argument was of opinion, that although the executor had not the sanction of this court for depositing the money in the state treasury, yet as in all probability if he had retained the money in his hands, as he had been directed to do, it would have perished there, *(as the paper currency of the country did during the war,) and the money totally lost, it would be very hard on the executor to punish him and make him liable, where he acted for the best.—It was therefore ordered, that the executor should assign to the complainant in right of his wife, her proportion of the indents, and should pay her proportion of the rest of the estate.

*124

---

1 Desaus. 124

Case XX.

ANONYMOUS.

(1785.)

[Equity ⟸378.]

Issue directed to try whether a deed was duly and fairly executed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 797; Dec. Dig. ⟸378.]

Certificate that it was fairly executed; and decree in favour of it.

The bill, answer, exhibits and interrogatories were read, whereupon ordered, that an issue at law be directed to try whether the instrument of writing marked B, an exhibit in this cause, purporting to be a gift to one of the defendants, of slaves and other property therein mentioned is fraudulent, or signed bona fide by the complainant's testator.

At the sitting of the court in December, 1785, a certificate of the judges of the court of common pleas, was presented by General C. C. Pinckney, solicitor for one of the parties, "purporting that the instrument of writing submitted to the decision of that court, was legally and bona fide drawn up and signed"; and it was ordered to be of record in this court. And the court made a decree, for the delivery of the negroes and other articles specified in the instrument of writing above mentioned to the devisee.

---

1 Desaus. 124

Case XXI.

WRIGHT and Others v. Executor of WRIGHT.

(1785.)

Notice to creditors to establish their demands.

The master's report was read, whereupon ordered, that the sale of the house and land reported by the master, as necessary to be made in this case, be postponed: And that the master do give notice to the creditors of the testator to come in before him, on or before the second Monday in December next, to prove and otherwise substantiate their demands to his satisfaction: And that he do then report thereon to this court for their further consideration.

---

1 Desaus. *125

*Case XXII.

WILLIMAN v. PETRIE.

(1785.)

Master to enquire and report what property was wasted after judgment at law.

Security bond to stand as a pledge for the sum wasted.

On motion of Mr. Edward Rutledge, and after hearing arguments on both sides ordered, that it be referred to the master to enquire and report what property, bound by the execution obtained by complainant Williman at law, against the estate of the said Edmund Petrie, has been made away with, between the time of the granting and the dissolution of the injunction, in this case; and that the bond given by Dr. James Clitherall do stand as a security for the payment of the value of such property, and the costs of suit in this court; and that on payment thereof in January next, the said bond be delivered up to said James Clitherall, to be cancelled.

---

1 Desaus. 125

Case XXIII.

HAMPTON v. SNIPES.

(1785.)

[Account ⇐7.]

Defendant decreed to execute titles to complainant and to account for rents.

[Cited in Latimer v. Marchbanks, 57 S. C. 279, 35 S. E. 481.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account, Cent. Dig. § 21; Dec. Dig. ⇐7.]

It was decreed, that the defendant do forthwith execute titles to the complainant, in fee simple, for the house and lot mentioned in the pleadings: That he account with him before the master for what rent he has received on account of the premises from the time he dispossessed the complainant of them, (which it is referred to the master to state and report,) and that the costs of this suit be paid by the defendant.

---

1 Desaus. 125

Case XXIV.

DRAYTON v. DRAYTON.

(1785.)

[Wills ⇐790.]

Case of election—To be made by the minors six months after coming of age.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 2043; Dec. Dig. ⇐790.]

It was decreed that the complainants Ann and Susannah have six months after coming of age to make their election, either to take their share of the estate devised by their grandmother to the testator's children, after his death, or the legacies bequeathed to them by the testator, and in case they choose the former, that they abate the value thereof from their legacies: That the costs be paid out of the testator's estate.

---

1 Desaus. *126

*Case XXV.

Ex parte ROBERT GIBBES.

(1785.)

Legatee to account for property he took away.

Executor authorized to invest money in negroes for minors, or as he should judge proper.

A petition was presented by Mr. Hugh Rutledge, and arguments being heard on both sides, decreed, that Mr. Edward Fenwick account before the master, for the value of sixty-four negroes, which belonged to the testator's (his father's) estate, and which he took away: And that he deliver to Mr. Gibbes, executor of Mr. Fenwick, deceased, negroes equal to the value of those, for the benefit of the testator's children, in such shares and proportions as they are entitled under the testator's will to the negroes belonging to the estate: That Mr. Gibbes be authorized to lay out the profit of John Rogers' estate in negroes, or such other manner as he shall think most conducive to the benefit and advantage of the said minor.

At the end of this sitting, William Frazer, Esq., register in chancery resigned, and John Neufville, jun., Esq., was appointed in his place.

---

1 Desaus. 126

Case XXVI.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews; Attorney-general Alex. Moultrie; Master in Chancery William H. Gibbes; Register John Neufville.

JOSEPH SALVADOR v. R. A. RAPLEY.

(December, 1785.)

[Account ⇐19.]

Deeds and specialties to be deposited by defendant in hands of the master.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account, Cent. Dig. § 95; Dec. Dig. ⇐19.]

Bill and answer read; on motion of Mr. Pringle solicitor for complainant, ordered, that all matters of account between complainant and defendant be referred to the master, to make his report thereon: And that all the deeds, specialties, and notes of hand, in the custody of the defendant, belonging to the complainant, be deposited with the master, subject to the farther direction of this court.

1 Desaus. 126

Case XXVII.

Ex parte EDWARD FENWICK.

(December, 1785.)

[Wills ⇐731.]

Devisee permitted to sell land under the direction of the master, and the bonds to stand as a pledge for his debt to estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1793 1800; Dec. Dig. ⇐731; Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1184.]

A petition was presented by Mr. Drayton in behalf of Mr. Fenwick, praying that he may have permission either to mortgage his plantation on John's Island to the *executor of his father's will, or sell other tracts of land, for the purposes therein mentioned.† Whereupon ordered, that Mr. Fenwick be permitted to sell under the direction of the master, lands to the amount of the demands due by him to his father's estate, according to the prayer of his petition, after accounting with the master for the negroes which he is liable for: And that the bonds for the amount sales be deposited with the master as a security for such amount.

*127

† He derived from the will of his father the lands in question.

Ordered, that attachments for contempt or non-compliance with a decree or order be granted by a judge at his chambers on affidavit, in the usual manner.

1 Desaus. 127

Case XXVIII.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

WILLIAM SAMS v. BENJAMIN MATHEWS, EDITH MATHEWS, JANE SIMMONS, MARY MIDDLETON, ARNOLDUS VANDERHORST and Wife.

(September, 1785.)

[Wills ⇐623.]

[Cited in Beresford v. Elliott's Ex'rs, 1 Desaus. 189; Logan v. Ladson's Ex'r., Id. 272, to the point that where a testator devised an estate for life to his two children, to be equally divided between them, but at "their several deaths" the principal of "their respective moieties" was to be "equally divided among the respective issue of their respective bodies," for their use, forever, "or for default of such issue surviving of either of them, then, and not otherwise, the whole principal of both said moieties" was given to the survivor of the two children for life, "and at his or her decease to the issue of the body of such survivor, * * * and for default of all such issue" then to the right heirs of the testator, there were cross-remainders by implication between the issue of the children, and that, one having died leaving issue, such issue took the whole estate upon the death of the survivor without issue.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1445; Dec. Dig. ⇐623.]

The complainant stated as follows: That his testator, J. Stanyarne, on the 27th of August, 1772, made his will, and among sundry other bequests gave the following one to his grand-son Charles Sams and grand-daughter Sarah Mathews: "Another of the said six lots or shares, (viz. of the personal estate,) I hereby give and bequeath the use of, to and for my said grand-son Charles Sams and grand-daughter Sarah Mathews, equally to be divided as aforesaid between them, with all the issues and profits (except as hereinafter mentioned) arising therefrom after they my said executrixes and executors shall have deducted the sum of £5000 current money, which I hereby authorize them to do, and put out the said £5000 at interest on good security: thenceforward yearly and every year during the term of the natural life of their mother Mary M'Gillivray or Sams my daughter, &c.; and the several negroes or slaves which shall belong to their respective lots, and that shall be left after the deduc-tion of *the said £5000 and division between the said Charles and Sarah shall be made as aforesaid, shall during the respective natural lives of the said Charles and Sarah be used, occupied and employed on those or some of those lands which I have hereinbefore left them respectively the use of,—that is to say, by my said executrixes and executors for the use and behoof of the said Charles and Sarah during his and her respective minorities, and by themselves afterwards, but at their several deaths the principal of their respective moieties or one half part of the said one sixth part of my said personal estate remaining after the aforesaid deduction, and the offspring and increase of the females of the said negroes thereto belonging, shall be by my said executrixes and executors equally shared, divided and delivered to and between the respective issue of the respective bodies of my said grandchildren Charles Sams and Sarah Mathews lawfully begotten, for their several and respective uses and behoofs for ever; or for default of such issue surviving, of either of them, the said Charles Sams and Sarah Mathews, then and not otherwise the whole principal of both the said moieties or one half parts as last abovementioned, and the offspring and increase of the females of the said slaves, shall go, and be, and remain, to and for the use and behoof of the survivor of them the said Charles Sams and Sarah Mathews, for and during the natural life of such survivor, and no longer; and at his or her decease, to and for the use and behoof of the issue of the body of such survivor lawfully begotten and surviving, equally to be shared and divided between them as aforesaid if more than one; and for default of all such issue, then, and not otherwise, to my right heirs for ever." That testator nominated his daughters the defendants Edith Mathews and Jane Simmons and complainant's wife executrixes, and complainant and testator's grand-son W. Mathews executors of his said will.—Bill further sets forth that testator, soon after making his will, died, leaving it in full force: That complainant proved the same, qualified as executor, and took upon himself the burthen and execution thereof: That the personal estate was divided as testator directed into *six equal parts, and the shares of the several legatees delivered them: Charles Sams and Sarah Mathews being entitled to only one sixth part, it was equally divided, and Benjamin Mathews received his wife's part, and Charles Sams was put into possession of his share: That sometime after the division, Sarah Mathews died, leaving a daughter, who was entitled to her mother's share: Charles Sams survived his sister several years, but is now dead without issue: And soon after his death complainant possessed himself of the share, to be distributed either amongst the legal representatives of the said Charles Sams, or the right heirs of the testator, who might be entitled: Soon after Benjamin Mathews set up a claim in the behalf of his daughter, and applied to complainant for that purpose; but he not thinking she had any right, refused to give up the estate; but Benjamin Mathews got possession of some of the negroes and retains them, and threatens suit for the remainder. The other members of the family of the testator also set up claims; and complainant himself being a residuary legatee of said Charles Sams, and he and his wife being grand-children, he thinks they have as good a right as the others, to a distributive share.—As complainant cannot undertake to determine these rights, he submits them to the determination of the court.

*128

*129

To the foregoing bill the defendant Benjamin Mathews has answered and admitted all the facts stated in the bill. Defendant denies that any of the other defendants have any right to the said estate, and insists that it being personal estate, the remainder over is void: That it was the manifest intention of testator that his grand-children and great-grand-children should stand in the place of such of his children as were their respective ancestors, and should have such estate as they (his children) would have been entitled to had they been living, as is evidenced by the general tenor of his will, and particularly by the bequests to the defendant Elizabeth Vanderhorst and his grand-daughter Mary Gibbes, who was the mother of the defendant M. Middleton. Defendant refers generally to the will; and not to any distinct clauses in it, and concludes *his answer in the usual manner.—The defendants Edith Mathews, Jane Simmons, A. Vanderhorst and his wife, by their answers severally, admit all the facts stated in the bill; and defendants believe and admit that the defendant Benjamin Mathews set up a claim in right of his daughter, but that complainant refused to give it up for the reasons in bill mentioned; and defendants are of opinion that he was justified in so doing, they being all of them more nearly related to testator than the said Benjamin Mathews's daughter: Defendants believe and have heard that the defendant Benjamin Mathews is in possession of several of the negroes belonging to said estate, of which they hope he will be obliged to account for the work and labour; and that their right to the said estate will be preserved to them—and deny all combination, &c.

*130

The defendant Mary Middleton answers by her guardian, and says, that she knows nothing of the several matters and things charged in bill, but being an infant of tender years, she hopes the court will protect her in whatever right or title she may have in the estate now in question, and concludes her answer as usual.

The principal point that will be contested in this cause is, what construction the words of this clause of the will shall have, and particularly the last part of it, which disposes of the estate after the death of the survivor without issue among the right heirs of the testator—there being no provision at all made for the issue of the person dying first, in case the longest liver should not leave issue, but the estate in that event is bequeathed to the right heirs of the testator."

The cause came on to be heard on the 16th and 17th September, 1785.

Mr. Hugh Rutledge and Mr. Pringle contended, on the part of the complainant, that the limitation over was too remote, and the contingency never happened—Mrs. Mathews died before Charles Sams, leaving issue; Charles Sams left no issue: That the remainder over was void, and the absolute estate vested in Charles Sams: That this appears to have been the intention of the testator. The will confines the bequests to the testator's several daughters, *and their issue in a direct line, without any intention that any issue of one daughter should take any thing from the share of another daughter, but that it goes to his heirs generally. The use of the word "respective" in the will, destroys the cross remainder—cross remainders are not favoured. The counsel cited the following cases: 1 Vesey 54–153. 1 Atk. 432, 579. 2 Atk. 308. 4 Bac. 304, 332. 1 Chanc. Cas. duke of Norfolk's case. Eq. Cas. abr. 293, 444. Cowper's Rep. 31, 797. 2 Stra. 569, 969, 996. Fearn. 341, 7, 371, 353. 1 Ventr. 229.

*131

Mr. T. Pinckney and Mr. Bee argued on the part of the defendant—That the testator meant to give an equal share of his estate amongst his daughters in the first instance, and then to their issue. Then whilst any issue of a daughter is living, the right heirs (spoken of in the will) cannot be admitted to take. If they are preferred to the descendant of a daughter, this would create an inequality. The words "all such issue" are very material. The last clause in the will explains who are meant by the words "his right heirs"—the limitation over is not too remote—it is after a failure of issue of a life in being. The counsel quoted Fearn. 356, 363, 416. 1 Atk. 469. Mr. E. Rutledge cited 2 Vern. 545.

The view of the cause taken by the court, appears from Chancellor MATHEWS'S notes.

"To make cross remainders there must be either express words, or a strong necessary implication. Wills are to be construed liberally, so as to make the intention operate, if not against the express rules of law; but where the rigid rule of law is against the plain intention manifested by a strong necessary implication, it must be subject to such correction as will soften the rigor of the law, and make way for the real intention of testator: summum jus, summa est injuria.

"To find the true construction, the whole will must be taken together, and not disjointed parts of it.

"In the first place—It appears clearly to have been the testator's intention to divide his whole estate equally between all his children and their representatives then living: And that the share of each should follow the direct *line of the first taker, until her descendants were extinct. Even then the testator makes no other limitation than what the law made for him, viz. to his right heirs. If, therefore, the limitation to the right heirs was to take place, the primary object of the testator would be defeated, because one half of one of the first taken shares, would go away from her descendant living, which would create an inequality between his children, contrary to his intention.

*132

"It must be admitted, there are words, which, by the strict rules of law, viz. 'respectively' and 'severally,' disjoin the estates of the issue of Charles Sams and Sarah Mathews, and apparently forbid cross remainders. Yet there are other words which strongly imply them, viz. 'and for default of all such issue, and not otherwise, to his right heirs.' These words exactly correspond with the first part of the will, which makes an equal division amongst testator's children in the first instance, and shews an intention to continue it in that line whilst there are any to take. Therefore the words 'all such issue', must refer to the whole issue of Charles Sams and Sarah Mathews; and the other words 'and not otherwise' are a confirmation of such intention. If this had not been his intention, he would have used words less emphatic, as 'and in default of such issue:' Then the words such would have reference to the next antecedent 'issue of the survivor.' But as the words are 'all such' 'and not otherwise,' they must have a more general reference, and go back to 'a default of such issue of either of them, then and not otherwise' 'to his right heir.' If this construction is not to prevail, the limitation over to the right heirs is so remote a possibility as the law will not allow; for the first limitation is to the issue generally after a life in being, and then to the right heirs: This may run to a century, and lord Macclesfield says, in cases of executory devises, the utmost extent to be allowed ought not to be more than thirty years. Besides, here is the issue of the lives in being, interposed between them and the right heirs, which bars the limitation over to them. Then if the issue generally of Charles Sams and Sarah Mathews are not meant by 'all such issue,' and the limitation to the right heirs *is too remote, who is to take the remainder? It has been said, it is an interest vested in Charles Sams as survivor of Sarah Mathews. This cannot be, because he has no more than a life estate, 'and no longer,' therefore it cannot be such a vested interest in him as he can dispose of; but it must still remain subject to the disposition under the will of J. Stanyarne, if that can be properly ascertained.

*133

"It therefore appears, that there is so strong a necessary implication of a cross remainder, to make the will consistent, and to fulfil the intention of the testator, that the construction must be in favour of cross remainders between the issue of Charles Sams and Sarah Mathews, and that the issue of Sarah Mathews must take the 'whole principal of both of said moieties,' agreeable to the words, and also the true intent and meaning of the testator."

And the court decreed, that the share of the testator, John Stanyarne's personal estate, bequeathed to Charles Sams, is vested in defendant's daughter; and that the same be delivered by complainant to defendant in trust for her: That the complainant account before the master for the profits of the negroes, from the time of Charles Sams' death, and pay the amount thereof (after deducting the costs of suit) to the defendant, in trust for his daughter.

---

1 Desaus. 133

Case XXIX.

NEILSON and SARRAZIN v. DICKENSON.

(September, 1785.)

[Equity ⟸345.]

[The answer of defendant, so far as responsive to the bill, must be taken as true unless it be overturned by two witnesses, or one with strong corroborative circumstances.]

[Ed. Note. For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 722; Dec. Dig. ⟸345.]

[Equity ⇐345.]

[The uncorroborated testimony of one witness will not overcome a responsive answer.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 722; Dec. Dig. ⇐345.]

[Sales ⇐166.]

[A vendor, who makes no warranty or assurance as to the quality of the thing sold, is not answerable for defects of which he had no knowledge.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 391; Dec. Dig. ⇐166.]

This was a bill filed by the complainants to procure an injunction to a suit at law brought against them on a bond, which they had conditioned to pay—£1000. This bond had been given on the purchase of a brig, from the defendant Dickenson, in July, 1783. The complainant's charge, that the seller declared the brig was sound and good, British built, and British bottom: That complainants purchased on these assurances: But that the complainants afterwards, in a few months, discovered that the vessel was American built, worn out, and unsound: And they procured a survey of shipwrights, masters of vessels, &c. who declared the brig unfit for sea, and that she had been so for eighteen months.

*134

*An injunction was granted in the first instance—On the answer coming in, the defendant admitted the sale, and that the bond was taken for the purchase money: But he denied that at the sale, or previous to it, he had assured the purchasers the brig was British built, and was sound and good, or that purchasers had bought on that ground; or upon representations of that kind from defendant: That the brig did not belong to defendant, but to his employers, who sent her to Charleston for a cargo; but being disappointed, consulted with the commercial correspondents of the owners, who advised a sale of the brig: That defendant told Neilson, one of the complainants, that he believed the vessel was British built, and a good one, as she had been lately bought as such by the owners—but she had been a prize, and he could not speak positively. He told him he could not warrant her, and desired him to have her examined if he wished to purchase. Defendant believes the vessel to be British built; and he thinks she was not unsound, or unfit for sea, when he sold her—but understands she suffered material injury in the storm of October, 1783, before she was examined.

On the trial of the case, three witnesses swore that Dickenson did say the vessel was British built—one witness thought she was British built, but six were of a different opinion. It was, however, only an opinion, and they had no knowledge of the vessel originally. The court, therefore, laid that fact out of the case. One witness alone deposed that defendant had assured Neilson that the vessel was sound and seaworthy; so that his testimony was directly opposed to the answer on this point: But the court said the evidence of a single witness, without strong circumstances, could not overthrow the answer.

The court in delivering its opinion said, "that the principal question is, whether the seller is so far liable for the defect of the thing sold, as to vitiate the contract in case of defect. The plaintiff's counsel contend, that although no warranty had been given, if any defect should be found in the thing sold, whether it be with or without the knowledge of the seller at the time of the sale, it vacates the contract. There has been no attempt to shew *that defendant knew the vessel was unsound. The whole matter is reduced to this single point, whether the seller is answerable for defects he did not know, and where there is no warranty. I think not: For if this doctrine was to be established by this court, it would create endless confusion in the sale of property: for if one man sells, and makes no assurance of the good or ill qualities of the thing sold, and the buyer should afterwards discover defects, or probably not find those qualities which he might have supposed were in the thing bought; or if he finds he has made a bad bargain, it is easy enough to discover some defect or other, and if therefore the bargain is to be vitiated, there will be no end to suits: and no man can tell when he has really disposed of his goods, and the terrors of a lawsuit will be constantly hanging over his head. This would give such a stab to a free trade, as must be productive of fatal effects. If a man wants to buy, and the seller will not warrant, it is certainly his business to inform himself of the qualities of the thing he wants to buy; but if he does not, and he should afterwards find he has made a bad bargain, it is his own laches, and he must abide the consequence. —I am, therefore, for dissolving the injunction."

*135

It was ordered and decreed that the bill be dismissed with costs.

---

1 Desaus. 135

Case XXX.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

JOHN ROGERSON per Guardian v. WILLIAM BLAKE.

(December, 1786.)

It was ordered and decreed, that it be referred to the master to state an account between the complainant and defendant, in which the former shall be charged with the money paid by Daniel Blake, Esq. in discharge of the mortgage in bill mentioned: That the complainant be credited in the said account with the value of the complainant's house, taken down and removed for the use of the said Daniel Blake; and with rent of the complainant's land from the time when the said Daniel Blake took possession of the same until his death, at the rate of 11*l.* 8s. 6d. per an*num: That complainant be allowed interest on the balance due on the said account, from the time when the balance became due; and that the money be paid to the master, subject to the further order of the court.

*136

---

1 Desaus. 136

Case XXXI.

[Ex parte DRAYTON]

(December, 1786.)

[Insane Persons ⟸69.]

[Chancery may order a sale of the real estate of a lunatic, upon petition by his guardian.]

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Cathcart v. Sugenheimer, 18 S. C. 130.

For other cases, see Insane Persons, Cent. Dig. § 116; Dec. Dig. ⟸69.]

A petition was presented by Mr. William Drayton, in behalf of the guardians of Thomas Drayton, a lunatic; the assistant master's report thereon read, and on motion ordered, that it be confirmed: and that certain tracts of land be sold agreeably to a schedule, annexed to said petition.

---

1 Desaus. 136

Case XXXII.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

GRANT, Executor of Graham v. WILLIAM STEWART.

(March, 1787.)

[Equity ⟸418.]

Bill to be taken pro confesso, and decree founded on it.

Complainant to give security to abide the order of the court, on the defendant appearing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 965; Dec. Dig. ⟸418.]

Bill and affidavit read—Ordered, that the bill be taken pro confesso: That the bond and mortgage in bill mentioned be deemed fraudulent and void; and that the defendant do bring and cancel the same before the master of this court, and pay the costs of this suit: And that the complainant give security, to be approved by the master, in the sum of 250*l.* conditioned to abide such order as may be made on the defendant appearing to the suit, and paying such costs to the complainant, as this court shall order.

1 Desaus. 136

Case XXXIII.

Present—Chancellors Hutson, and Mathews.

THOMPSON v. THOMPSON.

(June, 1787.)

[Equity ⟸381.]

[Where, upon an issue directed to ascertain the validity of a deed of gift, the jury find that the deed was forged, the verdict of the jury finding such fact was properly made a part of the record in the court of equity.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 813; Dec. Dig. ⟸381.]

On motion of Mr. Edward Rutledge, with the concurrence of Mr. Bay, ordered, that an issue be directed to ascertain the validity of a deed of gift, as mentioned in the bill of complaint in this cause.

Afterwards (in December, 1787,) the bill was dismissed with costs; and it was ordered, that the verdict of the jury at Camden, proving the forgery of a deed of gift in bill mentioned, should be filed, and become of record in the registry of this court.

---

1 Desaus. *137

*Case XXXIV.

ALEXANDER ROSE v. JOHN and A. HAMILTON.

(June, 1787.)

[Injunction ⟸151.]

On application for injunction, opposition may be made on the merits, as they are disclosed by the bill: Nothing extraneous to be admitted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 336; Dec. Dig. ⟸151.]

On reading this bill, and on some contention arising relative to entering into the merits thereof, the court ruled, that upon an application for an injunction, the merits may be entered into without answer filed; but the adverse solicitor is in his opposition to confine himself to the allegations in the bill, and cannot produce any extraneous or foreign matter in proof, until the answer be brought in. The merits of this case being argued by the solicitors, Mr. Drayton and Mr. Read, it was decreed that the bill be dismissed with costs.

---

1 Desaus. 137

Case XXXV.

Present—Chancellors Hutson and Mathews.

SEALY and Wife, Executrix of Samuel Ball v. HENRY LAURENS, Executor of Elias Ball.

(December, 1787.)

[Wills ⟸539]

Testator directs estate to be equally divided, but if any of his children happen to die, his share to go to survivors: the court limits this to a dying in life time of testator.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Beresford v. Elliott's Ex'rs, 1 Desaus. 189; Drayton v. Drayton, Id., 331; Deveaux v. Barnwell, Id. 499; Robert v. Ellis, 59 S. C. 158, 37 S. E. 250.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1163; Dec. Dig. ⟸539.]

[Wills ⟸627.]

[A devise to several persons, "to be equally divided between them," constitutes a tenancy in common, unless clearly qualified by other words in the will.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1454; Dec. Dig. ⟸627.]

The bill was filed in this case to recover an estate to which the complainant's testator was alleged to be entitled, under the will of his father Elias Ball. The testator by his last will, executed on the 18th August, 1757, after directing the payment of debts, bequeathed the remainder of his estate, real and personal, to be equally divided among his four children, William, Ann, Helena, and Samuel: And in case his son William or any of his other children happened to die, he ordained and willed the remaining parts of his or their interests to be equally divided amongst his surviving heir or heirs. William and Helena died soon after the testator, under age and unmarried. Ann married Mr. John Hunt, and upon her application the executor divided the personal estate into two equal parts, and delivered one half thereof to the said John Hunt and Ann his wife, some time in February, 1769: And the acting executor H. Laurens retained the other moiety for the other child Samuel, then a minor; and afterwards sold the negroes, stock, &c. and his half of the land, and retained the securities in his own hands. Samuel Ball attained the age of twenty years, *and then intermarried with the present complainant Beulah. He soon afterwards, on the 15th May, 1775, made his will, whereby (inter. alia) he bequeathed his wife 7000*l.* currency; and appointed her executrix, with a Mr. Yarborough. Samuel Ball dying soon after, his widow, who afterwards married Sealy the complainant, qualified on the will, and required a settlement of Samuel Ball's estate, from Henry Laurens the executor of Elias Ball. But he declined it, on the ground that by the testator Elias Ball's will, the whole estate went to the surviving child Mrs. Hunt, now that all the other children were dead. Some question was made about the regularity of Samuel Ball's marriage with the complainant Beulah, and the validity of his will; he being of weak mind, and under age, at the time of his marriage, will and death.

*138

But there being no proof of any imposition in the marriage, or of his imbecility amounting to more than ordinary weakness, these points were not insisted on at the hearing, and the cause was argued on the single ground, of what was the true construction of Elias Ball's will, with respect to the survivorship among his children. Read and E. Rutledge contended for complainants, that the bequest was not a joint tenancy, but a tenancy in common, and cited 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 292, 293. 3 Burr. 1881. 1 Salk. 226. 3 Bac. 478. Also 3 Atk. 17, to prove the right of Samuel to make a will, though under twenty-one years of age. Drayton for defendant cited, 2 Vern. 233, 617. 1 Vern. 23. 1 P. Wms. 304. 1 Wilson, 165, Hawes and Hawes. 1 Raymond, 441.

The court took time to consider this case, and in December, 1787, Chancellor HUTSON delivered the opinion of Chancellor MATHEWS and himself. Chancellor RUTLEDGE having been absent at the time of the argument, attending the convention at Philadelphia, gave no opinion. The opinion delivered is as follows:

"The single point which the court is in this case called upon to decide is, whether from the words of the will of Elias Ball, his children are to be considered as joint-tenants or tenants in common. It will contribute not a little, we presume, towards forming an opinion in this *case, to premise two fundamental and incontrovertible maxims, which ought always to govern chancery in their decisions in such cases. The first is, that in the construction or exposition of wills, the intention of the testator, as far as it may be collected from the words of the testament, subject to a liberal construction of law, should be primarily and principally regarded; and in the second place, that the words of the will, should if possible, be so construed and expounded, as all to stand together, or in other words, that they may all have their due effect and operation.—We now proceed to examine the will before us upon these principles.

*139

"The first devise runs in the words following: 'After all my just debts are paid, I give and bequeath my remaining estate, both real and personal, to be equally divided amongst my children.' The words 'equally divided,' or 'to be equally divided,' (whatever ambiguity may still adhere to them in the construction of deeds in the common law,) it has been long established in this court, beyond a possibility of doubt, that, in a will, they do, (unless otherwise clearly restricted or corrected,) uniformly create a tenancy in common, as well with regard to real as personal estate. Were we therefore to stop here, not the least shadow of doubt could exist. But the subsequent clause, in the words following, 'if my son William Ball, or any of my other children, happen to die, I, in that case, ordain and will the remaining part or parts of his, her, or their interests, to be equally divided among my surviving heir or heirs,' seems to induce somewhat of an apparent ambiguity. Should this clause not be admitted in the sense, which we shall in the sequel attempt to establish, it may constructively appear to constitute a survivorship, and to militate against the clause above recited; but when brought to the test of the aforementioned maxims, the seeming difficulty will, we presume vanish and disappear. The intention of the testator, as far as it may be collected from the words of the first clause, subject to construction of law, appears manifestly to be, that all his children should be placed upon the foot of perfect equality, and that they should equally and *alike share the benefit or advantage to be derived from his estate; but should the words in the subsequent clause, without restrictions or limitation prevail, this intention might be in the event totally defeated. Let us suppose, for instance, that the clause in question should, in respect to time, be left vague, indefinite and indeterminate as it at present stands, without any period for vesting being fixed, it would then follow by necessary and inevitable construction of law, that should three of the legatees marry and decease leaving issue, the survivor, who may have no issue, would take the whole estate, and might devise it away to an entire stranger, to the utter exclusion of the testator's grand-children. But this no one can consistently with reason, and the most obvious legal construction of the first mentioned clause, suppose to have been his intention. Hence arises the apparent and absolute necessity of fixing and ascertaining some determinate period, at which the estates intended to be conveyed should vest. And here we must, as necessity enforces, revert to the two fundamental maxims first laid down, that the apparent intention of the testator should be preserved, and that the words of the will should all be so construed and interpreted, as to have their full effect and operation. That the intention of the testator, as expressed in the first clause, according to legal construction, would not be preserved, if the time should be left entirely vague and indefinite, we think, has been made sufficiently to appear, as, in that case, one heir might eventually take to the entire exclusion of the representatives of the rest. And if the latter words should be supposed to create a joint-tenancy, the former words, 'to be equally divided,' which, as has been before observed, do indisputably, in the exposition of wills in this court, create a tenancy in common, would be altogether superfluous, nugatory and inefficient.

*140

"From this train of reasoning, the court find themselves constrained to adopt a construction, in which they think themselves warranted and supported by a crowd of concurrent authorities; which is, that when, in any instance, the words 'equally to be divided' are made use of *in one part of a will, and the naked and indefinite expressions 'if any should die, his share shall go to the survivor,' is introduced in another part, it must be intended, if any of the legatees should die in the life-time of the testator; as by that construction, every word of the will will have its effect and operation; and the constructive consequence of a lapsed legacy will be effectually barred. Nor do we think ourselves warranted to adopt any other construction, as the arrival at a certain age, or the event of marriage, these periods with respect to many purposes in law being wholly arbitrary, and entirely at the discretion of the testator.—To our interpretation, it has been objected by the counsel for the defendant, that it could not have been the intention of the testator, in the present instance, as he was in a declining state of health at the time of making his will, and did not survive long.—To this it may be opposed, that however nearly impending the period of dissolution may appear, it is not uncommon for mankind to flatter themselves with an extension of the thread of life; and we well know that a general prejudice, however ill-founded, prevails against making wills. The testator therefore might have intended, in case of recovery, that the present will should continue for a length of time.—But to support the contrary doctrine, the case of Hawes and Hawes has been quoted. Upon this case it is to be observed, that the opinion of the court was there grounded upon the custom of London, which fixes the precise time at which children are to take legacies, which is not the case here.

*141

"And the lord chancellor says, he thinks lord Cowper's reasoning, in the case of Bindon and Suffolk, was very right; that the surviving must be applied to some particular time, and not to a dying indefinitely. He thought, dying in the testator's life was the time intended; but the house of lords adjudged it to be the time of payment, from the nature of the debt, as it was on government security. But if there can be no other construction upon his will, he goes on to observe, then his shall prevail. But this custom does not prevail here, as was before observed, and there is no similar circumstance to designate *the time of payment over; but the legacy is entirely unfettered and unincumbered, and might have been transferable, the day after the death of the testator. To us it appears therefore, that the present case would by no means have warranted the reversal of the lords; but that lord Cowper's decree would have stood firm and unshaken. Nay it is supported by a subsequent determination, in 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 292, 293.—Upon the whole, we think ourselves fully warranted by law, reason, and precedent, to adopt the construction mentioned above, that the testator intended that the estate should pass to the survivors in case only of the decease of any of the legatees antecedent to his death.

*142

"And it is therefore decreed, that the defendant Henry Laurens, do render an account, and pay over to the complainants, the one half of the estate of Elias Ball, to which his son Samuel was, at the time of his death, and under the will of the said Elias Ball, his father, entitled: And the defendant do pay the costs of suit from the proceeds of the estate.

---

1 Desaus. 142

Case XXXVI.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

BOURKE v. BOCQUET.

(March, 1786.)

Specific performance decreed, on payment within a limited time.

This was a bill for the specific performance of a contract for a tract of land.

It was decreed, that it be referred to the master to state and report, what is the balance due on the contract in the bill mentioned: And that on payment thereof with interest, and of the costs of suit, within one month from this day, the defendant execute title to the complainant in bill mentioned.

---

1 Desaus. 142

Case XXXVII.

Creditors of M'KENZIE v. Administrator of W. BURROWS.

(March, 1786.)

Administrator of ancient master to pay to the creditors (suitors in this court) proportionably. Notification to creditors.

Ordered, that Joseph Atkinson, administrator of W. Burrows, (late master in chancery,) do pay over to the present master, the specie in his hands, as admitted by *his answer: And that a settlement be made by the master of the proportion due to the several creditors whose demands have been allowed: And that the master do settle the same, with such creditors out of the bonds and securities in his hands, as far as they amount, according to their several proportions: That Mr. Atkinson do account for interest on the money in his hands: And that the costs be paid out of the same.

*143

It was also ordered, that a notification should be published in the Gazette, calling on all persons claiming any of the money which was in the hands of Mr. Burrows, Esq. late master of this court, at the time of his death, and which has been paid over by his executors to W. H. Gibbes, Esq. the present master, to prefer and support their claims before the said master within twelve months next ensuing: And the said master is thereupon to make his report to this court.

---

1 Desaus. 143

Case XXXVIII.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

JOSIAH TATTNELL and Wife v. Executors of FENWICK.

(September, 1786.)

[Husband and Wife ⇐12.]

Husband suing for a legacy, directed to make a settlement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 58; Dec. Dig. ⇐12.]

Bill, answer, interrogatories and depositions read, and arguments heard on both sides—Whereupon ordered, that it be referred to the master to report what the complainant Harriet Tattnell is entitled to under her father's will: the funds for the payment thereof; and what will be a proper settlement to be made by her husband, the complainant, Josiah Tattnell.

---

1 Desaus. 143

Case XXXIX.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

DUPONT v. GOFFE and Others.

(December, 1787.)

[Ne Exeat ⇐11.]

Leave of absence for a month given to a person bound by ne exeat.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ne Exeat, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. ⇐11.]

On motion of Mr. Edward Rutledge, and with consent of Mr. Read, ordered, that C. B. Goffe, one of the defendants, have leave of absence for one month, notwithstanding the bond given on the writ of ne exeat, but without prejudice to the party complainant on the bail bond.

---

1 Desaus. *144

*Case XL.

Executors of JAMES LAURENS v. Executors of PHILIP HAWKINS.

(December, 1787.)

Executors authorized to retain and apply assets of estate to pay partnership debts.

[Ed. Note. Cited in Ex'rs of Drayton v. Drayton, 1 Desaus. 559.]

Bill, answer and exhibits read, and arguments by counsel, whereupon it was decreed, that the estate of Philip Hawkins be sold by the executors, agreeably to the terms of the instalment act; and that the executors retain for the use of the creditors of Hawkins, Petrie & Co. so much as shall be sufficient to satisfy Philip Hawkins's proportion of the debts of Hawkins, Petrie & Co. and that the costs of this suit be paid out of the sales of Philip Hawkin's estate.†

† It is understood that this order of the court was founded upon the fact, proved on the enquiry before the master, that the estate purchased in his own name by P. Hawkins, had been purchased and paid for with the copartnership funds.

1 Desaus. 144

Case XLI.

HAIG and Others v. COMMISSIONERS OF CONFISCATED ESTATES.

(December, 1787.)

[Judicial Sales ⇐27.]

Order on purchaser to shew cause why there should not be a re-sale, at his risk.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. § 52; Dec. Dig. ⇐27.]

On motion of general Pinckney, it is ordered, that James Neilson shew cause before the judges of this court, why the property called Greenwood's wharf, purchased by him at the sale directed by this court, to be made by the master thereof, should not be again sold, and the said James Neilson be answerable for any deficiency that may happen in the price for which the same may be re-sold; the said James Neilson having refused to give security for the purchase money, agreeable to the terms of sale.

1 Desaus. 144

Case XLII.

Ex parte THOMAS DRAYTON.

(December, 1787.)

[Insane Persons ⇐29.]

Commission of lunacy superseded, on proof of recovery of his senses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insane Persons, Cent. Dig. §§ 42, 140, 150; Dec. Dig. ⇐29.]

A petition was presented by Mr. Pringle in behalf of Thomas Drayton, setting forth that a commission of lunacy had been issued against him, and an inquisition found thereon; in consequence of which his person and estates, real and personal, were committed to the care of certain guardians: That for many months past the petitioner had recovered his perfect senses, and been of sound *mind, memory and understanding, as was manifested by the affidavits of his physician, (a man of skill and judgment,) and of several other persons.—Therefore he prayed that the commission might be superseded, and the inquisition quashed. And the said petition and affidavits in support thereof being read and fully considered, it was ordered, that there be a cassetur of the inquisition and supersedeas of the commission; and that the said Thomas Drayton be restored to his liberty, and the re-possession of his property.

*145

1 Desaus. 145

Case XLIII.

DR. WILLIAM READ v. PRINCE and Wife.

(December, 1787.)

[Ne Exeat ⇐12.]

Ne exeat suspended on terms prescribed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ne Exeat, Cent. Dig. § 14; Dec. Dig. ⇐12.]

On motion of Mr. Drayton, it is ordered, that the operation of the writ of ne exeat, as far as it relates to the defendant C. Prince personally, be suspended, on his executing in the presence of, and leaving with the master of this court, a power of attorney to some citizen of this state resident in the city, to join with his wife in making titles to the house and lot mentioned in the bill of complaint, and to abide any further order of this court: And that in the mean time all the estate, real and personal, of the deceased C. Lempriere, in the hands of the administratrix, be impounded.

1 Desaus. 145

Case XLIV.

JONATHAN SIMPSON v. R. GIBBES, Executor of Edward Fenwick, Deceased.

(December, 1787.)

[Wills ⇐744.]

A purchaser of an estate, charged with legacies, and impounded by order of the court, will not be permitted to hold the estate, nor be paid for buildings erected by him on it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1571; Wills, Dec. Dig. ⇐744.]

[Wills ⇐731.]

The legatee having carried off part of the estate, his part of the real estate held liable as a security to make good the loss.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1793–1800; Dec. Dig. ⇐731.]

[Vendor and Purchaser ⇐220.]

[The protection extended to the purchaser of the legal title, who pays the purchase money without notice of the outstanding equity, will not be extended to one who has no semblance of title.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 462; Dec. Dig. ⇐220.]

The complainant stated that Thomas Fenwick, a son and devisee and legatee of Edward Fenwick, became indebted to complainant in the year 1779; and in the year 1780, offered him the sale of a lot of land on the Bay of Charleston, which was devised to him by his father: That finding Thomas Fenwick could not pay him in any other way, he agreed to purchase the lot, and the price was fixed, by appraisement, at 620*l.* sterling.—Whereupon Thomas Fenwick executed titles for the lot to complainant on the 1st August, 1780; and after discounting his debt, there *remained a balance due to Fenwick of 300*l.* for which complainant gave his note of hand: That the title deeds were sent to complainant executed; at which time Mr. Hall and Mr. Sams happened to be at complainant's house—He mentioned to them what the deed was; and Mr. Hall informed him that Thomas Fenwick had no right to sell any part of his estate, by his father's will, until his sisters' legacies were paid; which complainant alledges was the first notice he ever had of any incumbrance on the said lot: That complainant afterwards questioned Thomas Fenwick on the subject, who acknowledged there was some incumbrance thereon; but that the rest of his estate being sufficient to answer every purpose of his father's will, he considered it of little importance: That complainant endeavoured to obviate the difficulty by various proposals to the said Thomas Fenwick, and even offered to rescind the contract altogether, and to receive his original debt from him, although complainant had incurred considerable expense by preparing to build thereon—But Fenwick refused his offers, and sued complainant on his note of hand, in the board of police,† and recovered the money. Thus unfortunately situated, complainant applied to Mr. Williams, then an eminent counsellor, on the safety of building on the said lot, as by its continuing unimproved, he could derive no advantage from the possession of it.—Mr. Williams informed complainant, that Thomas Fenwick's estate was sufficient to satisfy all the incumbrances on it, without having recourse to this lot; and that, at any rate, a court of chancery would allow for the expense of any improvements made thereon by him: That complainant, relying on this opinion, laid out considerable sums of money in buildings and improvements, on the lot in question: That complainant had no notice from the executor; and never *paid but one sum (75*l.* on the 14th August, 1780,) to Fenwick voluntarily—the balance he was compelled to pay by order of the board of police: whence he infers that he could not then (on the 14th August) have known of his being exposed to the incumbrances.

*146

*147

Complainant further complains, that this lot has lately been sold, with other parts of Thomas Fenwick's estate, by a decree of this court, to which the complainant was not a party, to discharge the incumbrances; in which decree it was ordered that no allowance should be made to complainant for the buildings erected by him; on the ground, as complainant understands, that the executor had given him previous notice; and that Thomas Fenwick had no right to sell: But complainant insists that he had no such notice from the executor or any person previous to the purchase: That the amount sales of the said lot, and other parts of Thomas Fenwick's estate, exceeds considerably the amount of the incumbrances thereon, imposed by his father's will, as appears by the master's report; but the executor refuses to apply any part of the surplus to reimburse complainant for his expenses aforesaid; which is the harder on the complainant, as the buildings placed by him on the said lot, certainly raised the value and price of the same, at the sale made by order of this court.

Complainant prays that the executor may be decreed to pay him the surplus of the price of the said lot and buildings, over and above the incumbrances imposed on Thomas Fenwick's estate by his father's will: And that some other allowance may be made him in compensation for his costs and expenses in the premises.

The defendant, the executor, in his answer, stated his ignorance of the transactions between complainant Simpson and Thomas Fenwick. All that he knew was, that some time about the end of the year 1780, or beginning of 1781, Thomas Fenwick endeavored to prevail on defendant to execute titles jointly with him for the lot to complainant, which defendant refused, and forbade said Thomas from selling the lot: That Mr. Williams called on defendant at complainant's request, to know if he would join *in the conveyance of the lot to complainant; but defendant refused, and stated to Mr. Williams, that independent of the charge of paying one of his sister's legacies, the said Thomas had carried off a great number of negroes, of his father's estate, beyond his proportion, the value of which would be more than his lands would sell for; and that he, defendant, would endeavour to recover back the land for the testator's children, in compensation for the negroes so carried off. Defendant admitted that complainant expended some money in repairing the buildings on the lot, and the value was thereby somewhat encreased; but that complainant incurred the expense after

*148

† The board of police was a court constituted by the authority of the British military commanders, then occupying Charleston as a garrison. It had none of the characteristics of a regular court of justice, according to British or American forms; and rested for its authority on no other foundation than the pleasure of the military commander-in-chief.—Its proceedings have never been recognized as legal in this country.

notice of the incumbrance, and claim of testator's estate thereon; and therefore the loss, if any, is in consequence of his own conduct; but defendant does not believe the injury to complainant to be great, as he let the stores, for some years, at a great rent: That defendant does not know whether the amount sales of the estate of Thomas Fenwick exceed the incumbrances imposed on it by the father's will; but defendant hopes, that on proof of the real loss sustained by the testator's estate, from Thomas's carrying off more than his proportion of the negro slaves, the surplus of his estate may be applied to make the same good; and that the balance only, if any, be paid to complainant, he at the same time accountable for the rents: Defendant thinks himself justified in refusing to reimburse complainant, inasmuch as the greatest part, if not the whole of the expense of building, was incurred subsequent to complainant's knowledge of the incumbrances on the said Thomas's estate, and the claim for taking away negroes.

On the hearing of this case, on the 18th and 19th December, it was contended for complainant, that he had no notice of the former order of the court of chancery, directing that no part of Edward Fenwick the testator's estate should be sold, till the debts and legacies were paid; the court of chancery being at the time of the purchase by the complainant in a state of annihilation, the British being masters of the country: That Thomas the son was devisee and owner of the lot of land, and had a right to sell it, subject only to the burthens imposed by the will: That

*149

Mr. Simpson the complainant was a fair purchaser, for valuable consideration, and ought to be protected: That the lot ought not to be taken from him, or that in all events, he ought to be paid for his great and expensive improvements.—The following cases were cited, 3 Bac. 642-5. 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 322, 333. 2 Vern. 30, 156, 600.

For defendant, it was insisted, that the complainant was informed, before he paid the money, that the devisee Thomas Fenwick had no right to sell the lot, unless subject to all the regulations of the will, which charged daughters' portions on the sons' estates; and that the estate was impounded by a then subsisting order of the court of chancery; and that Thomas's share of it was liable for the amount of the negroes of the estate, carried off by him, beyond his share.—The counsel cited, 3 P. Wms. 387, and 3 Atk. 392, Worsley v. Earl of Scarborough.

The court, on the 22d December, 1787, decreed that the bill should be dismissed with costs.

No reasons were put on record, but chancellor Mathews's notes of the case contain the following remarks: "The order of the court (impounding the estate) must have been made under an impression, that Thomas and Edward Fenwick were likely to make away with the estate; as such an order is unusual in any other case, where there are executors or trustees to carry into execution the will of the testator. The depredation was committed by Thomas Fenwick long before any debt was contracted with the complainant—Therefore the minor legatees were become creditors on Thomas Fenwick before any alienation. But if the sale is valid, on whom will the loss fall? On the two younger sons, who are to raise four of the portions, which could only be done by their utter ruin: For if almost all their negroes were taken away, their lands would produce no profit; consequently they would be sold to pay the incumbrance, so that they must be ruined, and Thomas Fenwick thereby benefitted so much more than his portion, as their loss amounts to. The deeds were executed on the 1st August, and no money paid (by the complainant) till the 14th August. Therefore from complainant's own shewing, it is highly pre*sumable it must have been on the day, or within a day or two after the execution of the deeds by Fenwick, that they were brought to complainant, at which time Mr. Hall gave him notice of the incumbrance. If after this he would venture to pay money, and to erect buildings, he did it at his own risk, and with his eyes open. The payment made by authority of the board of police, we have nothing to do with, and can pay no regard to it. Besides, the complainant is secured for his purchase money, (by a bond of indemnity from Thomas Fenwick, with the security of Mr. Valk, taken by advice of Mr. Williams.) The complainant therefore has no equity. The property was impounded by the court of chancery, and suit pending, at the time of the purchase. The minor legatees were fair and equitable creditors long prior to any debt contracted with the complainant. If relief were to be granted to complainant, it would be to the ruin of the two younger sons, and to the unjust emolument of Thomas Fenwick's estate, so far beyond what he was entitled to. The complainant had notice before he paid the money or erected the buildings: and besides he is otherwise secured, which renders the interposition of this court unnecessary—And to that security he must have recourse for relief."

*150

Drayton, Bee, Edward Rutledge for complainant; Hugh Rutledge and General Pinckney for defendant.

It was ordered that the interrogatorial part of bills be omitted; and that replications and rejoinders be disused; and that prolixity and unnecessary length of pleadings be avoided.

1 Desaus. 150

Case XLV.

JAMES LINDSAY and Others v. Administrators of LINDSAY.

(December, 1787.)

[Executors and Administrators ⊂⊃155]

Executors cannot on paying debts of estate, take the estate to themselves, without regular sale.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Richardson v. Manning, 12 Rich. Eq. 485.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 632, 633; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃155.]

[Equity ⊂⊃67.]

[Mere lapse of time, unless very great, will not bar a claim against an executor for a legacy.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 195; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃67.]

[Executors and Administrators ⊂⊃34.]

[A man, by marrying an executrix or administratrix, has the administration cast upon him.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 226; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃34.]

[This case is also cited in Hill v. Hill, 1 Strob. Eq. 24, regarding marriage settlements.]

The complainants brought their bill against defendants for an account of the rents and profits of their father's estate; and for distributive shares of his personal estate. The facts of the case were, that Patrick Lindsay, the fa*ther of complainant, died in the year 1744, leaving a widow and five children, and a small estate, which he divided among them by his will, giving his wife, (in case of her marrying again,) only a child's share of the personal estate. She qualified as executrix, and possessed herself of the estate, and made an inventory in March, 1747. The estate was in debt, but was considered able to pay its debts. Afterwards, in about two years, she married John Winter, a man of very small property. Winter possessed himself of the estate, lived on it, and received the rents and profits thereof, and applied them to his own use; except that the children were maintained on the plantation, on common country fare, and clothed in homespun cloth, made on the place. He sold some of the personal property to pay the debts; but retained a valuable woman slave, named Cloe, who has had a very large family of children and grand-children, who form the principal object of this suit. There was a small balance due at Lindsay's death for the slave Cloe, to the person from whom she had been purchased. This was paid—and it is insisted by Winter's representatives, that the payment was made by Winter with his own money. But this is at least doubtful; and the weight of testimony seemed to establish, that it was with money of the estate; all the proceeds of which came into his hands, from his marriage till his death. Mrs. Winter died in 1781 or 1782—Mr. Winter in 1785. He made no division of Patrick Lindsay's estate, but the whole of it came into the hands of his representatives, who also administered on the estate of P. Lindsay, with the will annexed.

*151

They are defendants to this suit, and they insisted, that the estate of Patrick Lindsay could not have paid its debts without Winter's aid, funds and management: That he maintained and brought up the children, the costs of which would have exhausted the estate: And that the executors of Lindsay, sensible of that, had consented to Winter's keeping to his own use, absolutely, the woman slave Cloe, and her children, and the stock, which was all that remained of the personal estate of Lindsay, to compensate him for his trouble and expense in bring*ing up the children, and paying the debts of the estate.

*152

The defendants also insisted that the children of Patrick Lindsay knew and acquiesced in all these circumstances; for they never brought any suit against Mr. Winter, during the life of himself, (though forty years elapsed between his marriage and death,) or his wife. They had indeed intimated some claims on Cloe and her children; which induced Winter before his death to desire his family, if ever such claim was attempted to be enforced, to make out an account against them for maintenance and support—but not otherwise.

The cause came to a hearing in December, 1787, and was argued by Hugh and Edward Rutledge for complainant, and by Pringle and General Pinckney for defendant.

For complainant it was insisted, that the statute of limitations will not run against legacies or distributive shares of an estate; and that the presumptions arising from the staleness of the claim, were rebutted by the facts that the complainants were brought up in great ignorance, and did not know their rights for a long time; and they were also restrained by respect for their mother, who, as acting executrix must have been sued together with Winter: That she did not die till 1782, and the court of chancery was not re-established till 1784; soon after which they brought their suit against Winter's representatives, he dying in 1785: That their claim for distributive shares was incontestible, as no act had been done to change the property: That executors were not at liberty under our act of 1745 to take the estate, even at an appraisement, and convert it to their own use.

For defendants, the great length of time, and the staleness of the claim were relied upon. It raised a presumption that the complainants had acquiesced in Winter's keeping the property absolutely, which could only have resulted from their consciousness that the full value of their father's personal estate had been exhausted by Winter, in paying debts and maintaining the children.

The court delivered its opinion, stating that the property in Cloe and her descendants remained in the complainants: That although by the act of assembly (of the *25th May, 1745, 3d sec.) executors are made liable for the full value of the property of the estate, which came to their hands, this was not intended to enable them to change the property, and take it to themselves at an appraised or estimated value; but the true intent and meaning of the act, (as appears by the preamble of this clause, and other parts of it,) was to prevent executors from changing or taking the property in any other way than by a fair, open, and public sale: And this court will support the real object of that law, whenever it can lay its hands on the property of the testator, without subjecting the parties to any singular hardship, by unravelling accounts and transactions of a very distant period, when it is probable many important papers might have been lost, and prejudice result to the parties, especially if the executors are dead. But such inconveniences cannot result here—the claim is for a specific property, which the defendants acknowledge is in being, and in their possession, the restoration of which is very simple. That the right is in the complainants there is no doubt. The executors had no right nor authority (if they really had attempted it) to transfer the property to Winter, on such a consideration as it has been contended they did. But to put the matter beyond all doubt, Winter, by marrying the widow and only acting executrix, became in her right an executor, and was equally with her a trustee for the children, and accountable as such; and not holding and accountable as a mere stranger. If defendant's statement of the accounts is allowed, in its full force, and that Winter paid the debts, yet it appears very strongly, that there was only a small balance (87*l.* old currency,) due on the debt for Cloe. It is proper that Cloe and her descendants should be decreed to complainants, reserving to Mrs. Winter's representatives, her sixth part under the will of her first husband Lindsay. But there ought not to be any account for the hire and labour of the negroes, because of the laches of complainants in not prosecuting their claims earlier.

*153

Decreed, that the negroes named in the exhibit C. (Cloe and her descendants,) be appraised and divided by lot, under the direction of the master, and that five sixths *of them in value, be delivered by defendants to complainants as their distributive shares of the estate of Patrick Lindsay, and in full satisfaction for such shares.—Costs divided.

*154

1 Desaus. 154

Case XLVI.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF BETHEL v. Executor of DONNOM.

(March, 1788.)

[Religious Societies ⟸9.]

Trustee cannot by his act alter the destination of funds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Cent. Dig. § 67; Dec. Dig. ⟸9.]

[Religious Societies ⟸23.]

A congregation with funds, becoming incorporated, has a right to the funds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Cent. Dig. § 150; Dec. Dig. ⟸23.]

This was a bill filed by complainants to have an account of the estate and of the profits arising from the personal estate formerly in the hands of Mr. James Donnom, as a trustee for a Presbyterian church then unincorporated. The congregation had been formed of persons residing in St. Bartholomew's parish, on the west bank of Ponpon river, and its vicinity; and the funds collected by voluntary subscription to uphold a church and parsonage for the use of the congregation and minister, near Ponpon river. The trustees were to be residents; and if they removed out of the parish, or declined acting, their places were to be supplied. James Donnom, the surviving trustee, had possession of the estate for a considerable time; and directed by his last will, that the property should go to certain persons whom he names, to be held in trust; and two-thirds of the income to be applied to support a minister at the church near Ponpon river; the other one-third to be applied to support a minister at the Saltcatcher church, (within the parish of St. Bartholomew, but above twenty miles from the church on Ponpon river,) to which place he, Donnom, had removed. The other facts and points in the case related merely to an account. The congregation became incorporated by the name of the Presbyterian church of Bethel in St. Bartholomew's parish. Their bill is to recover the whole property from defendant's representatives.

On hearing the arguments of counsel, the court was of opinion, "that Donnom had no right to divert the funds of the society to different purposes than what they were originally intended for, viz. for the meeting-house and parsonage at that time established on the west side of *Ponpon river: And whatever part of said society chose to move to another place (although in the same parish) it was a dereliction of their share of the funds of the society."—(See Chancellor Mathews's notes).

*155

The court decreed, "that it be referred to the master to state the accounts: And that the funds in bill mentioned be assigned over to complainants for the benefit of Bethel church."

Gen. C. C. Pinckney and Mr. E. Rutledge, solicitors.

---

1 Desaus. 155

Case XLVII.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

TODD and Wife, Executors of Darrell v. Executors of RIVERS.

(June, 1788.)

[Evidence ⟸462.]

Bonds apparently absolute may be shown, by evidence, to be merely counter securities.

[Ed Note.—Cited in Lloyd v. Inglis's Ex'rs, 1 Desaus. 339.

For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2134–2139; Dec. Dig. ⟸462.]

This was a bill filed by the complainants to set aside and cancel certain bonds and mortgages given by their testator to colonel Rivers, the defendants' testator. They purported to be absolute, but it was insisted for the complainants, that they were really given to counter secure colonel Rivers against certain debts, in which he was security for complainants' testator.

The defendants denied any knowledge of these bonds and mortgages being given as counter securities, and insisted upon them as absolute debts due to his estate.

On full examination the court was satisfied, from clear and indisputable evidence, founded partly on concurrent facts, proved by witnesses, and partly on colonel Rivers's own declarations, that part of these bonds and mortgages, though apparently absolute, were given by Mr. Darrell to colonel Rivers as counter security, and accordingly decreed, that on the bond to Mr. Burrows (which was given by Darrell for a house, and to which Rivers was security,) being discharged by Darrell's executors, the bond and mortgage (from Darrell to Rivers) should be delivered up and cancelled, and satisfaction entered thereon.

But there being no sufficient proof that the other bonds and mortgages from Darrell to

*156

Rivers were counter secu*rities, the court refused to decree them to be given up, and left them to be paid by Darrell's executors.

E. Rutledge for complainant.—C. C. Pinckney for defendant.

1 Desaus. 156

Case XLVIII.

THOMAS SMITH v. J. E. POYAS and Wife.

(June, 1788.)

[Wills ⟸727.]

Permission given by father's will, to his daughters, to reside on his plantation during their lives, gives a life estate, and they may plant there.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Nicholson v. Drennan, 35 S. C. 339, 14 S. E. 719; Newton v. Odom, 67 S. C. 7, 45 S. E. 105.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1748; Dec. Dig. ⟸727.]

[This case is also cited in Jacobs v. Mutual Ins. Co. of Greenville, 52 S. C. 118, 29 S. E. 533, without specific application.]

[For subsequent opinion, see 2 Desaus. 65.]

The testator Henry Smith devised his Goose-creek plantation to his son Thomas Smith (the complainant) and his heirs, and directs him to pay certain legacies to his daughters. In a codicil to the will the testator directs that his wife should have a right to dwell on the Goose-creek plantation, with liberty to plant thereon, and make use of the necessary fire-wood, timber, &c. and that each of his daughters should have a right to dwell on the said plantation, during their natural lives; after which it is to go to his son Thomas, and his heirs: And he discharges his son from the payment of the legacies to his sisters, which he had imposed by his will.—The wife is dead, the daughters are living, and reside on the plantation, and plant thereon—one of them married Mr. Poyas the defendant.

This cause came to a hearing on a case arising out of testator's will and codicil, the substance of which is stated above.

The complainant's counsel contended, that the permission given by the testator to his daughters to reside on the plantation, was a mere residence, not accompanied by any power to plant, or to clear land, or to cut timber for any other purpose than for fire-wood and other necessary purposes: That he gave his daughters pecuniary legacies, and could not have contemplated that on his four daughters marrying husbands who had negroes, that they should all settle on this single tract, and cut down all the timber to make four different plantations—which would waste and ruin the estate. He expressly gives his wife the right to plant; and though he gives the right of residence to the daughters in the same clause with the mother, he does not give them the right to plant. This withholding the gift of the right, was a distinct negative of the right.

*157

*The defendants' counsel contended, that the right of residence could not mean a mere naked living in the house. It was to be a home with all its advantages, and rights, and powers of improvement and enjoyment.

Where the law gives a thing, it gives impliedly whatever is necessary to the use of it. Where the use of a real or personal estate is given to one, it is now settled law that the thing itself is given; for life, where a life estate only appears to be intended: But if it is encumbered with legacies or money to be paid out of it, then it is considered, under the late decisions, as vesting an absolute estate. The counsel insisted, the defendants had a right to plant, as flowing necessarily from the right of residence for life, (which is really a life estate,) but not to commit waste. If waste was attempted, the complainant might obtain an injunction. The complainant has no right in the land till the death of the daughters, and the extinction of their rights. If he can derive no benefit, shall they have none? Could it be the father's intention that none of his children should plant this land? Surely not. He meant a full benefit to the daughters for life: At their death, an absolute estate is given to the son: He is discharged from paying certain legacies to the daughters, on the right of residence being given to them.—The counsel cited for defendant 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 400. Co. Inst. 53. 1 Vesey 265, 548, 281.

The court was of opinion, "that the daughters had a right (under the codicil) to reside on the plantation, and to plant there during their lives:"—(Chancellor Mathews's notes.) And accordingly decreed that the complainant's bill be dismissed with costs.

Bee and Smith for complainant.—E. Rutledge and C. C. Pinckney for defendants.

---

1 Desaus. *158

*Case XLIX.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

POSTELL and Wife, and SMITH and Wife v. Executors of JAMES SKIRVING.

(June, 1789.)

Commissioners to divide estate, reserving funds for annuities.

[Wills ⇐637.]

No time fixed by the will for legacy to vest, marriage will vest it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1520; Dec. Dig. ⇐637.]

[Husband and Wife ⇐12.]

Orders for settlement of estate, by husband of a minor, dispensed with in the case of a wife of full age consenting on an examination by the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 66; Dec. Dig. ⇐12.]

[Joint Tenancy ⇐4.]

[A joint tenancy is severed by an order of the court for a division.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Joint Tenancy, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. ⇐4.]

The court decreed after hearing counsel, that a writ of partition should issue to five commissioners, to divide and allot the real estate, in bill mentioned, between the complainants and their infant sister Elizabeth Skirving: That the executors do account for the personal estate of the testator, reserving such a capital, as will pay the annuity of £225 to the widow during her life; and another sum to James Liddell: That the residue be divided among the three daughters of Mr. Skirving.

Chancellor MATHEWS, in his notes on the brief of this case remarks, that the testator appoints no time by his will for the legatees to take either the real or personal estate, but the court decreed, (as in Sealy and wife v. Laurens, executor of Ball,) that marriage was such a consideration as ought to give a sanction to the vesting of an estate, when no time is appointed by the will: And that the joint-tenancy in the land, is severed by the order of this court for a division.

Afterwards a question arose respecting settlements to be made by Mr. Postell, and Mr. O. B. Smith, on their wives, of the estates acquired by them, whereupon the court made the following decree:

The court having in private examined Mrs. Postell, who has attained twenty-one years of age, and the said Mrs. Postell being very desirous that no settlement should be made on her; and it appearing to the court that Mr. and Mrs. Postell have constantly lived together in the greatest harmony; and he being a gentleman of fortune in his own right, it is not requisite that he should make any settlement on his said wife. With regard to Mr. O. B. Smith, his wife is not of age to make such request as Mrs. Postell has done, (although the court entertains a similar opinion of him as of Mr. Postell,) they find themselves bound to order that the said O. B. Smith do make the usual settlement on his wife, of the fortune she is enti*tled to from her father; that is to say, that the same be settled under the direction of the master, in trustees, in trust for his use during their joint lives. If she survives him, then to her heirs, executors and administrators for ever: If he survives her, she leaving issue, then to him for life, and after his decease, to such issue: If he survives her, without her leaving issue, (or leaving issue, such issue should die in his life time, and without issue,) then to him, and his heirs, executors, and administrators for ever.

*159

1 Desaus. 159

Case L.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

BOWMAN and Wife v. T. MIDDLETON.

(December, 1788.)

[Judicial Sales ⇐27.]

Issue directed to try title to land, before a purchaser compelled to accept the title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 52, 54, 97–99; Dec. Dig. ⇐27.]

On shewing cause why a specific execution of the contract made by Thomas Middleton, for the purchase of the brick house tract of land, late the property of Mr. Cattell, deceased, and sold under a decree of this court, should not be directed, and on motion of Mr. Parker, defendant's solicitor, with consent of Mr. Moultrie for complainant,—it is ordered, that an issue be directed to ascertain whether the said Mr. Cattell died entitled in fee simple to all the lands contained within the lines of the plat of the said tract, exhibited at the sale, or what part thereof: In which issue the complainants are to be considered as plaintiffs in ejectment, and that the said plat be filed, and be of record in this court.

1 Desaus. 159

Case LI.

JOHN RUTLEDGE and Others v. Executor of Mr. WILLIAMSON.

(December, 1789.)

Life estate of wife to be valued by master.

[Executors and Administrators ⇐495.]

[The delivery up of bonds by an executor under an order of court is not such a payment of money as to entitle him to commissions.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 2097; Dec. Dig. ⇐495.]

[Executors and Administrators ⇐497.]

[An executor is not entitled to commissions for receiving interest on money loaned by the testator, and he will be left to his action at law for compensation for his extra services.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 2122; Dec. Dig. ⇐497.].

[Life Estates ⇐27.]

[A court of equity may decree a sale of land subject to a life estate in a third person, directing compensation for the life estate.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. § 49; Dec. Dig. ⇐27.]

Chancellor Rutledge withdrew from the bench.

On reading the master's report, and on motion of general Pinckney, solicitor for complainants, it was ordered and decreed, that the real and personal estate of the said Wm. Williamson be sold by the master, on certain terms prescribed by the court: And that it be referred to the master to compute the value of the life estate of Mrs. *Williamson, (the widow,) in the estate or property to be sold.†

*160

General Pinckney for complainants.—Bee, for defendant.

† In this cause two important questions were decided relative to executors' commissions. On the brief of the bill and answers in this case, prepared for the use of chancellor Mathews, there are the following words in his own handwriting: "In this case, Thompson, the executor, (of Williamson,) charged the usual commission, on delivering up certain bonds, ordered by this court to be delivered up to Gadsden and Bonsall, as so much money by him paid: But as the law says, an executor shall receive two and a half per cent. for monies received, or paid, the court could not consider the mere delivery of a bond to be a payment—therefore disallowed this charge.

He (the executor) also charged ten per cent. commissions on receiving the interest on money let out by the testator, but as the law only allows this charge on interest money received by the executor, on money which had by him been let at interest, and made a capital of, it was also disallowed: And referred him to his action at law for compensation for his (extra) services, as the law itself directs."

[To this action the executor accordingly resorted: but the jury did not see any thing in the claim to justify the allowance of extraordinary compensation.—The verdict was against the executor.]—Editor.

1 Desaus. 160

Case LII.

Present—Chancellors Hutson and Mathews.

QUINCE v. CALLENDER and Others.

(March, 1789.)

[Interest ⇐2.]

Interest of this state allowed, where the contract, though made in North Carolina, had reference to lands in this state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. §§ 2, 55; Dec. Dig. ⇐2.]

The master having represented to the court that the defendants in this cause had objected to the allowance of seven per cent. as not being the legal interest of North Carolina, where the marriage bond, in bill mentioned, was dated, the court were of opinion, that as the lands on which the settlement was made, lay in this state, the interest of this state should be allowed: And therefore ordered, that the interest of seven per cent. being the legal interest thereof, should be allowed.

1 Desaus. 160

Case LIII.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

WILLIAM RUGGE v. RICHARD ELLIS.

(December, 1788.)

[Specific Performance ⟸10.]

Court refused to decree specific execution of contract, in a hard case, and where the other party had not complied with terms.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 23; Dec. Dig. ⟸10.]

The bill filed in this case was for the specific execution of a written agreement, entered into by R. Ellis with *the agent of Wm. Rugge, on the 10th August, 1785, by which he contracted, in consideration of £3000 to convey two tracts of land, called the old and new quarter house, on Charleston neck; the former containing thirty-eight and a half acres, and the latter one hundred and fifty acres; bounded in the manner described in the agreement; and intended to comprize all the land known by the names of the old and new quarter-house, which Ellis had bought of John Creighton. Ellis was to keep possession till the 1st of January ensuing, and to pay a shilling rent, and then deliver quiet possession to Rugge.

*161

The agent of Rugge on his part, by a counter agreement of the same date, (10th August, 1785,) agreed to pay and secure the consideration of £3000 as follows: To assign a bond of P. Butler to said R. Ellis, on which there was then due £1350 a note of D. J. Greene of £500 and to mortgage the new quarter house tract for the balance of £1150 of said purchase money.

The complainant charges that the bond of P. Butler was assigned and delivered to Ellis; and complainant has requested of defendant the completion of the said contract, the execution of good titles, and the delivery of the possession to complainant. But defendant has always refused to comply with his agreement, under pretense that the bond of P. Butler was partly paid off; though the fact was not so, and complainant has urged defendant to bring suit to try that question, but defendant has neglected to do so. And complainant offered to perform his other stipulations whenever the defendant would execute titles: That defendant keeps possession of the property, and has committed waste thereon, in the buildings and woods, and refuses to deliver possession to complainant, or to execute titles: The complainant further charges that he has discovered that the new quarter house tract, does not contain one hundred and fifty acres, as contracted for, but only sixty acres; notwithstanding which the complainant offered to comply with the contract on his part, whenever the defendant would execute titles, only deducting for the deficiency, in a rateable proportion, and making compensation for the damages done by defendant to the premises. The bill *prays that the defendant may be decreed to execute titles, for the said two tracts of land, and to deliver possession thereof to complainant, and to make a deduction from the purchase money is a rateable proportion for the deficiency of ninety acres; and to account for the rents and profits, and to make compensation for the damages done.

*162

The defendant Ellis, in his answer, admitted the contract as stated by the bill. He admits that in pursuance of the agreement, the bond of P. Butler was delivered to him, the note of D. J. Green tendered him, and the mortgage of the land offered him: But he says that P. Butler refused to pay the bond, when payment was demanded, alleging that he had made a large payment thereon, for which he was entitled to credit, which defendant believes was true: That however, he put the bond in the hands of an attorney for suit, but judgment hath not yet been obtained on it—With respect to D. J. Green's note, he gave notice to defendant that he had paid it off wholly—Defendant submitted his case to the court, hoping that as complainant had not paid him a shilling for the purchased premises, that he (defendant) may be either released from the contract, or secured in his possession till the sums alleged by complainant to be due on the bond and note, shall be ascertained to be really due; in which case he will readily comply with his contract.—Defendant admits that there is not the quantity of one hundred and fifty acres within the lines of the tract called the new quarter house; but he denies that he intended to deceive the complainant, or that he knew the quantity to be less, previous to the sale: That when he left Charleston to join the American army, he delivered to the care of James Rugge all his titles and papers respecting one of the quarter tracts: That the papers relating to the other tract were lost during the war; but that James Rugge, (the agent of William Rugge, in the contract with defendant,) was as well acquainted with the lines as the defendant: That the sale was not made with a view to any particular quantity, but to comprize all that defendant had purchased from Creighton; and defendant desired Rugge to satisfy himself at the register's office, as to the quantity and boun*daries of the land, which he informed defendant he had done. Under these circumstances the defendant thinks it would be an extreme hardship if he were compelled to make any deduction from the price, for any deficiency in the land. Defendant denies waste, farther than the cutting down timber for the supply of his house-hold in firewood.

*163

The cause came on to a hearing in December, 1788. No trace of the argument is preserved; but Chancellor MATHEWS remarks, on the back of his brief, "that the court refused to carry the agreement into execution—for he who seeks equity must do equity; and as defendant offered to annul the agreement, if the complainant was not satisfied with the land as it was, the court thought it a reasonable and an equitable offer; for to compel the defendant to abate pro rata, for the deficiency, would be such a reduction of the price, as would bear too hard on him; especially too as Butler's bond had been partly paid before the assignment to the defendant; and Green's note was entirely paid."

It was therefore ordered and decreed, that the bill be dismissed, each party to pay his own costs.

Read and Pringle for complainant.—E. Rutledge and general Pinckney for defendant.

---

1 Desaus. 163

Case LIV.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

BOWMAN and Wife v. MIDDLETON.

(October, 1789.)

Court ordered new trial, in a case where a verdict was given on an issue directed here.

On hearing Messrs. Moultrie and Pringle, solicitors for complainants, on a question for a new trial at common law, on an issue formerly directed and verdict found for defendant; And on hearing Mr. Parker, solicitor for defendant against the motion, ordered, that a trial at law be had de novo. The court also recommended that in consequence of a difference of opinion in the surveyors employed in surveying the lands in dispute, that other surveyors be called in.

---

1 Desaus. *164

*Case LV.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

Ex parte H. C. FLAGG and RACHEL, His Wife.

(December, 1789.)

Court refused to exonerate executors.

A petition was presented by general Pinckney, praying that the petitioners might be appoin'ed guardians of the persons and estates of the infant children of the petitioner Rachel, by a former marriage. On motion ordered, that the prayer of the petition be granted so far as respects the guardianship of the persons of the infants. But the court refused its aid to exonerate and acquit H. Allston, surviving executor of W. Allston, jun. deceased, of his care and direction of the said infants' estate.

---

1 Desaus. 164

Case LVI.

Present—Chancellors Hutson and Mathews.

Executrixes and Executors of General GREENE v. JOHN FERRIE.

(June, 1790.)

[Guaranty ⟸100.]

A person guarantees the debt of a commercial house; the partners supposing there are profits, divide some of the funds and allot to one partner a bond, with which he purchases a plantation: That plantation shall be liable to the guarantee on his satisfying the debt of his principals.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 112; Dec. Dig. ⟸100.]

It appeared to the court in the investigation of this cause, that John Banks, in September, 1782, purchased in Charleston, of Newcomen & Collet, and Harris & Blachford and others, goods to a considerable amount, on conditions mentioned in articles of agreement; and that Ferrie & Patton, by bonds of the same date, guaranteed that payment should be made to them, in the particular mode specified in the said articles, which have been exhibited in this cause. It also appeared by an agreement made between Banks & Ferrie, on the 22d of October, 1782, (reciting the above purchase,) that Ferrie is interested one third in the said purchases. It further appeared, that on the 30th of June, 1783, an account was stated by Banks & Ferrie of the goods purchased as above, which they termed the Charleston speculation; and the profits on them were estimated at one hundred and eighty-five pounds per cent. on the first costs; and that in consequence, Ferrie's third being set down at seven thousand two hundred and fifteen pounds eleven shillings and three pence, a debt due to the house of John Banks & Co. by *Pierce, White & Call, was assigned by Banks to Ferrie, towards payment of that third; and that Ferrie obtained from Pierce, White & Call, the plantation called Nelville, towards satisfaction of that debt. It further appeared, that general Greene, in April, 1783, guaranteed to Newcomen & Collet and others, payment of their debts by Banks & Ferrie and others. It appeared also to the court, that a considerable part of the goods of the Charleston speculation (to a larger amount than the sum Ferrie's share of the profits was estimated at) was not paid for. And they were of opinion, that Banks had no right to make such assignment to Ferrie under an idea of profits, before such profits were really and actually ascertained. And it also having appeared that the said Nathaniel Greene had given his private bonds to said Newcomen & Collet, for the payment of the debt which he had guaranteed. The court, after a full discussion, decreed, that the plantation called Nelville in bill mentioned, be sold by the master, on a prescribed credit, with interest on bonds, to remain subject to the further order of this court; and that the defendant Ferrie join in the conveyance of the premises: That an account be taken by the master of the profits on the goods purchased by John Banks, of Harris & Blachford, Newcomen & Collet and others, and of the balance still due on those purchases; and of what general Greene and his representatives have received towards satisfaction of the guarantee entered into by him as in bill mentioned. —And the master having afterwards reported, that in obedience to the said decree, the said plantation called Nelville had been sold, and that the defendant Ferrie has joined in the conveyances of the premises, thereby accounting for the fund which the complainants have alleged to be vested in the said plantation: But that the profits on the said goods (if any) have not been and probably could not be ascertained, as the parties who are possessed of the said books, are without the jurisdiction of the court.—the court therefore decreed, that the master, after applying such of the securities as shall be sufficient to satisfy a mortgage to which *the land was subject when purchased, shall deliver to the executors of general Greene the remainder of the securities, for which the said plantation was sold: And that the said Ferrie be discharged from any further claim of the complainants, on account of the said speculation; unless it shall appear from the return of the commission sent forth for the purpose of taking a statement of profits, that the goods of the Charleston speculation have sold for less than prime costs, in which case the said Ferrie shall be obliged and he is hereby decreed to pay to the complainant one third part of the said deficiency, in conformity to his agreement with John Banks, on the 22d of October, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two.

*165

*166

E. Rutledge for complainant.—Gen. C. C. Pinckney for defendant.

1 Desaus. 166

Case LVII.

At a meeting in the chambers of the honourable Judge Mathews. WILLIAM WIGHTMAN and SARAH, His Wife v. JOSEPH and CHARLES BROWN, Executors of Joseph Brown, Deceased.

(July, 1790.)

[Wills ⇐747.]

Injunction to restrain executors from committing waste or selling estate of testator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1933; Dec. Dig. ⇐747.]

The bill was for an account and settlement of an estate.—On motion of Mr. Pringle, solicitor for complainants, and cause shewn in support thereof, it is ordered, that an injunction do issue to restrain the defendants from committing waste and selling or disposing of any of the remaining part of the testator's real estate, until the further order of this court.

The court afterwards decreed, that the executors should account and pay over to complainant and his wife, who was a legatee, what should appear to be due to them, and ordered a reference to the master for that purpose: And that the executors (who were the testator's sons and devisees) should sell as much of the real estate of their testator as would be sufficient to pay the legacy, in preference to the private creditors of the executors and devisees, who were much embarrassed in their affairs.

1 Desaus. *167

*Case LVIII.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

WATLINGTON v. HOWLEY, BURKE, BAKER, and Others.

(December, 1787.)

Bill taken pro confesso.
Complainant to give security.

[Judgment ⇐68.]

Judgment confessed by executor on false pretences decreed to be fraudulent and void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 113, 116, 118, 120, 123, 125, 127; Dec. Dig. ⇐68.]

[Executors and Administrators ⇐168.]

Sale of certificates by executrix pendente lite, decreed to be fraudulent, and the note obtained for them be subjected to the debts of the estate: But that the purchaser of the note should be paid what he actually advanced for it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 644, 646; Dec. Dig. ⇐168.]

[Equity ⇐420.]

[Though an absent defendant is by the statute allowed four years in which to come in and answer a bill taken pro confesso against him, the decree will be treated as final in the meantime, and will be enforced.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 970; Dec. Dig. ⇐420.]

[Lis Pendens ⇐24.]

[After a bill against an executor, to restrain him from disposing of certain securities, had been taken pro confesso, he sold the securities. Held, that the lis pendens, and, a fortiori, the decree, were notice to the purchaser of the rights of the plaintiff.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Lis Pendens, Cent. Dig. § 42; Dec. Dig. ⇐24.]

On reading the register's certificate that due notice has been given of filing this bill, and no appearance entered for defendant, on motion of Mr. Read, ordered, that the bill be taken pro confesso against H. M. Burke and John Baker, two of the defendants, named in complainant's bill, and that a decree be prepared accordingly; on the complainant's giving security to abide such order as may be made on the defendants' appearing and paying such costs as the court shall order. And that it be referred to the master to consider and receive such security in the terms of the act of assembly of the 21st March, 1784, as he may judge sufficient in the said cause.

March, 1790.

After many preparatory orders, the cause came to a hearing before Chancellors Hutson and Mathews.

The bill charged that Mrs. Howley, the executrix of R. Howley, had combined with Burke and others to defraud the testator's estate, and defeat the just claims of his creditors: And that for such purpose she and Burke pretended that certain valuable certificates of public debt, which belonged to the estate, were their private property; and they clandestinely sold them, and took a note of hand from the purchaser, and passed away the same, at an inferior price, to George Parker, who is charged as a confederate and made a defendant. The bill sought to set aside these transactions, and to have an account of the estate.

Mr. Read for complainant contended, that when the note was passed away, this suit had been instituted: That this was lis pendens, and that is notice to all the world—A blank endorsement of a note conveys no interest in it—Buller, 275–8. A bare endorsement of a note does not transfer any property—1 Salk. 126, 130. Raym. 872, 1361. A note or bill given, payable out of a particular fund, not negotiable—Strange 1271: Viner 127. A bill filed and subpœna served is sufficient notice—2 P. Wms. 482.

*168

*Mr. E. Rutledge for complainant insisted, that mala fides attached to the whole contract. In the case in Brown, the note had been purchased before the bill filed. In the case of Simpson v. the executors of Fenwick, the decree was in the desk of the counsel, yet deemed to be a sufficient notice against Simpson the purchaser. 3 Atk. 392. 1 Atk. 463.

Mr. Pringle for defendant contended, that an executor has a right to alienate the property of testator; and if he does so improperly it is a devastavit, and he must be answerable out of his own estate, but the alienation is valid. There was no proof that the defendant Burke had not paid a valuable consideration for the note; Mrs. Howley, the executrix, in her answer admits that he did—viz. 250*l*. 1 Burr 452. Douglas 611—A bill of exchange with a blank endorsement, although stolen, is recoverable against the maker or drawer by an innocent holder or endorser—A blank endorsement is to all the world; it is equal to its having been made payable to bearer.—As to the lis pendens, see 1 Vesey 244. 3 Atk. 243.

June, 1790.

The court took time to consider, and at its present sitting delivered its decree as follows:

"All that we conceive necessary to be done at present with respect to Mrs. Howley is, to refer the matter to the master, to enquire what part of the testator's estate came into her hands, how the same has been disposed of, and what part thereof is now in her possession or power, and to report accordingly.

The next defendant Baker, having suffered the bill to be taken pro confesso as against him, the law clearly points out in what manner he is to be proceeded against.

The defendant Milligan having positively denied all the charges in the bill against him, we shall proceed to the last defendants, Burke and Parker, who will more immediately attract our attention in considering that part of the bill which relates to the note of hand in question. On this head the primary and most essential subjects of consideration are, whether the certificates given for this note were the property of the estate of Richard Howley; and next, whether they were fairly sold for a valuable *consideration. The bill charges, that the certificates were the property of the estate of Howley, and that the transactions respecting them, between Mrs. Howley and Burke, and the note said to be given as a valuable consideration for them, were founded in fraud. And Burke, one of the principal actors in the business, having suffered the bill to be taken pro confesso against him, has tacitly acknowledged the charges in the bill. The question then is, whether, and how far, the fraud in this case, will effect the note in Parker's hands, who solemnly avers himself to have been a fair and bona fide purchaser, for a valuable consideration, without notice of the fraud, or any determination of this court in consequence thereof. This is a question of the highest importance, and for that reason we have taken unusual time to consider it. On this court the security of property in the hands of executors and administrators materially depends, and if a strict guard is not kept over their conduct, it would be very easy for them to waste an estate of whatever value, in the most fraudulent manner, to the great injury of creditors and legatees. That an executor has a right to dispose of the property of the testator for the payment of debts, is unquestionable. If then the creditors of an estate should see the property of the testator, their debtor, frequently disposed of, and no part of the proceeds applied to the extinguishment of their claims, and, from an apprehension of some fraudulent conduct in the executors, should thereupon institute a suit in this court, to oblige them to account, and pending such suit, the executors should still continue to find purchasers for, and to dispose of, the property of the estate, regardless of the claims of its creditors, and no remedy could be applied to the evil, the consequence would be, that both the estate and creditors might be ruined, and the superintending powers of this court, over the conduct of executors, be rendered entirely nugatory. How far the lis pendens alone might be deemed sufficient notice, is a question not necessary for us at present to determine; for in this case, there are much stronger grounds of notice, as there had been decrees against several of the defendants, and in particular *against Burke, before the purchase of the note by Parker. Can it ever be admitted then, that after such decree, (and which at present must be considered as final against Burke,) that a purchaser is not to be charged with notice? This is a doctrine too absurd to require a serious refutation. It is well known that decrees of this court are equally binding with judgments at law, and it is a maxim, that ignorance of the law excuses no man. Therefore Parker's setting up a want of knowledge of the fraudulency of the note, cannot avail him against a solemn decree of this court. The case of Simpson and Fenwick has been quoted as a case in point, and we think it is.

*169

*170

"With regard therefore to the decree being sufficient notice, we think the cases are parallel, and a fortiori in this case, Simpson being a stranger and out of this state at the time the decree was passed, and if the decree in that case was deemed sufficient notice, so must it be in this.†

*171

*"This question then arises, how far the original fraud will attach itself to the transaction, so as to render all subsequent dealings relative to the subject of the fraud, equally fraudulent. We have met with a case in 2d Vesey, 516, How v. Weldon and Edwards, which we think contains strong features of the principal case on this point." —[The court then proceeded to examine that case minutely, and to apply it to the one under consideration, declaring it to be conclusive.]

"We have said the decree v. Burke must be considered as final, and carry with it all the force of a judgment at law. It may be necessary here to explain our reasons for this opinion, that no doubt might be left on the matter. It is true, the act for establishing this court allows the party against whom a bill is taken pro confesso, four years to come in and answer, if without the limits of the United States—as is the case at present with Burke: But until he does come in and answer, the decree must be considered as final, and carried into execution; for we must consider this case upon the same principles *as in the case of a bill of review or rehearing. In neither of these cases is the decree appealed from ever suspended, even after the motion is granted; much less then can it be

*172

† The doctrine of lis pendens is of great importance, and the neglect of it is frequently of great prejudice to purchasers. The lis pendens is, of itself, notice to a purchaser; and will set aside his purchase, though he gave valuable consideration, and had no actual notice. Even lord chancellor King, who was one of the strictest common law lawyers that ever sat on the chancery bench, states this to be the doctrine to prevent the justice of the court being evaded; and is founded on sound reasons; analogous to the real action at common law, where, if the defendant aliens after the pendency of the writ, the judgment in the real action shall overreach such alienation. But lord chancellor King said, the rule though a necessary one, worked so much hardship on a fair purchaser for valuable consideration, without actual notice, that in such a case, if there was any defect of proof, he would not help the party by letting in new proof after publication—Nor would he give leave to amend. See Sorrell v. Carpenter, 2 P. Wms. p. 482, 483.

The controversy in court respecting a will is lis pendens, and the grantee of the heir, or of the devisee, would be bound. See Garth v. Ward, 2 Atk. 174.

And this doctrine of notice is carried so far, that if a man gets notice of an equitable lien or incumbrance on the estate, after his purchase and after paying part, and after bond given, it is sufficient notice, and he ought not to go on. Tourville v. Nash, 3 P. Wms. 307. Or if he has notice after payment of the money, but before the execution of the titles. Wigg v. Wigg, 1 Atk. 382, 384.

The lis pendens, after the bill is filed, commences from the service of the subpœna. But the question must relate to the estate, and not *merely to collateral matter, such as money secured on it. Worsley v. Earl of Scarborough. 3 Atk. 392. And a bill to perpetuate testimony of witnesses, is a sufficient lis pendens. Garth v. Ward, 2 Atk. 174.

*171

In the case of Sorrell v. Carpenter, (3 P. Wms. 482, 483,) lord chancellor King says, "though this court will oblige all to take notice of its decrees, as much as of judgments, yet there does not seem to be the same reason for obliging people to take notice of the filing of a bill. But lord chancellor Hardwick, a few years later, (1746,) said, "that there is no such doctrine in this court, that a decree made here shall be an implied notice to a purchaser, after the cause is ended; but it is the pendency of the suit which creates the notice."

It is difficult to form an opinion between two such authorities; but it would seem reasonable that if the mere pendency of a suit should be implied notice to all the world that the right was in controversy, that a decree settling that right should be a higher notice, to deter and prevent purchasers from buying in opposition to the decree. But where a thing assigned is only a chose in action, though the assignment be without notice, yet as no legal estate passes, the assignment which is prior in time must take place. See latter part of the case of Tourville v. Nash, 3 P. Wms. 308—See too 1 Schoals and Lefroy, Rep. 152.—See the cases of purchasers without notice, collected in Fonbl. 2d. b. ch. 6, § 2, p. 151. Sudgen, Law of Vendors, 119, 476, 479, 488. Cooper's Justinian, in the notes, p. 473.

suspended in this case, from the mere contingency of Burke's coming in at some future day and answering the bill. If that should be the case, the cause will be then again opened, and he might avail himself of any equity he might have, in the same manner that a person could do on assigning error in a bill of review. So at law—in case of a motion for arrest of judgment being allowed, the party in whose favour the judgment is, is not deprived of the benefits thereof till a final hearing and decision on such motion, but can in the mean time avail himself of all the benefits derived to him from it. On the whole, we are of opinion, and it is decreed, that the defendant Sarah Howley do account before the master for such part of the estate of Richard Howley as came to her hands, or was in her power as his executrix,—how the same has been applied,—and what part thereof remains in her possession or power, and that he report accordingly: That the judgment confessed by Sarah Howley to John Baker be considered as fraudulent, and null and void: That the purchase of the certificates, said to be made by H. M. Burke to S. Howley be deemed fraudulent, and the note obtained by him from Jacob Reid for the sale thereof, be considered as the property of the estate of Richard Howley, and that Parker, the present holder thereof, be ordered to deliver up the same to the complainant, he indemnifying Parker for what shall appear to have been bona fide paid by him for it, to be ascertained by the master: That Corbett do pay his own costs in this suit, and the remainder be paid out of the estate of Richard Howley."

July, 1791.

Afterwards the master reported, that the consideration given by George Parker for the note of hand in question, was £190 on the 1st May, 1788, which with interest to the 2d August, 1791, amounted to £233. 4s. 6d. which report was confirmed.

---

1 Desaus. *173

*Case LIX.

Present—Chancellors Hutson and Mathews.

JAMES POSTELL v. Executors of JAMES POSTELL.

(October, 1790.)

[Conversion ⇐15.]

Lands ordered to be sold, considered as money.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conversion, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. ⇐15.]

[Equity ⇐429.]

[Where it appeared that the decision of the court of equity under a former organization was clearly erroneous, such decree was modified.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 1022; Dec. Dig. ⇐429.]

This case was for the settlement of an estate, and the construction of a will. It was fully argued by general Pinckney, and Mr. E. Rutledge, Mr. Bee and Mr. Desaussure, the parties' solicitors—but no traces of the arguments have been preserved.

The court after some days, delivered its opinion on the points in controversy, a few only of which deserve notice.—The court gave its decretal order briefly, merely stating the points, and deciding on them.

4th point.—The court have with great attention examined both the wills of the testator, but cannot conceive upon what principle the court at that day† could have been governed, in making the decree they then did; it appearing to us as plain a question as ever was brought into this court, that the will of 1770, never having been legally revoked, the limitation over of Gerardeau's real estate, to the surviving sons, must have its full operation; for there does not appear to be even a constructive intention to defeat that clause, in either of the wills, supposing that they could legally be taken together as such, for the very words of limitation in the first are repeated in the second (intended) will.—We agree perfectly with them, that the £10,000, to Gerardeau must be considered as real estate, but that on his death it went over to the surviving sons: Therefore the former decree must be thus amended.

6th point.—The lands directed to be sold, and which were sold, must be considered as money, and consequently equally divided among the surviving children.

7th, 8th & 9th points.—We agree with, and establish the former decree on these points.

† The court here spoken of, was anterior to the organization of the court in 1784.

---

1 Desaus. *174

*Case LX.

Present—Chancellors Hutson and Mathews.

BELLINGER, Executor of Skottowe v. J. L. GERVAIS.

(September, 1790.)

[Principal and Agent ⇐62.]

Agent not liable for depreciated money which perished in his hands.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 102; Dec. Dig. ⇐62.]

Commissions to agent, two and a half per cent. on money received and paid, and one per cent. on delivering up bonds.

This case related to the settlement of the affairs of the late Mr. Skottowe, which had been in the hands of Mr. Gervais as his agent, during the war. The principal question related to some depreciated paper money, which sunk in his hands. The court was of opinion that, as the defendant swore positively he never had applied to his own use any of the money received for Skottowe, he ought not to be accountable for it in any other way than the depreciated paper in his hands. He could not loan it during the war, and the times were such as to embarrass every man in deciding what was best to be done with funds.—On the claim of commissions for monies actually received and paid away by defendant, (except the depreciated paper,) the court, after hearing the master's report, decreed, that the defendant be allowed two and a half per cent. on receiving, and two and a half on paying or remitting the money received; and one per cent. for delivering over the bonds and notes due to the testator. —Each party to pay their own costs, but Mr. Bellinger to deduct his from the funds of the estate.

This is all that appears entered in the register's book: But in chancellor Mathews's notes of the case, accompanying the brief, are the following words: "And that the above be the standing rule with regard to attornies or agents."

C. C. Pinckney, complainant's solicitor.—E. Rutledge, defendant's solicitor.

1 Desaus. 174

Case LXI.

Present—Chancellors Hutson and Mathews.

A. BETHUNE and WILLIAM COOKE v. BERESFORD and Wife, and SAUNDERS and Others.—WARD and Others v. SAME.

(September, 1790.)

Bills to have payments out of the settled estate of the wife, on bonds in which she joined with her husband.

[Husband and Wife ⟸31, 147.]

That Mrs. Beresford had not a separate estate, in præsenti, which would constitute her a feme sole—and which she could bind by her contracts: But the whole income being her husband's under the settlement, that is liable to his debts; reserving a reasonable allowance for her maintenance.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Boggs v. Reid, 3 Rich. 161, 165, 166.

For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 188, 566; Dec. Dig. ⟸31, 147.]

The bill of Bethune charges that he was applied to by Charles Ferguson, the factor or agent of Mr. and Mrs. *Beresford, to supply necessary articles from his store for their use, and assured him that he was employed for that purpose, and that he would be paid out of her settled estate: Upon which he furnished them with articles to a considerable amount; many of which were furnished on Mrs. Beresford's own application by letter, filed with the bill. That complainants would not have trusted Mr. Beresford, but relied for payment on Mrs. Beresford's estate, derived from the will of her first husband Charles Elliot, which, upon her marriage with Mr. Beresford, was settled on her by deed of settlement, of which Thomas Ferguson and R. P. Saunders were trustees, to the use of Mr. R. Beresford during their joint lives, and upon the death of Mrs. Beresford, to the use of such persons as she should appoint by her will: That the said Richard and Ann his wife, being unable to pay the account, joined in a bond to complainant, conditioned to pay £342, copy of which is filed: That R. Beresford has no estate, but that of his wife, secured by settlement; and is deeply involved in debts, and unable to pay them; and the defendants insist that the settled estate is not liable to this debt.

*175

The complainant W. Cooke, charges that R. Beresford was indebted to him, in a large sum, for goods furnished Mr. and Mrs. Beresford, at the request of the said Ann Beresford: And being unable to obtain payment, required security. But they said they were unwilling to involve their friends, but would give a joint bond to secure the debt; which was accordingly executed on the 1st August, 1789, conditioned to pay £867. and to which R. P. Saunders was a witness—being called on as trustee expressly to sanction the proceeding, by subscribing the bond as a witness. But the complainant is now informed that the defendants insist the said bond is only binding on R. Beresford, and cannot subject the estate to the debt. The bill prays relief, and that the defendants may be compelled to pay the said debt out of the settled estate.

The defendant R. P. Saunders, the trustee, in his answer states, that he is ignorant of the transactions charged by complainant Bethune, respecting the debt contracted by Mr. and Mrs. Beresford with him. He admits that

*176

*Mrs. Beresford had a considerable estate, which was settled, on her marriage with Mr. R. Beresford, in the manner stated by the bill: That he knew nothing of the debt to Cooke till he was called upon to witness the bond; "and he did sign the bond as witness and trustee," but did not know the extent it might have in its operation; but he would not have consented to bind the settled estate, if that had been distinctly stated to him as the object, having promised Mrs. Beresford's father, Mr. Ferguson, never to consent to any act which should subject her settled estate to the debts of her husband—But he was taken suddenly and unawares, and signed without due reflection, when called on by Mr. Beresford to sign as trustee, his wife being present.

Defendant insists that the settled estate ought not to be made liable to this debt.

The answer of Mr. and Mrs. Beresford admits that Charles Ferguson may have applied to complainant Bethune for the articles they wanted, but they deny that they authorized him to pledge the settled estate for the payment. They admit they were furnished with the articles, and Mrs. Beresford admits that she took up some of them personally, and wrote for others—but that she acted only as the wife of R. Beresford. She admits she was possessed of a considerable estate, which on her marriage with Mr. Beresford was settled as in bill stated. She admits that she joined her husband in executing a bond for said goods to said Bethune, as in bill mentioned, and that she joined therein to prevent the necessity of her husband's applying elsewhere for security.

Defendants admit that said Richard was indebted to complainant Cooke, partly for goods purchased; but defendant Ann denies that she promised said Cooke to bind her particular estate for payment. She allows she might have said the debt would be paid when the (then) next crop should be sold; but she considered herself as acting merely as the wife of R. Beresford, and not to bind the settled estate: That the remainder of the debt was in bonds purchased up by complainant Cooke, who demanded security for the whole: That R. Beresford told Cooke his *wife had an estate settled on her, and she might become his security: And defendant Ann admits that to prevent discord she did join with her husband in the said bond, to the amount of the goods and bonds purchased by Cooke.

*177

Defendant Richard admits he did tell Cooke that he would ask R. P. Saunders to agree to and sign the bonds; but he does not recollect that he ever spoke to him on the subject, before he sent for him when he was about to sign the bond. Defendant Ann submits whether her signing said bonds binds the settled estate: And said Ann prays the court to consider that it was in a manner compulsory on her to sign said bonds; and that the natural affection a woman entertains for her husband, is so great, that at his request, and to ward off difficulties, she would join him in many transactions which might tend to injure her unless protected by the court.

The bill of the executors of John Ward states, that they sold a tract of land under the testator's will to Mr. Beresford, and that Mrs. Beresford joined in the bond voluntarily, and with the approbation of Mr. Saunders the trustee. The bill prays payment out of the trust estate of any deficiency after sale of the mortgaged property.

The answers admit the facts, but deny that the trust estate is liable; and Mr. Saunders answers, he would not have consented to any act which could be supposed to bind the trust estate, as he had promised Mrs. B.'s father never to do so.

Mr. I. P. Ward testified that he advised the executors to be cautious of receiving a married woman as a security; but Mr. R. P. Saunders, who was present, said, they were secure, for Mrs. Beresford had too much honour to violate her engagements.

Mr. Joshua Ward and Dr. Fayssoux proved that Mrs. B. executed the bonds voluntarily.

These cases were argued in September, 1790, by Mr. Pringle for complainants, and general Pinckney, Mr. Rutledge and Mr. Parker for defendants.

The court on the 2d day of October, 1790, delivered the following decree, which is extracted from Chancellor *MATHEWS'S notes, and the register book: The court said it had considered the subject, and examined the decided case with great care: That the principal point relied upon by complainants' counsel was, that Mrs. Beresford had a separate estate under the marriage settlement, which was liable to pay the complainants. Several of the cases cited would have been conclusive, if it could have been shewn that Mrs. Beresford had a separate estate. But the court did not think she had. By the marriage settlement she conveyed the whole estate to trustees, to the use of her husband R. Beresford, during their joint lives; and upon her death, for the use of such person as she should appoint or direct by deed or will. This is unlike any of the cases in the books. She has divested herself of the legal estate, and has reserved no equitable estate, but that right to a support from the husband, which the law gives every wife. She has no rights in the estate during life; she can only dispose of it to take effect after her death. This then is not such a separate estate, vested in her, as will induce a court of equity to call her a feme sole. All the decided cases are, "where the wife has a clear, distinct, independent, separate estate, which has induced the court of equity to consider her a feme sole; and as such has made her contracts obligatory on her—whereas at common law they would have been void. The case quoted from 2d Equity Cases abridged, 136, and Talbot 41, is a good deal like the present, and the court held the wife bound; but it was because she had joined her husband in levying a fine, one of the most formal and binding acts of the law; in which she had a fair opportunity to refuse to act. But in the case under consideration, the signing the bonds is in a private room, under the eye and control of the husband. The chancellor relied upon this public solemn act, and said that a fine has the same operation on trust estates as on legal estates. The case of Hulme & Tenant, 1 Bro. C. C. 16, comes nearest to the case under consideration; and the court has gone further in that case in enforcing the contracts of the wife, than in any other. In all the other cases, (except Penn v. Peacock and wife, *in Talbot,) the decree has never gone further than to bind the rents and profits of the wife's separate estate to answer for her contracts: but in Hulme and Tenant it is extended to the personal estate, as well as the rents and profits. But still this is on the principle of a sole, separate estate, and the wife is in consequence considered as a feme sole. Could we consider Mrs. Beresford in this light, we should think ourselves bound by such strong authorities: But we have said she is not so to be considered; therefore the cases are not applicable to the present one.

*178

*179

The counsel have next relied on the case of Baynton and others v. Ward, in 2 Atk. 172, where it is decided, that a wife having power to dispose by appointment of a reversion in fee, and no disposition is made, it shall be assetts to satisfy specialty creditors. And it is contended, Mrs. Beresford had at least a reversionary estate, disposable by appointment, which ought to be made liable. But Mrs. Beresford has not, strictly speaking, a reversionary estate. It would be premature to say what effect would result from Mrs. Beresford's dying without exercising her power of appointment; which might assimilate it to the case above mentioned. If that event occurs, it will be time enough for the court to decide upon the effect.

We will now examine the cases cited for defendants, and the arguments founded on them. The two first are from 3 Atk. 162, and from 2 P. Wms. 506, with respect to the strict execution of the powers. And complainants' counsel has admitted, that any deviation in the execution of the powers under the deed, would be fatal; were it not that Mrs. Beresford had a separate estate, and joining in the bond, with the assent of the trustee; evidenced by his witnessing the bond; this enlarged her power. But she had not a separate estate—And the bond is not executed under the powers of the deed of settlement, which required her appointment to be made in presence of three witnesses. The enlargement of the power the court will look at with a jealous eye, and will not sanction it, especially on such presumptive circumstances.

*180

*It is said that Cooke's case stands on stronger ground; as the trustee has expressed his assent deliberately, and subscribed as a witness. But in this case the execution of the power is not correct; there being but one witness, instead of three. And if it had been correctly exercised as to form, it is premature: It is done in the life time of the husband, whereas by the settlement her power of appointment is not to be executed during his life, and can only operate after her death. The trustees had no authority to enlarge her power, to charge or encumber the estate. They are to protect the estate and the interests of the cestui que use, and not to assist in injuring or encumbering them. His assent therefore, cannot give effect to an act otherwise unauthorized and invalid—Such an assent is a breach of trust. But the assent was an act of surprize, as the trustee swears in his answer: And he declares he did not know the effect which such subscription as a witness might be construed to have on the trust estate, or he never would have signed the bond as a witness; for he had promised the father of Mrs. Beresford never to sanction any act encumbering the trust estate.

With regard to the complainants, it appears that they were apprized of the settlement, and presuming that Mrs. Beresford had a separate estate under it, and had authority to charge that separate estate, they solicited her to join in the bond. She did so, but she did not mislead them—there was neither suggestio falsi, nor suppressio veri, on her part. It was proved that she promised Bethune that the debt should be paid out of the crop; but there is no evidence that she directly promised to make the trust estate liable: And her declaration to one of the witnesses, who called for payment of the bond, that it was a debt of her contracting, and should be paid, (though she had only written orders on a store for goods, as other married women do,) does not alter the question as to the liability of the trust estate. If it were a debt of Mrs. Beresford's contracting, and she had a separate estate, liable to it, there was no necessity to join Mr. B. in the bond, and the complainants had no confidence in him. If she was considered as a feme sole, her bond alone was *sufficient. If not, her joining in the bond was a void act: Mr. B. was looked upon as the principal, and signed the bond first.

*181

In Cooke's case reliance is placed on the fact that the bond refers to the settlement, as securing her estate to her, and evidences an intended reference to, and dependance on that estate for payment, to which the trustee consented by signing as a witness. But this cannot alter the case. This reference to the settlement cannot make the trust estate liable, if it were not so independently of that circumstance. It conferred no new powers of charging the estate on her. No deed can be defeated by a deed of less solemnity. 2 Vern. 473. 5 Com. 595. No subsequent deed can invalidate a prior one, where no power of revocation is given; and none is given by the deed of settlement.

If the creditors relied on this security on a mistaken ground of the powers of Mrs. B. to make the trust estate liable, it is not for this court to give them relief. The situation of Mrs. B. is not that of a free agent. A wife witnessing the distresses of her husband, would do any act to relieve him. This court is bound to protect her against her own misguided acts, and prevent her ruin. The court cannot consent to make her liable, because the creditors have mistaken her powers and her liability: More especially as the whole settled estate proceeded from her.

Mrs. Beresford never was applied to, to join in bonds, till her husband was found to be incapable of paying. The creditors relied for payment on the income of the trust estate, which was at his disposal. But when that was found inadequate to pay his debts, then he is pressed, and he proposes to procure his wife to join in binding her reversionary interests—They agree to this proposal, and she is persuaded to do so by her husband. If this court should sanction such an act, it would be a death blow to all marriage settlements.

On a full consideration of this case, "the court is of opinion, that Mrs. Beresford is not to be considered as having a separate estate in presenti, under the mar*riage settlement: therefore she cannot be considered as a feme sole, whose contracts, such as they are, can be binding on her, they wanting that solemnity, which is required by the express words of the deed of settlement, and which indeed would, by the rules of law, be also required: That her reversionary interest in the estate, is not immediately affected by those bonds she has entered into. However, there can be no doubt that Mr. Beresford's interest in the estate is liable for his debts, and must be made answerable for them. At the same time Mrs. Beresford must have some allowance made her, for her maintenance, out of the trust estate which flowed originally from her.—It must therefore be referred to the master to enquire, what are the whole of the debts of Mr. Beresford; what can be considered as the average value of the profits of the estate annually, and what would be a proper allowance for Mrs. Beresford out of them, and report accordingly.

*182

"As to the case of the executors of Ward v. Beresford and others, we do not see that it differs from the others just now determined, except that the executors of Ward have a right to foreclose the mortgage.

"With respect to the case of Saunders v. Washington and others, we shall defer giving any decree on that case, till the master's report comes in."

Afterwards, on the master's report being made, the court made the following decree:

"Decreed, that Mr. and Mrs. Beresford be allowed the sum of three hundred pounds per annum for her maintenance; the use of the mansion-house at Woodville, and household furniture, with the gardens and out-houses, except such as are necessary for plantation purposes; the following servants, viz. Wall, Doll, Phebe, Affey, Jenny, Mimba, Billy, Johnny, Cupid, Rachael, Gardner, and two boys, and Hunter, also, Sibby, Maria, and Saul, with the usual plantation allowance of provisions for them, the use of the horses, the use of the stock (excepting the working oxen) for family use, necessary pasture, and as much of the offals of the plantation as may be requisite for their subsistence: And that the entire management of *the rest of the estate be committed to colonel William Washington, and colonel William Skirving, and captain Roger Parker Saunders, removable on application to the court, who are hereby directed after the payment of the above annuity to Mrs. Beresford, and the plantation expenses, to divide the remaining profits of the estate among the creditors in equal share and proportion: that the injunction be perpetual—Provided notwithstanding, that nothing in this decree contained, shall be construed to prejudice or impeach the claims of any persons who may have had demands against the said estate previous to the intermarriage of Mr. and Mrs. Beresford: And that costs of these suits be paid out of the proceeds of the estate."

*183

March, 1791.

Mr. John Rutledge, the senior judge of the court of chancery having been elected by the legislature, chief justice of the court of common pleas and sessions, in the month of February, 1791, and he having accepted that office, Mr. Hugh Rutledge was elected a chancellor in his place—So that the court is now composed of the following judges: Richard Hutson, John Mathews, and Hugh Rutledge.

---

1 Desaus. 183

Case LXI.

Present—Chancellors Hutson and Mathews.

RICHARD BERESFORD and Wife, W. WASHINGTON and Wife, and Others, v. Executors of Colonel BERNARD ELLIOTT.

(December, 1790.)

Bill to have an account of an estate, and certain property delivered up to complainants.

Question on the limitations of a bill.

[Wills ⇐545.]

The limitations over, not too remote and void; but within the admissible limits, & good.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Logan v. Ladson's Ex'r, 1 Desaus. 272.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1173; Dec. Dig. ⇐545.]

This is a case arising out of the will of Thomas Law Elliott. He being seized and possessed of a considerable real and personal estate, made and duly executed his will on the 6th of December, 1756, wherein, after giving a specific legacy to his wife, he bequeathed as follows: The use of all hereafter mentioned to his son Thomas Elliott; viz. two tracts of land, (which he describes;) also several negro slaves (by name)—and the half of all the rest of his personal estate. To the use of his daughter Mary Bellinger Elliott, two negro slaves, (by name:) and the other half of his personal estate.

*184

*In case his son Thomas Elliott "dies and leaves no lawful heirs of his body, then all the abovementioned to his daughter Mary B. Elliott, and the heirs of her body; and if his son leaves any heirs of his body, then to them and their heirs for ever." In case his daughter "dies and leaves no lawful heirs of her body, then all the abovementioned to his son Thomas and the heirs of his body; but if his daughter leaves any lawful heirs of her body, then to them and their heirs for ever." In case his son Thomas and daughter Mary should both die, "and leave no lawful heirs of their bodies," then the abovementioned real and personal estate to be equally divided between his, (the testator's) brothers and sisters, to them and the heirs of their bodies lawfully begotten, to them and their assigns for ever."

The testator appointed his brothers John and Charles executors, and died on the 7th December, 1756, leaving his will in full force and effect. The executors qualified on the will, and possessed themselves of the property. At the testator's death he left the following family and relations: A wife,—his son and daughter abovementioned,—two brothers, Charles and John Elliott,—and two sisters, the complainant Mary, wife of Robert Rowand, and Sarah, wife of Archibald Stanyarne.

A few months after the death of the testator, his son Thomas Law Elliott died, an infant and unmarried, whereupon the whole estate devolved on the daughter Mary; who in the year 1766 intermarried with Bernard Elliott; on which the surviving executor suffered the said Bernard Elliott to take possession of the estate, and receive the rents and profits thereof.

Mary B. Elliott died on the 11th December, 1774, never having had issue born alive: On which, it is contended by complainants, that the said Charles Elliott and Mary Rowand, the surviving brother and sister of the testator, (the other brother and sister having died before the daughter Mary, without issue,) became entitled under the will to the whole estate, and the increase thereof, to be divided between them: That being so entitled, they demanded the same from colonel

*185

Bernard Elliott, and on *his refusal to deliver up the estate, they filed a bill in chancery for the recovery of the same, in August, 1778; but the suit was abated by the death of colonel B. Elliott, in October, 1778; who left in full force a will, by which he bequeathed his estate to his second wife and his son Bernard. His executors qualified thereon, and possessed themselves of his estate.

Charles Elliott, the brother of the testator Thomas Law Elliott, died in January, 1791, having first bequeathed his estate to be equally divided between his wife Ann and his daughter Jane Riley Elliott; the former of whom hath since married Richard Beresford the complainant, and the latter W. Washington the complainant: And they have, upon the death of the executors of Charles Elliott, administered on his estate, with the will annexed. They, together with complainant Rowand, applied to the executors of colonel Bernard Elliott for an account of the estate of Thomas Law Elliott, and for the delivery up of the same to them, being entitled thereto under the limitations of his will: But this they have refused to do, and complainants pray for an account of the rents and profits, and of the increase of the slaves, and for the delivery of the estate to them.

The executors of colonel Bernard Elliott admitted in their answer, all the facts stated in the bill; except that they allege, that the inventory of Thomas Law Elliott's personal estate returned to the office, differs essentially from that filed with the bill of complaint. The defendants also say that some time after the death of Thomas Law Elliott, Thomas Elliott, the grandfather of the said Mary Bellinger Elliott died, leaving her by his will one fifth of his personal estate, which Charles Elliott took possession of, and kept the same, together with what estate his niece Mary B. was entitled to from her father, until the month of April, 1766, when she intermarried with colonel B. Elliott: And on that event the said Charles Elliott delivered to said Bernard Elliott a number of negro slaves; but the defendants do not know the names or the number of those so delivered; nor which of them came from the estate of *the grandfather or the father; nor which were bought with the profits of the estate of Mary during her minority.

*186

The defendants say, that colonel Bernard Elliott continued in the quiet possession of the property from April 1766, till August 1778, when and not before a suit was brought in the court of chancery to recover the pretended rights of complainants; which suit abating by the death of said B. Elliott, has never been renewed till the present suit—wherefore the defendants pleaded the statute of limitations: That with respect to the discovery of the particulars and amount of the value, interest and profits of the said personal estate of the said Thomas Law Elliott, which came to the hands of the said B. Elliott, the defendants say they have no knowledge of the subject, nor is there any way by which they can come to a knowledge of it; for the inventory of that estate was made nine years before the marriage of B. Elliott with his wife Mary: That the defendants have as good a right to claim of complainant an account of the estate, whilst it was in the hands of Charles Elliott, the executor of Thomas Law Elliott, under whom the complainants claim, and who they are informed and believe, never did account for the profits to colonel B. Elliott, either as executor of Mrs. B. Elliott's father or grand-father: That many of the negroes of the estate were lost by death or desertion to the British, as the complainant Mr. Rowand himself declared in a memorial to the board of police, which is produced: That colonel B. Elliott and his representatives have uniformly contested the right of the complainants to any part of the estate which said Bernard Elliott obtained by his marriage with Mary B. Elliott, and held an adverse possession: That in any event defendants should not be made liable for the accidents of death or the calamities of war.

The case came to a hearing on the 23d December, 1790, and was argued by Read and Pringle for complainants; and Marshall, E. Rutledge, and T. Pickney for defendants.

For complainants it was insisted by Mr. Read, that the limitation over to the brothers and sisters of the tes*tator, on the event of the death of his children, without leaving lawful heirs of their bodies, is within the limits prescribed by law; and therefore not void, but must take effect. The distinction is, between a dying without issue generally, and a dying without leaving issue at the time of the death of the first taker. The limitation in the will under consideration, is on a dying without leaving heirs of their bodies. This is a sufficient restriction of the limitation, and prevents its being considered an indefinite failure of issue. See Mosely 182, 8. 1 P. Wms. 432. 3 P. Wms. 258. 2 Eq. Cas. 325, 346. 8 Viner 141. 1 Salk. 225. 2 Brown, C. C. 33, 127. The limitation over is good, being confined to a life or lives in being. 3 Atk. 285. 1 P. Wms. 198, 534. 2 Atk. 642. The intention too must have great weight, and that must be collected from all parts of the will. That intention is manifest here, and is not opposed to any rule of law.

*187

Mr. E. Rutledge contended for defendant, that no case like this had ever been decided by any of our courts of justice: That the devise of the use of a thing, is a gift of the thing itself. Butterfield v. Butterfield. There are no words in the will under consideration to restrain the limitation to heirs living at the time of the death. There is a difference between legal and trust estates. Sams v. Mathews decided in this court was a trust estate. Atk. Read v. Snell, Bagshaw v. Spencer, and Colson v. Colson. 1 Vesey 133, 4.

If the answer is taken for true, as the defendants deny any knowledge of the property, and the discrimination of it from other property of the same kind, no discovery is obtained; and the bill must be dismissed, as no decree can be made upon it. No discovery being made, they cannot be let into proof of it: For if the complainants have proofs, and have any right, they have a remedy at common law. See Harr. 45, Bunburry, Alcot v. Thompson. 1 Vesey 446.

Mr. Marshall for defendant contended, that the limitation over was too remote; and that the limitation over of a personalty, being a vested estate tail, cannot be made: "A dying without heirs of their bodies," in this case, *gave cross remainders. 1 Vesey 155. Vesey, Daw v. Pitts. 2 Atk. 308.

*188

Major T. Pinckney for defendants insisted, that the limitation over was too remote. Mathew Manning's case was the first case of executory devises—A trust estate is distinguished from a legal estate. In the first, the intention will be supported on slight grounds —not so in the latter.

Mr. Pringle for complainants in reply.—He insisted that though this was an executory bequest, depending on a contingency, the limitation is not too remote. The ultimate limitation extends no further than to a life in being, which is permitted. The legal meaning of a failure of issue generally, or indefinitely, is on a failure of issue from generation to generation. The same rule governs executory devises as trusts. Fearn. 378. Executory devise good, though depending or limited over, on ever so many lives in being. The court favours the preservation of the limitation over, if it can be done legally, because that gives effect to the testator's intention. The court has always laid hold of any words to tie up the generality of a dying without issue; and confine it to a dying without issue at the time of the death. 1 P. Wms. 433, 664. Forth v. Chapman, which is a leading case. 3 P. Wms. 3 Atk. 283, 396. If the words had been a dying without issue, the limitation would have been too indefinite, and therefore void, and the estate would have vested in the first taker, Mrs. Mary B. Elliott. But the words are, dying without leaving issue—The word 'leaving,' restricts the clause to a dying without issue, at the time of the death taking place, agreeably to the case of Forth v. Chapman. 2 Atk. 646. 6 Bro. P. C. 309. D. and East, 593. 2 do. 720. Leaving issue, a good limitation. Fearn. 368, 371. The same rules govern legal, as trust estates. Fearn. 354. 1 Eq. Cas. 192. 2 Vesey 646.

March, 1791.

Opinion of the Court.

The court delivered its opinion as follows —"This case is comprised within a very narrow compass, viz. Whether the limitation over to the brothers and sisters of the testator T. L. Elliott, is so remote a contingency, as will not be favoured in law, whatever might have been *his intention. It is a well known rule, that in the construction of wills, the testator's intention is to prevail, if not against the rules of law. The intention of the testator in this case, to give the estate to the brothers and sisters on the death of his children, without issue, is as plain as words can make it. The question then is, does the rule of law interpose its authority, to prevent the operation of such intention? That it does and renders the limitation void, by reason of the remoteness of the contingency, and the generality of the words, has been very ably argued, and many authorities quoted in support of such argument. To go into a minute investigation of them, would, we think, be unnecessary; as the case is to be decided on a very plain rule of law; one that is as old as the law itself, and which has never been impeached on any fair grounds—We mean the construction of limitations: and where they have been confined to lives in being, they have ever been admitted to take their full operation. We therefore find no difficulty in our minds, when we say, that in the present case, the limitation over to the brothers and sisters of T. L. Elliott, being confined to lives in being, and some of whom were actually in being at the time, (and one is so still,) the estate ought to have vested in them, viz. on the death of Mary B. Elliott, without leaving issue, is such a limitation as always has been, and must now be supported. And if this doctrine should ever be reversed, it appears to us, that it would impeach most of the estates in this country now held under wills, which have received the same construction we have now given to the present; though perhaps not by judicial decisions. As to the generality of the words being such as renders the limitation void on that account, and vests the estate in the first taker, in nature of an estate tail, we can by no means admit this to be the case, because from several decisions in this court, viz. in the case of Ladson and others v. Ward [1 Desaus. 314], Sealy and others v. Executors of Ball [1 Desaus. 137], and Sams v. Mathews and others [1 Desaus. 127], and in the court of common pleas, the case of Keating v. Reynolds [1 Bay, 80], the words of the wills (on which the decisions of those cases were founded,) were more general, and envel*oped in greater obscurity than in the present case; yet the intention of the testator governed in all those cases, on account of the liberal construction that was given to the words of the will. In the present case, the words "and should die and leave no lawful heirs of their body," we conceive so far impugn the generality of the other words of the will, as takes it out of the rigid rule of law, and makes way for the equitable construction we have given them, viz. leaving no issue at the time of their death, at the same time it lets in the limitation as far as it goes to the lives in being. We therefore think the limitation to the brothers and sisters of T. L. Elliott, is good, and such of them as were entitled must take accordingly. Let it be referred to the master to enquire what part of the personal estate of the testator, Thomas Law Elliott, came into the possession of Bernard Elliott, deceased, on his intermarriage with Mary Bellinger Elliott; what remains of said estate in possession of the executors or representatives of the said Bernard Elliott; and what have been the profits of the labour of the negroes since the death of Mary Bellinger Elliott, and report accordingly.

*189

*190

August, 1791.

Afterwards the master's report was made and read, and on motion of Mr. Read, solicitor for complainants, ordered that the same be confirmed; that the defendants deliver over to complainants the fifty-four negroes first mentioned in the list annexed to the report: That they account for the other fourteen negroes, at the rate of fifty pounds each; and that they pay over the sum of four thousand pounds to the complainants, in three annual payments, with interest from the 18th March last, reserving the share of the negroes which are claimed by the complainant R. Beresford; and also the share of the four thousand pounds in right of his wife, till the further order of court, and that the defendants do pay the costs of this suit.

---

1 Desaus. *191

*Case LXIII.

Present—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

Executrix of JOHN STOCK v. Executor of RACHEL STOCK.

(July, 1791.)

[Executors and Administrators ⟸118.]

Bill for an account and settlement of estate. Under special circumstances depreciated balances during the war, not to be mingled with undepreciated balances before the war.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 475; Dec. Dig. ⟸ 118.]

[Executors and Administrators ⟸104.]

Executors not bound to put money out to interest, nor to pay interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 424; Dec. Dig. ⟸ 104.]

This was a bill filed for the settlement of an estate, and the case turned chiefly on questions of depreciation—Some of the transactions of the executor being before, and some during the depreciation of the paper money during the revolutionary war.

The annual balances before the war, were uniformly and largely in favour of the estate, and for a year or two after. The balances during the rest of the war, and the depreciation, were in favour of the executor; but this was produced chiefly by his paying large orders of Mr. Stock, who, though a legatee and heir of the estate, was a minor.

The first point made by the counsel for the complainant was, that neither the will of the testator nor the law sanctioned the acting executor in permitting such an unexperienced heir, legatee and executor as John Stock, who was actually a minor, to draw such large sums out of his hands, and thus diminishing the executor's debt to the estate. There was also another question—Whether the executor was liable to pay interest on the balances in his hands at the end of the year.

The case came to a hearing on the 12th of July, 1791, and was argued by Mr. Pringle and general Pinckney for complainant, and by Mr. Holmes and Mr. E. Rutledge for defendant.

On the question of interest, the counsel for complainant argued, that it would be just and reasonable that interest should be allowed by the defendant. He was executor of the estate, and at the same time engaged in the factorage business, and the crops of the estate were sent to his factorage house: That they sold the crops, and there were large balances at the end of several years in their hands. It was the duty of the executor to have taken those balances and paid the debts of the estate, if any, and if none to have put the money out to interest. He had done neither; nay, kept it in the hands of his factorage concern, and made that neglect the foundation of a *claim to connect those undepreciated balances with running accounts subsequent to the commencement of the depreciation, and take the ultimate balance, and depreciate that, which would be a great and unjust loss to the complainants. As to executors and trustees being bound to put money out to interest, or being liable to pay it, the counsel cited 1 Vesey, 407. Brown v. Pring. 1 Vern. 197. 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 238. 3 Bro. Par. Cas. 319.

*192

The defendant's counsel insisted, that it was the custom to let balances remain in factor's hands from year to year: And the rule of this court was not to charge executors with interest; at all events only where they made interest—which the executor had not done in this case: That the balance of account, before depreciation was transferred to the next years' accounts and mingled with them—of course the last balance must be depreciated.

The court said, there were two questions, viz. 1st, Whether the balances on accounts for 1775 and 6 (previous to depreciation) should be accounted for in specie, or the whole looked upon as a running account from the death of the testator to the close of the transactions in 1779; and, 2dly, Whether any and what interest should be allowed.

If this were a case between persons of full age, of mutual dealings before and subsequent to depreciation, there would be little difficulty; but this is a case where defendant is executor and factor of an estate, with which he has accounts, which makes it different from all other cases. In 1775 and 6 there were large balances in defendant's hands, where they remained till November, 1779. John Stock, whom complainant represents to have been a minor, drew large sums from the executor, which changed the balance. The court is guardian, and will not suffer him to be prejudiced by acts in his minority. It was not just in the executor to apply specie funds to discharge the depreciated balance of 1779. It was unjust to close the accounts in November, 1799, for the purpose of raising a balance to wipe off the specie fund.—2d, As to interest—No law obliges the executor to place money out at interest; and no authority was given to do so in this will—*The profits were bequeathed to complainant, therefore no interest to be charged.†

*193

† This certainly appears to have been the old law. It is so stated expressly in the text attributed to Mr. Ballow, to which Mr. Fonblanque has attached his valuable notes. After stating that a bailiff, who is charged as receiver ad computandum, shall answer only for the money, or thing delivered, without increase or profits, he adds,—"So in chancery, an executor or trustee not being bound to lend, if he do lend it is at his own peril: and if it be by that means lost, he shall answer the same out of his own estate; and therefore, as he shall bear the loss, he shall have the gain." And he says, "This is a fixed rule of the court, and they will not change it, even where the executor calls in the money on good security."††

Mr. Fonblanque expresses his astonishment that such a principle should ever have had the weight which it appears to have received in some cases. 2 Chan. Cas. 35, 152. 1 Vern. 197. 2 Atk. 106. Adams v. Gale; and 2 Atk. 603, Child v. Gibson. There were, however, cases decided differently, even at that time. See 1 Vern. 196, Radcliffe v. Graves; 2 Vern. 548, Lee v. Lee. And lord chancellor Thurlow solemnly considered the subject, and denied the old rule to be the law of the court. See 1 Bro. C. C. 359, Newton v. Bennet. So that an executor or trustee may now be considered as chargeable with interest, when he appears to have made interest. See 1 Bro. C. C. 375, Perkins v. Bayntum. 1 Bro. C. C. 384, Treves v. Townsend. And he shall not only be chargeable with interest, but if he appear to have employed his trust money in trade, whence he has derived profits, beyond the rate of interest, he shall account for all such profits. See 2 Bro. C. C. 430, Forbes v. Ross. And it has been further held, that if a trustee or executor retain money in his hands (unnecessarily) for any length of time, which he might by application to the court, or by vesting in the funds, have made productive, he shall be charged with interest thereon. 2 Vern. 744. 1 Bro. C. C. 375, Perkins v. Bayntum. 3 Bro. C. C. 73, Littlehales v. Gascoigne. Ibid. 433, Franklin v. Frith. And an executor vesting money in the funds, and appropriating the same, shall not be liable to the fall of Stocks. See ex parte Champion, cited in Hutcheson v. Hammond, 3 Bro. C. C. 147.

The later decisions of our own court of chancery have been conformable to these decisions;

†† 2 Fonbl. ch. 7, § 6, p. 188, 1st Lond. Ed.

It was therefore decreed, that it be referred to the master to examine the accounts of the defendant, and to state the balance due thereon at the end of every year anterior to any depreciation: That as to the remainder of the said accounts, the master do only depreciate the sum *due on the last balance, and report the same to the court: That such balances, when liquidated, shall be paid in specie by defendant to complainant, in equal proportions, in one, two and three years, together with the annual interest to grow due thereon: And lastly, that defendant do pay the costs of this suit.

*194

The master afterwards made his report conformably to the above principles; which was confirmed.

Pringle and general C. C. Pinckney for complainants. Holmes and E. Rutledge for defendant.

---

and interest is chargeable to executors and trustees, wherever there were disposable funds of the estate in their hands, which the exigencies of the estate did not prevent being placed out at interest. Vide postea, case of executors of Gadsden v. Executors of Lord, and other cases.

---

1 Desaus. 194

Case LXIV.

Present—Chancellors Hutson and Mathews.

Executor of NEILSON v. Mr. HUGH RUTLEDGE, the Attorney of Dickenson.

(July, 1791.)

[Interest ⟸55.]

Interest recoverable on bond debts due to British subjects during the war.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. § 128; Dec. Dig. ⟸55.]

This bill was filed to obtain an injunction against the present defendant, to prevent his getting interest on a bond debt, during the war with Great Britain, on the ground that the debt being due to a British subject, interest ought not be allowed to run during the interruption of the intercourse, and when the funds and revenues of the debtors to British subjects were cut off or diminished by the acts of that government and its armies.

An injunction had been granted in the first instance. The case was fully argued, and the court took time to consider the question. The court delivered its opinion as follows:

There are two questions in the case—1st, Whether the circumstances of it are such as will distinguish it from the general question, whether interest is to be allowed on any debt due from a citizen of the United States, to a subject of Great Britain during the war: And, 2dly, Whether interest ought to be allowed in the present case. This being a bond debt, given in this state, on which large sums have been paid during the war; and the defendant during the whole of that time having an attorney on the spot, certainly renders this case distinguishable from simple contract debts. It being a specialty, it speaks for it*self, and will admit of no dispute if fairly obtained; and that it was so, is admitted. On the present occasion we are thrown into an entire new situation; heretofore we have had the general law of the land for our guide in all our decisions; but that we are now altogether deprived of; as there is no case in any of the books that is in any wise analogous to the one now before us, and the only rule by which we can be at all directed, is the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain. One of the articles in that treaty declares, that no interruption shall be given to the recovery of just and bona fide debts on either part. That this is such a debt, is not disputed: But it is contended, that there was a period during which interest ought not to be allowed, although on the face of the bond it is the mutual agreement of the parties that it should. This court has taken a very unusual length of time to consider this question; and although frequently called upon for a decree, we have declined it, in hopes some new light might be thrown on the subject, by which we might be enabled to tread on some firm ground, in this new and by us untrodden path. This light has been afforded us, from a quarter that we are persuaded would never lead us astray. The authority is so high, and so truly respectable, that we candidly confess, our minds have been so much swayed by it, that however we might have heretofore doubted, these doubts are now removed. The determination we allude to is that of the chief justice of the United States, in a case in the state of Connecticut, on the 30th of April, in the present year, where the chief justice went so far as to say, that although the law of Connecticut enabled their state courts to deduct interest on bonds due from citizens of the United States to British subjects during the war, yet that such law was an infringement of the treaty of peace; and as upon common law principles, interest was recoverable, he adjudged it should be so in the case then before him. As the case now before us is also a bond debt, as there has been no impediment of any kind thrown in the way of the recovery of interest on such contracts, by the legislature of this state, on the contrary, they have always studiously *avoided intermeddling in this question,—we think ourselves bound to adopt the opinion of a judge of great and extensive law knowledge, who is directed in his judgment by the same laws we are, and that we might also preserve a uniformity of decisions on the same questions. If then he decided even against a law of the state in which the cause was tried, and in support of the treaty of peace, how can we do otherwise where our legislature have chosen to be silent on the subject, and when we are equally with him bound by the articles of peace in our decisions? On the whole we are therefore of opinion, on the authority of the decision we have referred to, and on the best judgment we have been able to form of the case now before us, that we ought not to grant the prayer of the complainant's bill, but that the injunction ought to be dissolved.

*195

*196

It is accordingly decreed, that the complainant's bill be dismissed with costs.—Injunction dissolved.

---

1 Desaus. 196

Case LXV.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

ELIZABETH GREENLAND alias BROWN v. CORNELIUS BROWN.

(September, 1789.)

[Husband and Wife ⇐12.]

A husband declaring his intention to abandon his wife, and to sell all the property he got in marriage, and to carry off the proceeds, the court will restrain him, and compel him to convey the property to trustees, for their joint use, with other proper limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 58; Dec. Dig. ⇐12.]

[Marriage ⇐50.]

[Upon a bill by the wife for relief on account of a prior marriage by the husband, proof that the husband had cohabited with a woman, and that he had spoken of her in his letters as his wife, was held to be insufficient evidence of the marriage.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Cent. Dig. § 85; Dec. Dig. ⇐50.]

The bill charges that the complainant was a widow, possessed of a considerable real and personal estate, and in March, 1788, intermarried with Cornelius Brown, an Englishman who had recently settled in the country—And he, by virtue of the marital rights, took possession of the estate, and appropriated part of the profits to the purchase of a plantation called Battersea: That it has been recently reported, that the said C. Brown was a married man, at the time of addressing and marrying the complainant: And that his view in marrying her, was to get possession of her property, to dispose of the same, and to convey the proceeds to his wife in England: That the said C. Brown wrote several letters to his friends in England, which disclose his situation and his views—copies are filed with the bill. In one of them, written to his brother in law Mr.

*197

Dunn, he speaks of his wife, in Eng*land, and desires him to bless her "for her unfortunate husband." And in another letter to his sister Mrs. Dunn, he speaks of his wife, in England; and hopes they will meet ere long never to part again—In both letters he desires his situation in America to be concealed, and that he should be represented as at Madras. He assures his sister, that he will "try his utmost to realize all that he can, to make the object of his soul more happy than she had been," and requests his sister to keep her in good spirits. In a postscript he states, that since some intimation of his situation had been given, about a wife in England, "the old woman has taken a different bed," which does not disturb him: That she being now convinced he did not marry her for love, would be glad to find the report true, in order to save her property—but "hopes she will be disappointed."

The complainant states, that she has the strongest reason to believe that the said Cornelius Brown is about to dispose of her property, and remit the amount to England, and leave her in penury and want.

The bill prays that the said C. Brown may be ordered to deliver up the property he got by complainant, and to account for the profits, and prevented from wasting the same; and that the same may be impounded in this court till the final decree; and that the property may be restored to complainant, and she relieved in the premises.

The defendant in his answer admitted that he married the complainant in 1787: That she was possessed of two tracts of land, thirty six negro slaves, and some stock, of which he took possession: He denies that he was married before he married the complainant, but confesses that for some years before he left England, he cohabited with a woman, who was commonly reputed to be his wife: That he did not make known his real situation, because he had promised that woman not to marry whilst she lived; which promise he would have kept, but for a false report of her death: That he endeavoured to make complainant happy, and she behaved well for some time, but afterwards drank to excess, and was frequently intoxicated; and behaved otherwise improperly, assuming the sole management of *the property, and ordering the overseer not to obey him, but to abuse him: That despairing of reclaiming her, and of any domestic happiness, he wrote the letters set forth by complainant, hoping they would induce the complainant to come to a separation: That they were written for that purpose alone, and never intended to be sent to England; but were placed in a drawer to which his wife had access, that they might fall into her hands. He admits that he took possession of the property: That the crop of 1787 was not sufficient to feed the negroes; which obliged him to purchase corn for their use with his own money: He says, that since this suit has been brought, he has been driven off the plantation by the overseer, with a rifle, acting under the orders of his wife: That he never disposed of any of the negroes but one; and that with consent of his wife, who has the value of him: That he purchased the plantation called Battersea for five hundred guineas, part of which he paid out of his own pocket, and gave his bonds for the balance: That all the money he received from the estate, together with an additional sum of thirty-seven pounds, he applied to its uses; and he advanced forty pounds to complainant before marriage; and for his wife and sister after marriage about ninety pounds: Denies, notwithstanding what is said in the letters, that he had any intention to remove from this country, or of remitting money to England; though he admits he offered a large premium for bills of exchange, but it was to effect a payment on the purchase of Battersea, the bonds being offered low for cash.

*198

Upon reading the bill of complaint, verified upon oath, together with the affidavit of James Lawrence, jun. it was ordered, that a writ of injunction do issue against the defendant, and that he be held to bail thereon, in the sum of £5000; and also that a writ of ne exeat do issue, in the sum of £1000.—the sureties to be approved by the master of this court.

June, 1790.

On further argument of this case, it was ordered, that the defendant Cornelius Brown do convey to — — as trustees, all the property which he claims by virtue of his marriage with the complainant, to be subject to the *future order of the court: And that Battersea plantation, which he purchased subsequent to said marriage, continue to be impounded until the further order of the court: And that the defendant be bound in the sum of £100 with two sureties in £50 each, not to molest either the person or the property of said complainant.

*199

Afterwards it was further ordered, that the complainant and her agents be restrained from committing waste on the Battersea plantation, or the stock: That the defendant and complainant shall each be entitled to receive one half of the money arising from the sale of the wood, in the hands of the factor: And that on the defendant giving the security and executing the conveyances heretofore ordered, the writ of ne exeat be discharged, and the defendant set at liberty.

This cause came to a hearing on the 24th September, 1791.—It was fully argued by General Pinckney and Mr. E. Rutledge for complainant, and by Mr. Read for defendant.

For complainant it was insisted, that the letters were conclusive evidence of the fact, that C. Brown the defendant was a married man when he married the complainant: That Harris's evidence is express that defendant told him in 1785 that he had a wife living in London: That if a man lives with a woman, and acknowledges her as his wife, he shall not be admitted to say that he is not married, but shall be liable for her debts. See Burr. 2177. See Espinasse 207,—Man made liable for the debts of a woman with whom he cohabited, though he afterwards swore he was not married. Marriage by reputation is admitted to be made out in all cases but two, viz. bigamy and crim. con. See Buller 27. 4 Burr. 2057. Marriage by reputation is sufficient to support a claim of inheritance. Bla. Rep. 632. This court is bound to give relief, on the ground of fraud; so that no ecclesiastical jurisdiction need be exercised here. If his marriage is not nullified upon the evidence, and he keeps the property, may he not be subjected to the debts of the first wife?

For defendant it was insisted, that the proofs of the first marriage were not conclusive, nor sufficient to esta*blish it, so as to authorize this court to act. Defendant swears he was not married in England. If a decree was given against defendant on this evidence, he might be prosecuted for bigamy. It would be dangerous to set up marriage on such evidence.

*200

Chancellor MATHEWS, in his notes, remarks that "the evidence was too slight and superficial to prove the fact of the marriage of defendant with the woman in England, alleged to be his wife: More especially as he denies in his answer that he was married; which not having been contradicted by any evidence of equal validity, his answer must be taken for true. However, as his own letters shew a dishonest intention to make a new property of his wife, by selling what he got by her, and abandoning her, the court will so far interpose as to prevent this exercise of his powers over the estate.—The following is extracted from the decree book.

"The bill stated that the defendant had courted and married complainant, although he was then a married man, as has since appeared: And that he was making away with the complainant's property, and was going off with the proceeds. The court did not consider the testimony (consisting of defendant's verbal declarations, and some letters) sufficient to establish the first marriage. The cases do not go so far; they only allow a man to be made liable for debts contracted by a woman whom he permits to pass as his wife: But such evidence would not be sufficient to convict in a criminal prosecution, or to impeach a real second marriage. But as the defendant has behaved very ill to this lady, the court, to prevent his making a new property of the unfortunate lady, decreed, upon the authority of Gardiner v. Walker, Stra. 504, and of a case decided in this court, that the husband shall execute deeds of settlement, to be prepared by the master, of the whole real and personal property of which complainant was possessed at the time of the marriage, to the use of complainant and defendant during their joint lives, and to their issue after their deaths. If no issue, and he survives, the personal estate to go to him, and the real estate to her devisee: But if she survives him, the whole *estate to go to her. The injunction heretofore granted, to be retained till the execution of the deeds—then dissolved.

*201

E. Rutledge and general Pinckney for complainant. Read for defendant.

---

1 Desaus. 201

Case LXVI.

JOSEPH WILKINSON v. EDWARD WILKINSON, a Minor.

(September, 1791.)

[Specific Performance ⇐24.]

Specific execution of contract decreed against an infant heir, on clear proof of contract and part execution by the ancestor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. ⇐24.]

The bill states, that the complainant Joseph Wilkinson being seized in fee of an island in Wiltown river, exchanged the same with his uncle Morton Wilkinson, now deceased, for a plantation situate on the east side of Edisto river; and in addition to the island thus exchanged, agreed to pay him two thousand pounds sterling: But although this exchange was agreed upon, yet no titles were ever executed by either party. Afterwards some other sales and exchanges took place between the complainant and his uncle, the terms of which are set forth in the bill, but no writings of any kind were drawn or signed: In consequence of this agreement, the said Morton took possession of the said island, and put the complainant in possession of the land he was to have in the arrangement between them: That the said Morton Wilkinson during his life, and his representatives since his death, and your orator, have cultivated the same, from the time of the contract until the filing of this bill—But the said Morton neglected to make your orator titles for his purchase; and your orator, although he has received considerable payment for the sale of his said island, did neglect to make titles for the same, but that he is willing at all times to complete the former part of his contract.—Your orator further sheweth, that the said Morton Wilkinson suddenly died intestate, in December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, leaving Edward Wilkinson, a minor, his son and heir.—Your orator is advised and believes, that although the facts herein stated are known to the mother of the said Edward Wilkinson, and to his nearest connexions and relations, yet that in consequence of the minority of the said Edward, your orator can obtain relief only in this *honourable court: He therefore prays your honours to decree the said Edward Wilkinson to confirm the said contract, to convey over to your orator the lands herein charged to have been purchased by him from the said Morton Wilkinson—Upon your orator's making due proof of the allegations herein contained.

*202

The answer of Edward Wilkinson the minor, heir at law of colonel Morton Wilkinson, was in the usual form, neither admitting nor denying the facts charged in the bill, but praying that his rights might be protected.

The case came to a hearing on the 21st September, 1791, and was argued by Mr. E. Rutledge for the complainant, and Mr. T. Parker for defendant. The solicitor for complainant produced and read the examinations of Thomas Martin and James Legare, and the affidavit of Mrs. Susannah Wilkinson, the mother of the defendant, whose testimony established the facts alleged in the bill.

Whereupon the court ordered and decreed, that the complainant Joseph Wilkinson do forthwith make good and sufficient conveyances in fee simple to Susannah Wilkinson, the mother and guardian of the defendant the minor, and in trust for him, of the island in bill mentioned: And that the said E. Wilkinson the minor, by his said guardian, do make good and sufficient conveyances in fee simple to the complainant, of the land in bill mentioned: And that this decree be binding on the infant, unless on being served with subpœna to shew cause against the same, he shall, within six months after coming of age, shew good cause to the contrary. The testimony to be perpetuated.

---

1 Desaus. 202

Case LXVII.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

JOHN MAYRANT and ISABELLA, His Wife, v. W. R. DAVIS, Executor of Jared Neilson, Executor of Mathew Neilson and Others.

(September, 1791.)

[Wills ⇐820.]

The appointment of a particular fund for the payment of pecuniary legacies, does not necessarily restrict the payment out of that fund.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 2114–2119, 2121; Dec. Dig. ⇐820.]

[Wills ⇐732.]

The court will, unless a contrary intent appears, direct the payment out of the general residuary estate (tho' that is bequeathed) on the failure of the particular fund.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1810; Dec. Dig. ⟸732.]

This was a case of great extent, and involved in it many matters of fact, and questions springing out of them, which required the interposition and direction of *the court. There was however, but one point decided by the court of sufficient importance to report. It was on the construction of Mr. Neilson's will, as to a pecuniary legacy, bequeathed to Mrs. Mayrant.

*203

The bill charged that Mathew Neilson made his will on the 12th January, 1771, and devised to his mother Mrs. Ellen Neilson, during her life, the use of his plantation, negroes and stock; and after payment of plantation expenses, and house expenses, the proceeds to be applied towards the payment of the legacies mentioned in his will. He bequeathed several pecuniary legacies to different persons: And to his niece Isabella the complainant, a legacy of £5000 currency, and directed that she should be maintained and educated out of part of the interest of it: And he gave a similar legacy to his niece Mrs. Davis. He devised his plantation on which he lived and the lands adjoining to his brother Jared Neilson, with several limitations over; and bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to his said brother Jared: And he directed that his other lands (named and described) should be sold at the discretion of his executors, and the money arising therefrom, "to be applied towards the payment of the legacies" given in his said will. Jared Neilson alone proved the will, qualified as executor, and took possession of the estate on the death of the testator. The testator's estate was a large and clear one, that of Jared the executor and residuary legatee, much embarrassed. After the death of Mrs. Ellen Neilson, the mother of testator, which happened about the year 1776, Jared got possession of all his brother's estate. He never paid the legacies to complainant or her sister, nor the interest on them—but he did pay the expenses of the two legatees, nieces of testator, during a very short time that they were in Charleston for education; but he had possession of their grand-mother's estate also, which was bequeathed to them, and which might have furnished sufficient funds for that purpose—That Jared sold the lands which were directed to be sold, and the money to be applied towards the payment of the legacies; but they were alleged to be insufficient, and never were applied at all to that purpose. *Nor were any part of the profits of the crops so applied, so that the legacies remain wholly unpaid: And from the accumulation of debts and interest, and the losses of crops, negroes, &c. it is said to be doubtful whether Jared Neilson's estate will pay his debts, though Mathew Neilson's estate is perfectly solvent, if it can be discriminated. Mrs. Mayrant, the niece and legatee of Mathew Neilson, filed this bill together with her husband, for the recovery of the legacy.

*204

The executor in his answer admitted all the facts charged by the bill; and stated that it was believed the surplus profits of the crops during the life estate of Mrs. Ellen Neilson, the mother of the testator Mathew, (to whom the income of the estate was bequeathed during life, charged with the legacies,) had not been sufficient to pay any part of the legacies; and that the lands directed to be sold for that purpose, (one of the tracts having been recovered by a better title,) were also insufficient: And that Jared Neilson, the executor and principal residuary, devisee and legatee of Mathew Neilson, who it is believed, but not known positively, sold those lands, had applied no part of the proceeds of the sale to the payment of the legacies; and his estate was likely to be insolvent, and complainant might suffer, unless she could make Mathew Neilson's property liable—That Mathew Neilson's estate was large, and clear; but that it had been so blended by the executor Jared Neilson with his own for a considerable time, that it was impossible to distinguish them—That several specific bequests of negroes had been delivered to legatees under Mathew Neilson's will: and the executor submitted, that the legacy to the complainant Mrs. Mayrant, was so particularly charged and located on the profits of the estate, and the lands directed to be sold, that she was not entitled to have the legacy raised from any other part of the estate generally; however insufficient the particular funds on which it was charged, or however misapplied by the executor.

The cause came to a hearing, and was argued by Messrs. Desaussure, Ford and Pringle for complainants, and by Mr. E. Rutledge for defendant.

*205

*The complainants' counsel contended, that the testator's providing a particular fund, out of which the legacies were to be paid, is no ground to defeat the legacy on the failure of that fund. 1 P. Wms. 777, 8, 9, Savil v. Blacket, where lord chancellor Macclesfield decided that a legacy devised to be paid out of a particular fund, should not, on failure of that fund, be lost, but be paid out of some other part of the estate—the lord chancellor said it was possible for a legacy to be charged in such a manner upon a certain fund, as that upon its failing the legacy shall be lost. But this depends upon the circumstances, and the apparent intention, taken in connexion with other provisions of the will. It weighed with the chancellor that this was a considerable estate; and that if a legacy be given to one, to be paid out of a particular debt, and there should not appear to be such a debt, or the fund fail, the legacy ought to be paid: for the failing of the modus appointed for payment should not defeat the legacy. So 2 P. Wms. 164. Crocket v. Crocket. Ambler 401. 566. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 553. 5. 568. 9. In Ellison v. Airey. 2 Vesey 569, it is said by the chancellor, that in such cases the testator only means that a particular fund should be first applied. See too 2 Atk. 625. Walker v. Jackson. 1 Bro. C. C. 145, Samwell v. Wake.—That the testator, in the case under discussion, did not expect that the annual profits of his estate, (after paying the plantation expenses, and his mother's household expenses,) would pay the legacies; for he superadds a direction to sell certain lands, for the purpose of paying the legacies; and he did not consider it certain that even that would be sufficient; for he says, the proceeds of the sales should be applied "towards paying the legacies." This expression indicates his meaning to be, that he looked to these funds merely as the primary, and not as the sole fund. If he had intended to restrict the amount of the legacies to these funds, he would have said the surplus income of his estate, and the amount sales of the lands ordered to be sold, should go in satisfaction of the legatees: But he fixes a precise sum, £5000 apiece, and points out the sources first to be resorted to

*206

"towards the payment." *The testator's intention is manifested by considering the state of his family. He had a mother, a brother, and a sister's children, but neither wife nor child of his own. He provides for his mother for life, gives legacies to his nieces, and a large estate to his brother Jared. He meant to make at least a certain provision for his nieces; and put himself in the place of a parent so far as even to direct their education. It is not therefore at all probable that he meant the amount of their legacies to be uncertain and contingent, dependant on crops, and on the sale of lands of doubtful value.—Then, as to the situation of the estate: Mathew Neilson's estate was large, and clear. Jared Neilson, the executor and residuary devisee and legatee, took possession of the whole. His mingling the estate with his own, and his representatives disposing of part of it, and pledging part of it for his debts, cannot prejudice the legatees. His conduct and that of his representatives was a breach of trust as to the legatees, and the court will follow the property. 1 Atk. 418. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 421. Jared Neilson was not entitled to apply any part of the estate to his own use, till he paid the legacies; he was residuary legatee and devisee: And even if the legacies had been confined, to be paid out of the profits of the estate, there being no limited time, he should have kept the estate together as the estate of Mathew Neilson till the legatees were paid. The court must be satisfied that the surplus income (above the charges imposed on it) was sufficient to pay the legacies, before they will restrict the legacies to that fund, or suppose that the testator meant to do so.

On the part of the defendant it was insisted, that an executor has a right to sell the personal estate of testator, as well as the heir has a right to sell the real estate: And if they sell, the purchaser for valuable consideration is secure, the property is absolutely vested in him, but the executor and heir are liable to account. See 1 Vesey 483. 1 Bac. 26. 2 Bla. Rep. 801. 2 Atk. 63, 468. 2 Vesey 268. It was also insisted, that the legacy was restricted to the particular funds designated by the testator; and that the general estate was not liable; and that at all *events, the legatees could not come on the general estate till it was ascertained that the particular funds were exhausted: More especially as the blending the estates of Mathew and Jared had made it difficult to follow that of Mathew; and the executor of Jared, from ignorance, had sold some and mortgaged others of the negroes for Jared's debts.

*207

The only point the court said it was at present necessary to decide is, whether the bequest under the will of Mathew Neilson to Eleanor and Isabella Norwell (the nieces of testator) is strictly confined to the specific funds of the profits arising from his estate, and the lands directed to be sold towards the payment of his legacies, or whether, in case of a failure of those, it becomes a charge upon the general residuary estate. It is evident he meant to give his niece the complainant, now before the court, a beneficial interest out of his estate, and not merely a nominal one: But admit for a moment that the legacies attach themselves to the profits of the estate, then by the will Jared Neilson could not take the estate absolutely till the profits had been sufficient to pay the legacies —(see the will.) It being therefore evident he did not intend that J. Neilson should take till he had satisfied all the legacies, it is immaterial then whether one of the specific funds failed, viz. the lands; for in that case recourse ought to have been had to the labour of the negroes, until the legacies were raised: But as J. Neilson has thought proper to divert that fund to his own use, or his executors since his death have done so, we must consequently have recourse to that part of Mathew Neilson's estate, from which it was intended the legacies should have been raised, viz; the negroes; and out of the sale of which we are of opinion the legacies to the complainants must now be raised; unless, on a reference to the master it shall be found that the estate has been sufficiently productive for that purpose. It must therefore be referred to the master to state the accounts between all the parties in this suit, and report accordingly.

1 Desaus. *208

*Case LXVIII.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Hutson, and Mathews.

Executors of GADSDEN v. Executors of LORD.

(July, 1791.)

[Executors and Administrators ⟸263.]

The court made the husband of an executrix who received the monies of the estate liable for the same—And that the money received on bond debts should be considered as a bond debt, &c. even to the prejudice of other creditors.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Mason's Ex'rs v. Man's Ex'rs, 3 Desaus. 122; Rolain v. Darby, 1 McCord, Eq. 475, 476; Stock v. Parker, 2 McCord, Eq. 384.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 985; Dec. Dig. ⟸263.]

[Equity ⟸92.]

[Where a court of equity has obtained jurisdiction of a cause for the purpose of discovery, and the subject-matter is proper for the consideration of a court of equity, it will dispose of the case finally, although the remedy at law is fully adequate had not a discovery been necessary.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 114; Dec. Dig. ⟸92.]

[Executors and Administrators ⟸292.]

[An executor has no right to retain for a legacy or distributive share, given him by the will, to the exclusion of other legatees or distributees.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1164; Dec. Dig. ⟸292.]

The complainants in this case charged in their bill, that they were the only children of Thomas Gadsden, deceased: That the said Thomas was possessed of a considerable estate, both real and personal, and on the 27th of February, 1770, duly executed his last will and testament, and therein provided for the maintenance and education of complainants until they arrived at the age of twenty-one; and ordered, that the estate, both real and personal, should be equally divided between complainants and their mother, and appointed complainants' mother executrix thereof, and Christopher Gadsden, James Gadsden and Andrew Rutledge executors: a copy whereof was filed with bill—That the said Thomas departed this life and their said mother proved the said will, and took upon herself the execution thereof—That some time after the death of complainants' father, their mother intermarried with Andrew Lord, who took into his possession all the goods and effects belonging to the estate of complainants' father, and managed the same until his death; during which time he received large sums from complainants' mother, and divers persons indebted to the estate, which he applied to the purchase of valuable lands and negroes.—Complainants further set forth, that on balancing accounts between the said Andrew Lord and Thomas Gadsden, there appears to be due to the estate of the said Thomas Gadsden, the sum of £4616. 10s. 10d. sterling, with interest thereon, and that the greater part thereof, to wit, the sum of £4367. 10s. 7d. sterling, was received by the said Andrew Lord for bonds and notes due to the estate of said Thomas Gadsden deceased, as appears by exhibits filed with the bill—That the said Andrew Lord departed this life on the —— day of ——, 1780, leaving his will in full force, and William and George Ancrum executors thereto, who took upon themselves the execution thereof—Complainants further shew, that they have arrived to the age of tweny-one, and that they have applied to the executors *of said Andrew Lord for payment of their respective shares or proportions of the money received by the said Andrew Lord for the estate of the said Thomas Gadsden, or for a part of the lands and negroes purchased as aforesaid; but they have refused to do so, pretending that the said Andrew Lord did not leave property enough to pay more than his bond debts; and that as complainants had no bond of the said Andrew Lord, they were not warranted in paying them, as complainants could only support their claim from the books of the said Andrew; whereas complainants apprehend that as the said Andrew only acted for them in nature of a trustee, and as the monies received by him were on account of bonds and other specialties due the estate of said Thomas Gadsden, deceased, and vested in valuable property as aforesaid, they are in equity entitled to all the advantages of bond creditors, of said Andrew at least, if their claims are not indeed of a superior nature to those of bond creditors: Complainants pray that they may not be placed in a worse situation than they would have been if the said monies had not been received by the said Andrew Lord; and that such monies as were paid to the said Andrew, not on account of bonds, notes, and specialties, due to the estate of said Thomas Gadsden, may be considered as that third part of the estate of said Thomas, to which said Andrew was entitled in right of his said wife; and that the remaining two thirds, which complainants are entitled to, may be considered as debts of the highest nature, and as such may be charged on the estate of said Andrew, and that part of the lands and negroes aforesaid may be allotted them—Complainants believe that executors of said Andrew wish to make such allotment, if they thought they could be safe in so doing—Complainants pray that said executors may make full answer to the premises, and that the demands of complainants may be decreed to be paid out of said Andrew's estate as a debt of the highest nature, and that complainants may have such other relief as to your honours shall seem meet.

*209

To this bill the defendants put in the following answer: The defendants in their answer admit, that Thomas *Gadsden did make his will to the effect as in bill set forth, and did appoint his wife executrix, and other persons his executors; and also that the said Thomas Gadsden afterwards died, and that his wife proved the said will, and qualified thereon; that some time after the widow intermarried with Andrew Lord; but the defendants do not know (otherwise than may appear from Andrew Lord's books) that he did take into his possession the goods and effects of the said estate, and also the books, notes, and specialties belonging thereto, and manage the same for several years, until his death; nor do they know otherwise than may appear from entries in his books, that he received any sums of money from his wife, and other persons indebted to the complainants' father's estate, nor do they know whether he applied any part of the same to the purchase of valuable lands or negroes; but they think it probable that as he must have received considerable sums of money from the extensive commercial dealings in which he was concerned, he may have had funds to enable him to pay such cash as was requisite for such purchase of lands and negroes as he may have made; as will appear from the cash account extracted from his books: And they say that they have not been able to find any other entries in the books of Andrew Lord respecting the purchases of said lands and negroes, but such as appear by the extracts therefrom, from which it appears that he did not discriminate from what sources he received the cash he applied towards such purchases, and that they were partly settled by discount of debts due Andrew Lord or copartnerships in which he was concerned, or by his own bonds, some of which are yet outstanding; and Samuel Douglass, formerly a copartner of the said Andrew Lord, has lately pretended a claim as surviving copartner, to sixty negroes, as having been the joint property of that concern, and as having been carried away, during the war, by Andrew Lord, from one of the company's plantations in Georgia. The defendants also admit that on balancing accounts between Andrew Lord and the estate of Thomas Gadsden, there appeared to be due the estate £4616. 10s. 10d. sterling, besides interest, and that the greater part, £4367. *10s. 7d. sterling, of said money, was received by Andrew Lord, for bonds and notes due the estate, according to the exhibits with bill filed. They also admit, that the said Andrew Lord being indebted to Thomas Gadsden's estate, died, leaving a will, whereof William Ancrum and George Ancrum were appointed executors, who qualified thereon and took upon themselves the execution thereof: And that the complainants have both arrived to the age of twenty-one, and since their attaining that age have applied to Andrew Lord's executors for the payment of their portions of the monies received by Andrew Lord, on account of the estate of Thomas Gadsden, or for a proportionate part of the lands and negroes purchased therewith as they pretend, and that they refused to comply with such request, because they conceived themselves bound by law to apply the estate and effects of the testator, in the first place, to the payment of specialty creditors, under the apprehension which they expressed and still entertain, that the said estate and effects would not be sufficient to pay the debts of the testator of every kind, as well those due and owing on specialty as by simple contract, in which latter class they conceived the complainants' demands must be ranked. The defendants further set forth, that it did not strike them, nor can they determine, that Andrew Lord acted for complainants only in the nature and capacity of a trustee and agent; nor do they know or believe that the whole of the monies so received by Andrew Lord, and taken up in bonds, notes and specialties, which were due the estate of Thomas Gadsden, were actually vested in valuable purchases as aforesaid; and submit to the court whether the complainants can have their claims for the reasons stated by them, placed in the rank of bonds or specialties: And they are not convinced of the propriety of complainants' prayer, that such part of the monies, so received by Andrew Lord, as were not paid to him in bonds, notes and specialties, due to the estate of Thomas Gadsden, might be considered and taken for a part of that third of said estate to which Andrew Lord, in right of his wife, was entitled; and that the remaining two-thirds of the said monies to which complainants are *entitled, might be considered as debts of the highest degree, and as such might be charged on Andrew Lord's estate, or that there might be allotted to them a proportionate part of the lands and negroes so purchased: But as there are other creditors to whom the testator was indebted to a great amount, who would be very much injured, and might make the defendants accountable for such injury, if they were to give the complainants any preference, and as the lands and negroes bought by Andrew Lord were purchased by him absolutely, and in his own name, as his property, they presume they will be justified in not complying with complainants' requisitions, as they had reason to think that the estate of the said Andrew would be insolvent, as will appear by exhibits with answer filed. They deny all manner of combination, and pray that they may be dismissed with reasonable costs and charges.

*210

*211

*212

The cause came to a hearing on 14th July, 1791, and was argued by General Pinckney and Mr. E. Rutledge for complainants, and by Messrs. Pringle, Parker, and Desaussure for defendants.—Very imperfect notes of the arguments remain.

For complainants it was insisted, that Mr. Lord, acting in his character of husband of the executrix, and receiving large sums of money of the estate, on bonds due to the estate, was chargeable for the amount as bond debts: And that having purchased largely, both lands and negroes, he shall be presumed to have purchased them with these funds; especially as the testator had directed his executors to improve his estate for his children by purchases: And that these lands and negroes should be allotted to complainants as purchased in trust for them. The will of a testator directs lands to be purchased in trust for the use of A.—The executor makes the purchase; but makes no other than a verbal declaration of the trust—The executor dies insolvent—The court of chancery directed the estate so purchased to be assigned to A. notwithstanding the statute of frauds says, that all declarations of trust should be in writing. And if a man is security for another on bond, and the security pays the debt, he may bring his action at law for on assumpsit, or *he may take an assignment of the bond, and come in as a specialty creditor.

*213

The cases cited by complainants' counsel were, 4 Burn. 96. 1 Atk. 59, 135. 5 Bro. P. C. 400. 3 Atk. 754. 2 Vern. 342, 608. 2 P. Wms. 543, 644. 1 Vern. 267. 3 Atkins, Chapman v. Tanner.

For the defendants it was argued, that a court of equity cannot give relief against a positive statute. It cannot declare a trust as to lands, where there is no declaration in writing, unless in some peculiar cases of fraud. See 2 Comyn's Digest, 212. The court of chancery in marshalling assets, can do so only as to equitable assets; not as to legal. 1 Vesey, sen. 135—That it would be very unimportant in what order the debts were classed, unless there was an apprehension of insolvency—That in such an event, the legal rights of others are to be regarded: The law has said, that a breach of trust raises only a simple contract debt; and to depart from that rule, and raise the debt to the complainants up to the grade of a bond debt, would violate the order prescribed by statute, and injure real bond creditors of Mr. Lord, and even prejudice certain securities of Mr. Lord, who are entitled to the protection of the court; a specialty debt is a debt under seal, and no other is so.

The cases cited for the defendants were, 1 Comyn's Digest, 254, 269, 276—title Devastavit. 2 Atk. 119, Vernon v. Vawdry—(express that breach of trust is but a simple contract debt, and can fall only on the personal assets of trustee.) 1 Vesey 523. Talbot 109. 1 Vesey 312, 313. 2 Vesey 212. 2 Atk. 246. 3 Atk. 237. 1 Atk. 615.

The court made an order, that it be referred to the master to enquire into the specific nature of the debts which Mr. Lord received on account of the estate of Gadsden; the dates of the several receipts, and whether any of the monies so received by him were laid out in the purchase of lands or negroes, and report accordingly.

August, 1791.

Afterwards Chancellor MATHEWS delivered the opinion of the court:

In whatever light this case is viewed, whether considering Mr. Lord acting as a rightful executor in conse*quence of his marriage with the executrix, or as executor de son tort, as a trustee, or as a stranger, who got possession of the infants' property,—he has acted directly contrary to the will of the testator, which ordered that his estate should be improved, as his executor should think fit. He has committed a great breach of trust, for which he was punishable out of his estate if living; and his executors under the statute of Charles, and William and Mary, and our act of assembly of March, 1789, are equally answerable with himself as far as they have assets in their hands. All the cases go to prove that the court will indemnify a security for any loss he might sustain by paying debts for which he was security, by assigning over the security on judgment: And to dispose of all the testator's estate, even his wife's paraphernalia, before security should be made liable. Trustees may be guilty of a breach of trust, and are punishable for it. Where executors lay out assets of testator, in the purchase of lands, they should be restored to testator's estate. Committing a devastavit, executors are considered as trustees of the estate; and if a stranger enters and receives the profits of an infant's estate, in consideration of this conduct, he shall be looked on as a trustee for the infant. The bankrupt laws put all creditors on a footing; yet where the property can be come at that was sold and not paid for, the court uniformly decreed, that the vendor has a specific lien on it, and it should stand charged with payment of purchase money, though no specific agreement. † In the case of the Baptist Congregation v.

*214

† See as to the following assets, 2 Vesey 265–9, Jacomb v. Harwood—In this case the court said that executors de son tort, or strangers meddling with an estate, they shall be accountable as trustees: Also, that where the property can be come at, that was sold and not paid for, the court uniformly decrees the vendor should have a specific lien; and it should stand charged with the payment of the purchase money, though no special agreement.—Sed vide decree of this court in the case of W. L. Smith, and others, representatives of W. Wragg v. the comptroller general and others, decided in May, 1807, wherein the court decreed, that the vendor who did not take a mortgage of the property sold, has no equitable lien, so as to entitle him to a preference over other creditors.

*215

administrator *of Leigh, decided in this court, the administrator was ordered to restore bonds to the congregation for bonds which he had received belonging to the trust —That case was not contested, but that does not vary the matter; all the foregoing cases prove, that Mr. Lord acting as executor, trustee, or a stranger, was equally answerable for his misconduct.

Defendants' counsel have insisted, that where creditors by the strictest rules of the court have got an advantage, the court will not deprive them of it; and that all creditors in equal decree must come in pari passu; and that this court aims at equality of satisfaction, as far as possible, in the administration of assets. We perfectly accord with the cases in opinion; but then it remains for the court to determine the point whether the plaintiff shall be considered as bond creditors or simple contract creditors: Having settled that point, in whatever class complainants stand, they must be paid by defendants pari passu. As to referring it to a court of law to determine whether complainants shall be considered as bond or simple contract creditors, this court we apprehend are full as competent to decide it as a court of law, and rather more so. What relief could complainants have at law, had they brought an action for money received, and how could it have been supported? Where are their proofs? They could have no discovery by the oath of defendants, but in this court, where the whole transaction could be sifted and unraveled, and the nature of the debts particularly specified; from whom received, when paid, and the amount: and having made the discovery, this court can as well order payment as a court of common law. Discovery draws after it relief. The case in 3 Atk. 333, does not attribute any exclusive jurisdiction to the court of common law; the judge only says, that bond creditors and simple contract creditors shall be considered in the same light in this court as at common law. But should this court, under the circumstances of this case, determine that complainants ought to be considered as bond creditors, they will be paid as such pari passu.

*216

*The case of Vernon v. Vawdry, Ventris 40, has been much relied on by defendants' counsel. It is a very extraordinary one. There is no case stated to shew upon what principles the court determined the question: There are three points settled, but it does not appear how they came before the court for determination; they are totally unconnected; the first is upon a mere point of practice relative to an original and amended bill, being considered as one; 2d, that a breach of trust is considered as a simple contract debt, and can only fall on the personal estate of the trustee; the 3d is relative to a marshalling of assets. Unless some reasons for the determination appear in the cases cited, the court will take no notice of them, nor hold itself bound to follow the determination of any foreign court as a guide for its decisions, further than as such determinations may appear to be founded in equity and good conscience. The case abovementioned, cannot be considered as the law of this country, though it may be in England; because there, lands are only liable to bond debts and specialties where the heir is bound; whereas in this state, a man's real estate is equally liable with his personal property to the payment of all his debts. It was said that complainants are not specialty creditors, having no bond from Mr. Lord. It may be asked, how it was possible for them to obtain one; they have but lately come of age, and he has been dead several years. It was contended, that Mr. Lord had a right to retain as executor in preference to complainants. But his wife, Mrs. Lord, was only a legatee, entitled to a third of the estate, under the same clause of the will that gives the rest to her children. Claiming under the same person, and under the same clause of the will, there can be no priority between them. Mr. Lord was a mere stranger, an intruder: as to Mr. Gadsden, the testator, he was no creditor; but taking from testator's bounty to his wife, he must take it upon the same terms as complainants. This is not a case between a creditor executor, and another creditor; in such case he would undoubtedly have had a right to retain against creditors of equal rank, but this is a case between the heirs of testator and his executor, who *has possessed himself of all the assets, and converted them to his own use. It was contended for the creditors, that Mr. Lord should be allowed his full third, and complainants receive a dividend as his simple contract creditors; but upon what principle is not discoverable, unless it may be supposed Mr. Gadsden intended to make a compliment of one third of this estate, to the creditors of any after husband his wife might marry, absolutely, and subject the remaining two thirds to a diminution, by his children coming in pari passu with such second husband's simple contract creditors, to whom probably the whole money received on account of the estate had been already paid—It does not appear how Mr. Lord disposed of the money he received: Suppose he had paid off all his simple contract creditors with it, would it not be highly unreasonable and unjust to say, although he has used the complainants' money received on bond debts, in payment of his simple contract debts, they should nevertheless be considered only as simple contract creditors, when probably he has left only assets sufficient to pay his bond creditors? Hard would be the lot of infants, if, where the misplaced confidence of the testator in appointing executors who were unworthy of the trust, and who should waste his assets, this court had not a power to make them account for their misconduct; but peculiarly hard would be the case of children, if, by the unbounded confidence of a husband in appointing his wife executrix, and her making an improvident second marriage, she should put her children's estate in the power of such second husband, who might waste or dissipate the whole of it, and leave them destitute, if this court had not power to make him account for his malconduct. Such would be the situation of the complainants in the present case: But this court having the peculiar charge of infants, will take care of their interest, and not permit it to be wasted by an ungracious executor. If the court once allowed the doctrine contended for by defendant to be just and equitable, that executors may call in all debts due the testator by bond, and make what use they please of the money, and that the infant legatees or children of the testator shall only be considered in the light *of simple contract creditors of the executors, we may say as lord chancellor King did in the case of Mansel v. Mansel, that it will be making proclamation, that all the executors in this country are at liberty to destroy or convert to their own use, with impunity, the property of all the orphans committed to their care, which they are intrusted only to preserve. The case of Powell and Bell, as far as our researches have gone, is the only case that bears any analogy to the present case; where an executrix, who was entitled to a third part of the personal estate, wasted great part of it, married a second husband and died. On a bill against the husband for an account and satisfaction, it was decreed, that he should be charged in nature of a debt absolutely for so much as came to his or his wife's hands after marriage, and for what came to her hands before second marriage, to have satisfaction against husband, so far as he had any of his wife's estate—The decree was affirmed on appeal. So here,—Mr. Lord himself having wasted the assets, his executors should be answerable in like manner. It is admitted by the answer of defendants, that their testator received considerable sums of money for bond debts, and also for simple contract debts due the estate of Mr. Gadsden. As Mr. Lord in right of his wife was entitled to a third part and received it, many years ago, it would be extremely unjust and unreasonable to say he should have this whole proportion, which he undoubtedly applied to payment of his own debts, and that the complainants, the infant legatees, and children of the testator, should be considered merely as his simple contract creditors, in which case they will receive little or nothing. Mr. Gadsden having by his will ordered, that his estate should be improved as his executors should think proper, and there being no other way of improving money, than by putting it out at interest, and as Mr. Lord retained the whole in his own possession, this court, which always looks upon those things as done which ought to be done, will, under the circumstances of this case, consider Mr. Lord as a bond debtor, as to so much of the assets as he received for bond debts, and debtor on simple contract for such sums as were originally simple contract debts.

*217

*218

*219

*It was therefore decreed, that it be referred to the master to examine the accounts of defendants' testator, and ascertain what sums of money were received by him on account of Thomas Gadsden's estate for bond, and what for notes and accounts; the times when they were respectively received; how much for principal, and what for interest; and whether it be liable to any and what depreciation—That the master do also ascertain the annual income of Mr. Gadsden's estate, and deduct therefrom three fourths of such income annually, until the eldest of complainants attain the age of twenty-one years, the testator having by his will appropriated so much for the maintenance of his wife and children—That whatever balance shall appear to be then due the estate, complainants shall be considered as bond creditors, as to two thirds of what was received on the bond debts; and be ranked as simple contract creditors for what was received on the notes and accounts—That they be allowed interest on such sums from the time the eldest of complainants attained his age of twenty-one years; and that the said money be paid to them by the defendants in the same proportions as the other bond and simple contract creditors of their testator are entitled to receive their debts: And that the same be paid agreeably to the terms of the instalment act: And that the defendants do pay the costs of suit.

And in September, 1791, the master made his report conformably to the decretal order of the court, which was confirmed.

---

1 Desaus. 219

Case LXVIII.

Present—Chancellors Hutson and Mathews.

WINIFRED WILSON, by Her Next Friend, v. JOHN WILSON.

(July, 1791.)

[Contracts ⊂⊃137; Husband and Wife ⊂⊃182.]

Bill to set up a bond to execute a marriage settlement—Such bond not avoided by a defeazance made at the same time by the husband; the wife being ignorant of such defeazance; though it appeared that the inducement to his executing the bond, after the marriage, was to avoid forfeiture.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 702; Dec. Dig. ⇐137; Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 719; Dec. Dig. ⇐182.]

[Witnesses ⇐98.]

Trustees not at liberty to give evidence to defeat the trust deed or bond.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 324; Dec. Dig. ⇐98.]

[Husband and Wife ⇐205.]

[Pending a suit by a wife against her husband to enforce a marriage settlement, the husband was ordered to pay her alimony for the expenses of the litigation.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 755; Dec. Dig. ⇐205.]

[Injunction ⇐38.]

[In proceedings by a wife to set up a bond to execute a marriage settlement, an injunction will be granted to prevent any disposition of property by the husband until a hearing can be had on the merits.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 89; Dec. Dig. ⇐38.]

[This case is also cited in Croft v. Arthur, 3 Desaus. 233; Threewits v. Threewits, 4 Id. 571, regarding marriage settlements.]

The complainant stated in her bill, that being about to be married to Archibald Baird, articles of agreement were entered into between them, by which it was stipulated, that in case she should survive him, and there should be no children of the marriage, she should be entitled to receive during her life an annuity of £700 sterling, out of *his estate; but in case there should be issue of the marriage, the annuity should be restricted to £250 sterling, which restriction should continue during the existence of such issue, and no longer—That the marriage took effect on the 20th October, 1773; and her husband Archibald Baird died in the year 1777, having previously duly executed his last will, by which he bequeathed her several specific legacies, confirmed her marriage settlement, and devised his whole real and personal estate to his son William A. Baird, (the issue of the marriage,) and in case of his death under twenty-one years of age, and without issue, then he devised all his estate to her and her heirs.—The bill further charges, that some years afterwards, being about to marry John Wilson, the defendant, he agreed to settle to her sole and separate use, all the rights and interests she had under the settlement and will of her first husband; and on the 8th of May, 1781, he executed a bond, by the condition of which he engaged, (in case the said marriage should take effect,) to convey to John Saunders and Thomas Merrett, their heirs, &c. as trustees, for the complainant, the said Winifred, all the estate, interest and property, which the said John Wilson might acquire by the marriage, in the annuity and also in all such real estate or other rights, to which the said W. Baird might be or become entitled to under the settlement, or under the will aforesaid: Upon trust to permit the said Winifred to receive the said annuity to which she was entitled under the settlement of her first husband; and to receive and take the rents and profits of the real estate she might acquire to her sole and separate use, independent of her said husband, and not subject to his debts; and that he would execute proper deeds, to give full effect to the agreement—That in part performance of the same agreement, the said John Wilson, after the intended marriage took effect, executed another agreement, on the 2d June, 1781, by which, (after reciting the said bond,) he conveyed to John Saunders and Thomas Merrett, their executors, administrators, &c. all the estate, right, title, &c. which the said John Wilson had acquired by his marriage, of, in, and to the said annuity, in trust for the complain*ant, to her sole and separate use, free from the control of her husband, and not subject to his debts—That her son W. A. Baird died some time in the year 1788, under age and without issue, by which event she became entitled, under the will of her first husband A. Baird, to his whole estate—That on the death or absence of the executors of her first husband Mr. Baird, administration with the will annexed was granted to the defendant John Wilson—That though it appears on the face of the bond, and of the instrument executed by the said John Wilson, that only the real estate, and the annuity secured by her marriage settlement (with Mr. Baird) are actually settled, (by said Wilson,) yet it was the intention of said J. Wilson to settle on complainant the personal, as well as the real estate, to which she might be entitled on the death of her son: but the same was omitted through error—That complainant being dissatisfied with the conduct of said John Wilson, and desirous that the estate which he acquired by marriage with her, should be vested in trustees, conformably to the agreement of the parties, she applied to her said husband for that purpose; but he has refused to comply with his stipulations, and marriage agreements; has possessed himself of the whole real and personal estate, and threatens to sell the negroes, apply the proceeds to his own use, and to quit the United States—That independently of these threats, he cannot long remain in this state, as he was banished from Pennsylvania, of which he was a native, for his adherence to the British, and he still remains under the penalty of the laws of that state. The bill prays that the said John Wilson may be decreed to come to a fair account, to pay over to complainant the arrears of annuity, and to convey the whole real and personal estate to trustees for complainant: And that in the mean time he may be restrained from selling any part of the property of the estate of Baird, claimed by complainant.

*220

*221

The defendant by his answer admits the complainant's marriage with Mr. Baird,—Baird's settlement on her,—his will and his death—He asserts that in the spring of 1781, he paid his addresses to his present wife, who *accepted of them—Denies that previous to, or at the marriage, he offered to make any settlement, or that she hinted a wish to that purpose—They lived affectionately, till his duty called him to New York, in 1782—During that time they had a daughter, who is now alive, and at school at his expense—He admits the execution of the bond, and the assignment of the annuity; but he denies that they were executed on the 8th of May, when they bear date; on the contrary, he positively asserts that they were executed at New York, about 28th August, 1782—That in consequence of letters from her, in which she represents, "that the whole of the estate to which he was entitled in her right, was under confiscation, and advertised for sale," and requesting he would send her the bond and antidate it, he signed the papers, which are set forth in the bill—That he had then the precaution to get from the trustees a defeazance to the bond, which mentions the occasion of its having been given—He asserts that the property was not within the reach of the confiscation act—That it was a trick in her to obtain a settlement—That not having time or opportunity to enquire into the business, he took the defeazance—That she availed herself of his unquestionable affection, at a time when she knew that there was nothing in his power which he would not have done to make her quiet and happy—That he knew at the time, that the bond would be of little service—He admits the death of young Baird, under age and without issue, in 1788; and claims the personal estate as devolving on him:—He also claims the lands during life as tenant by the courtesy—Admits his having obtained letters of administration on A. Baird's estate—Denies having ever proposed or intended to settle the personal estate of A. Baird on the complainant—Asserts that the whole affair was a contrivance on her part to get every thing out of his power, that she might throw him off, and act as she pleased. Denies that he ever intended to sell the negroes, or to quit the country; on the contrary, he is taking measures to become a citizen of the United States.

*222

He then inserts extracts of her letters to prove that the settlement was made after marriage, and at her re*quest, to avoid the confiscation or rather the effects of the acts of confiscation.

*223

Upon the answer coming in, the complainant's counsel moved for an injunction to restrain the defendant from selling or removing the property in dispute; and also to obtain a conveyance of the property to trustees subject to the final decree: And that the defendant should in the mean time account before the master for the neat proceeds of the crop, and pay over the same to Messrs. Norris and White, to be subject to the future order of the court.

This motion was fully argued on the 16th and 17th March, 1789, by Messrs. Drayton, Bee, C. C. Pinckney, Pringle and E. Rutledge for complainants—And by Mr. Smith, Bay, Read and Desaussure for defendant.

For the complainant it was insisted, that the act of confiscation took in all the right of the defendant to Baird's estate—That the deed of trust was good against Wilson himself, notwithstanding the defeazance—That the defeazance was fraudulent as to his wife; and was so against the state, the object of the deeds being to elude forfeiture—And that the deed meant to include real as well as personal estate; the one being of little value in this country without the other,—presumption that both were intended to be included—That such charges as are made in the bill, and not answered, are to be taken pro confesso—That his banishment from Pennsylvania was charged and not answered, and as an alien he had no right to administer, nor to an estate by courtesy—That the deed, though voluntary, was good against himself, though not against creditors or subsequent purchasers—That no man shall avail himself of his own fraud—That the defeazance was a fraud on the complainant: But it could not avail defendant, for a defeazance must be made or agreed to by the person interested in the estate; this defeazance was neither agreed to nor signed by Mrs. Wilson, for whose benefit the deed was made—That the trustees, giving the defeazance, was a breach of trust, they having no power from Mrs. Wilson, the cestui que trust, to do so—That the circumstance of Mrs. Baird's interest in Mr. Baird's estate being chiefly *contingent, was of no importance, as soon as it vested the agreement to settle attached upon it: That the court will carry into execution an agreement to settle an estate, though a mere possibility. The counsel cited Shepherd's Touchstone, 237. 2 Bla. 317. 2 P. Wms. 467. Ventr. 417, and Cro. James, 270.

*224

For the defendant it was contended, that a person applying for an injunction, must first shew an actual or probable right to the estate. Viner, title injunction, p. 426. 1 Harr. 193, 594. Com. Digest, 153—That this right has not been shewn by the complainant, for upon her marriage with defendant all her rights vested in him—That a bill praying for an injunction must be sworn to, by the positive provision of our law—That this bill is not sworn to, which defendant had a right to require; nor could the complainant safely swear to it: But the answer is sworn to, and must be taken for true, and must have more weight—That an alien coming to this country, and marrying a person possessing real estate, and having issue by her, is entitled to the courtesy in the land. The counsel cited 1 Bla. 372. 2 Bla. 327, 342. 2 Bac. 375, 376. 2 Vesey, 627.

The court on the 18th March, 1789, stated that it would not give any opinion on the merits of the case—that whether the bond could be supported, or whether it should be defeated by the defeazance, must remain to be decided when the whole merits should be gone into: But that there did appear upon the face of the bond from Wilson, a right in the complainant, and that to give an opportunity to go into the whole merits, it was necessary to grant an injunction to prevent in the mean time any disposition of the property.—The court therefore, made the following order: That an injunction do issue to restrain the defendant from selling, removing, or in any other manner disposing of any part of the estate in bill mentioned: And that he do account before the master for all the profits of the said estate, which have or may come into his hands, and deposit the same with the master, to be subject to the future order of this court; except so much as may be necessary for the maintenance of the said defendant, Mr. *Wilson, his wife Mrs. Wilson, and their child, and the customary expenses of the plantation; until a final decree shall be made in this cause: And that it be referred to the master to report what will be a reasonable allowance for the maintenance of Mr. and Mrs. Wilson and the child.

*225

Afterwards various orders were made by the court; particularly some for the payment of money by defendant to complainant to support her during the litigation, and for enlargement of publication. Meanwhile a number of witnesses were examined. The complainant endeavoured to prove that Frazer, the British town-major, (who was a subscribing witness to one of the deeds, executed by John Wilson in favour of his wife,) had not left Charleston in the summer of 1782: and thus to discredit that part of the defendant's answer, in which he states that the deeds were not executed at the time and place the bill charged, but long after the marriage, and in New York. Three witnesses of credit swore they were in Charleston, and did not know or believe that Frazer went from Charleston at all in the summer of 1782—three others swore they understood and believed that he did go to New York in that summer. John Saunders and Thomas Merritt, the persons named in the deed as trustees for Mrs. W. Wilson, were examined for defendant, but without prejudice to the complainant's right to object to the competency of the witnesses. Saunders swore, that being in New York, captain Wilson, some time in May or June, 1782, informed him, that he had received a letter from his wife in Carolina, in which she was apprehensive that the state (of South Carolina) would seize the estate of her late husband Baird, and therefore requested him to make it over to her, to secure it from confiscation: And he believes the bond and assignment were executed for that purpose only; and that they were executed at the same time and place, viz. New York or Long Island, in the summer of 1782—That a defeazance was also executed there, and that the paper produced to the witness is the defeazance, and bears date the 28th July, 1782, and Frazer is not a witness to that—He did not recollect if more than one defeazance was executed; if there was, it must have *been executed at the same time and place—That the complainant Mrs. Wilson was not present at the execution of the bond or defeazance, nor does he know whether she ever consented to it—He did not understand that any of her former husband's estate was to be settled on her. Thomas Merrett swore, that the defendant gave him the information stated by Saunders, at New York, in the summer of 1782—That the bond, assignment and defeazance were executed at the same time—That Frazer, M'Leod, Campbell and Gamble were all present—That the assignment was made to prevent confiscation, and the defeazance to disclaim any right or title in the trustees to the estate—That he was the confidential friend of Wilson,—Mrs. Wilson was then in Carolina—Thinks there were other defeazances at same time—There was no intention of making a real settlement. Two other witnesses, Hardy and Gamble, were also examined.

*226

At the sitting of the court, on the 18th July, 1791, present Chancellors Hutson and Mathews, Mr. Pringle moved, that the testimony of Hardy, Gamble, Merrett and Saunders, witnesses who had been examined in this case, should not be read in the cause. This question was argued by Messrs. Pringle, Holmes and Pinckney for complainant, and by Messrs. Desaussure, Parker and Read for defendant.

For the complainant it was contended, that the evidence of Saunders and Merrett cannot be received, because they are trustees; and that of Hardy and Gamble cannot be received, because it is only hearsay, as to the intentions of the parties; the trustees ought to have been complainants with Mrs. Wilson to support the deeds, and not witnesses to defeat them. Confidential persons cannot be coerced to give evidence to betray the confidence reposed in them, such is the case of counsel. Raym. 733. 1 Domat. 429. Trustees are admitted to benefit the cestui que trust, not to injure him. 1 P. Wms. 290. 2 Vesey, 296. The bill charges a fraud,—the witnesses are not produced to prove the fraud, but to defeat the whole deed, which is not meant by the case in 2 Atk. 229 and 243. In the case under consideration, if the deeds are set aside, the trustees *run no risk of a suit for breach of trust and damages: They are therefore interested in defeating the deed. The deed imports to be in consideration of love and affection; but the defendant wants by parol evidence to prove, that it was to elude a forfeiture, which is a consideration different from that expressed in the deed. This would be contrary to the statute of frauds, which is a remedial law. Where parol evidence has been admitted, it is where it is consistent with the deed, used only to rebut a resulting trust, which is not comprehended within the statute of frauds. 1 P. Wms. 113. An agreement in part executed, takes a case out of the statute of frauds. Mrs. Wilson, by her letter to her husband, requested only the settlement of her annuity, but he settled also the real estate: This was voluntary on his part, and valid against him; for at all events, she used no fraudulent means to obtain that. The cases have decided, that trustees joining to destroy a remainder, it is a breach of trust. Executors are not allowed to be witnesses, because liable to pay costs. This is the case of trustees, who are also liable to suits for breaches of trust. The rule is, that parol evidence may explain but never contradict a deed. The trustees were not set up for the benefit of Mr. Wilson, but of Mrs. Wilson. There are three defeazances in this case,—some bear different dates,—in others there are erazures —no confidence can be placed in them. A man cannot aver any thing against his own deed; consequently he cannot produce evidence for that purpose. 2 Bla. 295. Plowden, 434. 1 Rep. 176, 8 Rep. 158. Fraudulent deeds are good against the parties themselves. A defeazance supposes the deed properly executed—but a defeazance repugnant to the deed is void. Co. Litt. 236, 7. Wood's Conveyancing, 46, 321, 645, 785. There is no condition in the defeazance, which is essential to a defeazance. A fraud was intended against the state,—but Mr. Wilson is not the person to take advantage of it. It is true, that on a suggestion of fraud, parol evidence may be admitted; but the admission of it depends upon circumstances: In admitting parol evidence here, it would to be sure go to prove a fraud in the first instance; but it would also prove *another fraud, and that by themselves as trustees. In matters of account both parties are actors, as if there had been cross bills. 1 Atk. 410. The highest evidence that can be produced, ought to be had; the defeazance would be the highest evidence, and whilst that is to be had, the parol evidence is inadmissible. Wilson in all probability knew that he was included in the confiscation law—That act was passed in February, 1782—A commissioner of forfeited estates visited the plantation early in 1782,—Wilson remained in Charleston till May, 1782: Yet Wilson says in his answer, he knew the estate was not a subject of confiscation—Defeazance bears a different date from the bond,—the subscribing witnesses to the bond are not produced,—others are brought to prove what they ought to have done; this is contrary to every rule of evidence. Wilson says it was a good-natured act of his to let her have her jointure: If he had the defeazance then, how had he given her the jointure? If he had the defeazance originally, why ask her (as he did in his letters) to raise money on the jointure for him? He admitted himself an alien in his supplementary answer. If a man is under attainder, and an estate accrues to his wife, she shall be considered a feme sole as to such estate. 3 P. Wms. 37. The cases relative to trustees may all be reconciled on this principle, that trustees, having no interest, have been admitted to support the trust, but never to betray it. Buller, 284. 1 Raym. 733. Trustees liable for breach of trust. 1 Atk. 243. The assignee of a trustee must be a party to the suit, as the decree must first be against him, and the original trustee to stand as a security. 2 Bro. ch. cas. Burt v. Denhurst. Cestui que trust entitled to have the benefit of the privileges of the trustee in this court. 1 Atk. 450. Parol evidence, even to rebut an equity, is admitted now with caution, even in articles of agreement; and not at all in solemn deeds. 1 Bro. 92. Never to explain away the intent of a deed. 2 Bla. Rep. 1249. Evidence of testator's intent never admitted. 1 Bro. ch. cas. 84, 7 Bro. P. C. 18.

*227

*228

For the defendant it was argued, that the trustee may be a witness against the trust.

*229

2 Trials per pais, 388—*The bond and defeazance are one entire deed, and ought to be taken together—The trustees have been cross examined, which admits their testimony. The legal estates were in Wilson when he executed the deeds—He could therefore annex what conditions he pleased—the defeazance is entitled to its effect, as well as the deed. Defendant offers to settle £250 per annum on the complainant, or he will take home a disobedient wife. Wilson is administrator of Baird with the will annexed—he had the possession: Wilson is called upon to answer if the bond, and the deed confirming it, were not duly executed, and when, and upon what consideration—He answers that they were executed together with the defeazance, all at the same time; not when they bear date, but at a subsequent day—antedated, and for the purpose of eluding confiscation. This was the object pointed out by the wife, and he accedes to it. The trustees are called in to support his answer in all this, though that stands on oath, uncontradicted; for her bill is not sworn to. They are competent to state the real truth of the facts—They have not done any act in breach of trust—They have neither sold nor wasted the trust estate: How can the disclosure of the truth, amount to a breach of trust? They state the object of the deeds, and that the defeazance accompanied the deed, to give effect to the real object; which was not to make a real settlement, but to elude a forfeiture: If that was wrong, she shared in the blame, as she suggested the plan—and she is now complainant; and she is not more entitled to the protection of the court than defendant.

For defendant were cited the following cases, 2 Atk. 288, 9, Man v. Ward, where Lord Hardwicke expressly lays it down, that though in general the rules of evidence are the same in equity as at law, the court of equity will admit trustees to be sworn, (though not admitted at law,) in order to come at fraud, or to know the true and real intention of a trust, or use, declared under deeds. Also, 1 Vesey, 61, 2. 2 Vesey, 446. 2 Atk. 98, 9, 283, 524. 1 Vesey, 323. 2 Atk. 254. 3 Atk. 388. 1 Bro. C. C. 599. Cowper's Rep. 340. 1 P. Wms. 300. 2 Atk. 40. 2 Vesey, 629. 17 Viner, Pl. 8. 2 Bla. 327. Cro. James, 469.

*230

*After the argument of counsel, the court proceeded to deliver its opinion on the point of the admissibility of the trustees as witnesses, on the part of the complainant. The reasons of the judgment of the court are not put on record: But I possess a manuscript in the hand-writing of Chancellor MATHEWS, corrected in the hand-writing of Chancellor HUTSON, which is endorsed as follows: "The opinion given by the court, on the point of law, whether the trustees could be admitted as evidence to defeat the trust deed;" which paper was found among a few of the papers of the Wilson cause. The following is a copy of that opinion:

"The court said, there was not a single case of the number cited by the counsel, which came up to the point now contended for, viz. that the trustees to a deed have been admitted to give parol evidence to defeat, or destroy the trust deed. The court has never gone further than admission of parol evidence, to explain, for the purpose of correcting errors, unravelling doubts, or apparent contradictions; and in some very special instances, to discover fraud. But no case has been produced to shew that the trustees have been admitted to prove the deed, to which they were parties, to be fraudulent ab initio. No such case is to be found, as it would be repugnant to law and equity. The case of Man and Ward, in 2 Atk. 229, (relied on by the defendant's counsel,) is the only instance where the grantor was admitted to prove the grant fraudulent: But in that case the grantor never had any estate in the thing granted; but it was a mere deception, to defraud the rightful owner—and it was well enough, under such circumstances. But that is not the case here—The defendant Wilson does not grant to the trustees the rights of others—There is no apparent fraud on the face of the deed, quoad Mrs. Wilson. But it is said there was a defeazance to the bond or deed to prove which the trustees are to be examined; and to shew that it was intended originally to prevent the trust deed taking effect, and were both executed at the same time. But the deed of defeazance itself is the best evidence of its existence; and it would be straining the rules too much to admit evidence *to prove that a defeazance was executed at the same time with the trust deed, although it bears date fifteen months after. A witness who has been guilty of fraud himself, shall not be permitted, by acknowledging the fraud, to injure a third person, who appears to be by the first deed an unimpeached cestui que trust; and thereby to exonerate himself from all the ill consequences that might arise to him, if the first deed should be established. He cannot be considered a disinterested witness. In Man and Ward the trustee was admitted as a witness to defeat a fraud, by giving evidence of the true statement of facts, and thus restoring the estate to the real owner. But to permit it in this case, would be to sanctify a fraud, and to defeat the interest of a third person, who has a fair interest in a bona fide deed of trust.—Upon the whole, the court is of opinion, that the authorities reject the admission of trustees to defeat the trust deed; and shew that trustees are punishable for breach of trust: And where lord Hardwicke says that parol evidence is admissible in equity to prove the merits or intentions of a deed, he could not have meant to go further than to say, that such evidence might be received to explain a deed—surely never to defeat it, unless there was some gross fraud; and certainly never where the trustee, called upon to give evidence, was himself particeps criminis, and swearing to exonerate himself, and to injure another. No deeds or settlements would be safe, if the trustees were admitted to come in, and by their evidence to defeat the trust estate. It would open such a door to fraud and perjury, and produce evils of such magnitude, that this court could not tolerate it. It was suggested in the answer that the complainant used fraud and misrepresentation to defendant, to induce the execution of the trust deed; but the court is of opinion there has been no evidence of such fraud. The evidence shews that previous to any letter being written by the complainant Mrs. Wilson to her husband, on the subject of the estate being confiscated, the commissioners of forfeited estates had actually taken hold of the estate; whether as Baird's or Wilson's is immaterial, for it justified the suggestion on the part of the complainant. The court *was therefore of opinion, that no parol evidence is admissible in this cause, which goes to defeat the trust deed: Therefore the testimony of the witnesses who had been examined to that point should not be read."

*231

*232

The entry in the register book is as follows: Wilson v. Wilson—"The court ruled that no evidence which tends to defeat the validity of the trust deed in bill mentioned is admissible."

The cause was then brought to a hearing on the merits, and was fully argued for several days by Mr. Pringle, Mr. Holmes, General Pinckney, and Mr. E. Rutledge for complainant,—and by Mr. Desaussure, Mr. Parker, and Mr. Read for defendant.

On the part of complainant it was insisted, that this was not an unconscionable bargain, on the part of Mrs. Wilson. It was obtaining a settlement merely of the annuity which she had by her former husband for a valuable consideration, to wit, marriage. The expression in Mrs. Wilson's letter to her husband, "I will make use of the settlement if I can; if not, I will say I have no claim," ought not to defeat the deed. It is not evidence of her not relying on the settlement; but of her apprehensions at a moment of embarrassment and distress. During the whole of Mrs. Wilson's correspondence with her husband, her son by her first husband, Baird, was living—On his death (in 1788) a great accession of fortune accrued to Mrs. Wilson. If a settlement had then been demanded by her, the court would have ordered it: But this is not done,—and will the court deprive her of the settlement originally obtained? The endeavour of the parties to evade the confiscation law, was not an immoral act. It is not a general law of the land; but a penal and strict law, against a few offending individuals, named in the act itself. Although the confiscation act declares all deeds and acts done contrary to it to be void, the state is not a party here. And whatever effect the claim of the state might have produced, it is not for Wilson, the defendant, to avail himself of the act. To give effect to the act, it was necessary to have made the state, or the commissioner of confiscation, a party to the suit. Wilson's possession of *the negroes, was in his character of administrator, and not by virtue of his marital rights; and a husband possessing himself of an estate as administrator in right of his wife, is only a trustee for her. Wilson is an alien, and cannot hold the land under any pretence—The wife's rights in the land are not forfeited by her marrying an alien. If the defeazance had said that on condition, the estate was not confiscated, then the settlement was to be void, and the estate restored fully to the husband, that might have been good. But there was no condition to the defeazance, which was directly repugnant to the deed of settlement, and Mrs. Wilson was not a party to it, nor conusant of it. The trustees do no more in the defeazance than renounce their trust; but their doing so does not defeat the deed of trust. Their declaration that they would re-convey to Mr. Wilson, is of no validity without the consent of Mrs. Wilson. It would be to admit, that trustees erected to support trust deeds, may destroy them without knowledge or consent of the cestui que use, which is contrary to every principle or rule of the court. The several papers called defeazances have different witnesses, and bear different dates, and the witnesses speak of different places of execution. This throws discredit on them all. The court has refused to admit the testimony of the trustees, on oath: It will not receive their evidence of the intent of the transaction, in the shape of a defeazance, not on oath. If the defeazance had really been fair and valid, Wilson's subsequent declaration that it was a good-natured act in him to give up her jointure, was a confirmation of the bond; and shews that he did then intend such a settlement as is contained in the bond. If the defeazance had been incorporated in the body of the deed of settlement, it would have been rejected as repugnant—for the rule is, that the latter clause of a deed contradicting a former, is void.

*233

The following cases were cited for complainant, 3 Atk. 21, 655. Talbot, 65. 2 Bla. 387, 327. Shephard, 381. 5 Bac. 396, 403. 1 Vesey, 539, Jewson v. Moulson, 2 Atk. 520, 97. Douglas, 672, 697. 1 Bla. 44. 1 Ventr.

*234

32. 2 *Vesey, 375. 1 Atk. 271. 1 Stra. 503. 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 67. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 481. 3 P. Wms. 37.

For the defendant it was argued, that it was contrary to the authority of the decided cases, that a party shall be allowed to set up a deed for a contrary purpose than that for which it was intended. The defeazance was strictly conformable to Mrs. Wilson's own proposition by her letters, which was that such a settlement should be made as would secure the estate from forfeiture; and that when that purpose was effected by the deed, the defeazance was to prevent its having any other effect. The discredit attempted to be thrown upon the defeazance, is not warranted by the evidence. It is common for parties to multiply copies or duplicates of an important paper, especially in time of war and peril. The defeazances are not dissimilar in substance or object: And the witnesses may very well, after the lapse of some years, forget at first, that they had seen two or more papers executed to the same purpose. Marriage settlements are not to be extended beyond their import: They are deviations from the fixed laws of the land, and should not be carried to extremes. They will become dangerous instruments of domestic unhappiness, by setting up imperium in imperio. The separation of interests between husband and wife, produced by marriage settlements, is calculated to produce many mischiefs, discords, loose morals and other ill effects. It relaxes the great bond of family union, and should not be favoured. The defendant executed the deeds under an impression made on him by Mrs. Wilson's communications, that the estate would be taken from him by confiscation. This was not perfectly correct or certain, and his act, under a false or doubtful impression, is not binding. It is a mistake which the court will rectify, or relieve against. A defeazance without a condition is good, where the deeds are merely executory, as in this case. It is obvious, for Mrs. Wilson's letters shew the fact, that these deeds were obtained by her solicitation, after marriage, expressly to avoid confiscation—That was the intention and the object of all the parties—The complainant, one of those parties, cannot then be permitted *to avail herself of the deeds now, or induce the court to lend its aid to give them a literal execution, to work a different purpose. When two parties enter into a deed contrary to law, or to evade the law, this court will not support it—it will not assist to give it effect. Mrs. Wilson cannot execute any deed, under coverture, to defeat the rights of her infant daughter, in the inheritance: Yet such would be the effect of supporting these deeds made by the husband, after the marriage, if they are supported by the court, as to the land. The annuity ceased on the death of young Baird, the son—it was merged in the inheritance. The expression used by Mrs. Wilson in her letter, shews that she considered the deeds as raised up for a special purpose, to elude confiscation, and for no other purpose: For she says, "If they will admit of marriage settlements, I will shew mine under the deed"—"if not, I will say I have no claim."

*235

The cases cited for defendant were, 1 Bla. 442. 3 Bla. 429. 1 Bac. 286. 1 Vern. 261, 227, 233, 203. 2 Vern. 270, 307, 518, 186. 1 P. Wms. 108, 378. 2 P. Wms. 641. 1 Atk. 295, 547, sir F. Head's case. 2 Atk. 98, 160, 257, 330, 447. 3 Atk. 72. Brown, C. C. 151. 2 Vesey, 54. 2 Bla. 498, 433, 327, 342. Shephard, 182, 69, 382. Douglas, 253, 450, 468, 695. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 481, case 15.

The court, consisting of Chancellors Hutson and Mathews, (for Mr. Hugh Rutledge, then recently appointed chancellor, not having heard the arguments in the first stages of the case, did not sit at this hearing,) delivered their decree on the 4th August.

Chancellor HUTSON delivered the judgment of the court.

After greatly commending the learning, industry and ingenuity of the counsel, he stated that the first question for consideration was, whether the bond given by the defendant to the trustees, for the benefit of the complainant, is such as this court will support?

2d. What is the extent of the bond, or of the property meant to be conveyed by it?

The defendant's counsel made the following objections to the bond:

1st. That the bond was obtained by fraud or misrepresentation.

*236

*2d. That the wife was particeps criminis, and not to be favoured.

3d. That being a contract to defeat or evade a law, (the confiscation act) it is ipso facto null and void.

4th. That it was given for a particular purpose, and ought not to be applied to another.

5th. That there was a defeazance executed at the same time, which defeats it.

To these objections the court gave the following answers—To the four first, that there did not appear to be any fraud or misrepresentation. The commissioners of confiscated estates had taken possession of the estate—the wife, to save it, implored her husband to execute the bond, and protect the property for her and her child. This was a laudable motive; there was no crime in it. That it did not appear that the bond was given merely to cover the property from confiscation in evasion of the law; it was also to make provision for the wife and child. That with respect to the defeazance, there were three papers with different witnesses from those to the bond,—this is a mark of fraud. The bond itself is unobjectionable, as to the consideration, which was marriage; or as to the subject of it, the property; or the execution. But the defeazance has no force: It was not between the same parties,—the wife is no party to it,—the trustees had no right or authority to do any act to avoid the trusts, without the concurrence of the cestui que trust—nor is there certain proof whether it was executed and delivered by the trustees to Mr. Wilson at the same time when he executed the bond. The defeazance therefore not standing in the way of the bond, it is good and valid, and entitled to its full effect from the court. With respect to the extent of the property covered by the bond, and its effects, the court said it covers the annuity; and as to the land, the defendant never had any legal rights in the real estate. He was attainted in Pennsylvania for adhering to the enemy, and holding a commission. His pardon from that state extended only to his person—he was an alien, and could not hold land. —[The court said nothing as to the personal estate claimed by complainant, as omitted by mistake.]

*237

*It was therefore decreed, that the master do dispose, on a credit of one, two and three years, of as many of the negroes as will be sufficient to raise the annual sum of £250. for the payment of Mrs. Wilson's annuity, during her life, to commence from the death of W. A. Baird: That he take an account of all sums received by Mrs. Wilson, from that time, the amount of which is to be carried to the credit of Mr. Wilson, against the annuity: That he do also inquire what will be a proper allowance to Mrs. Wilson, for the use of the land by Mr. Wilson, from the death of W. A. Baird, (the son,) and report accordingly: That in the meantime the injunction to stay waste be continued, and that each party pay their own costs.

General Pinckney, Mr. E. Rutledge, Mr. Pringle, and Mr. Holmes for complainant,—Desaussure, Parker and Read for defendant.

---

1 Desaus. 237

Case LXIX.

Present—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

JOSEPH DILL and ELIZABETH SMITH, Next of Kin to John Dill v. SARAH DILL, Executrix of John Dill.

(September, 1791.)

[Wills ⟸450.]

Question on the construction of the residuary clause of a will. Such construction to be made as will give effect to all parts of the will.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Logan v. Cassidy, 71 S. C. 175, 201, 203, 50 S. E. 794.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 966; Dec. Dig. ⟸450.]

[Wills ⟸614.]

[A testator by his will, after giving a portion of his estate to his wife absolutely, and making various devises and bequests, devised as follows, viz.: "All the rest," etc., "of my estate, which I am possessed of at the time of the decease of my said wife, and not before, and which I have hereinbefore given and bequeathed to her, shall be equally divided" among persons named, "my said wife having, as before mentioned, the profits of my said lands and negroes during her life." Held, that this was a devise of the residue of the estate not before disposed of, to the wife for life, with remainder to the devisees named.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1398; Dec. Dig. ⟸614.]

The complainants bill stated, that John Dill died seized and possessed of a considerable real and personal estate, and that he duly executed his last will and testament on the 25th of October, 1780, in and by which he made the following dispositions:—"I give and bequeath unto my wife Sarah Dill, several negro slaves, [by name,] with the future issue of the female slaves, to hold, to her and her heirs for ever. Item, I give and bequeath unto my said wife, the use and profits of all that my plantation, situated on Stono river; also, all that my other plantation, commonly called Dill's Bluff; also, the undivided half part of the plantation situate on Dickson's Island, to hold, to her for and during the term of her natural life, and no longer: And at the decease of my said wife, I give the above plantation called Dill's Bluff unto my nephew John Dill and his heirs for ever. Item, I give and bequeath, at the decease of my said wife, unto my son in *law Thomas Taylor and his heirs for ever, all that undivided half part of the plantation situate on Dickson's Island; and all the plantation at Stono river, commonly called Turkett's, to hold, to him and his heirs for ever. Item, I will and direct that the other undivided part of the tract of land at Wappoo, shall be sold as soon as possible after my decease, and the monies arising from the sale thereof shall be equally divided between Jane Elizabeth Taylor and Thomas Taylor, share and share alike. Item, I give and bequeath unto my nephew John Dill, all those my negro slaves, to wit, [naming eight slaves] with the future issue of the female slaves, to him and his heirs for ever: My said wife nevertheless having the use of the said negroes during her life. And all the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, real and personal, whatsoever and wheresoever, which I am possessed of at the time of the decease of my said wife, and not before, and which I have hereinbefore given and bequeathed to her, shall be equally divided between Jane Elizabeth Taylor and Thomas Taylor, share and share alike, my said wife having as beforementioned the profits of my said lands and negroes during her life. And lastly, I do hereby nominate and appoint my said wife executrix, and two other persons, [whom he names,] executors of this my said will, hereby revoking all other wills by me heretofore made."—The bill sets forth, that the said John Dill at the time of his death, was possessed of other considerable personal property, besides that particularly mentioned in his said last will and testament: That the Taylors mentioned therein are the children of Mrs. Sarah Dill by a former husband. It further sets forth, that the said Sarah Dill is the only person who has acted under the will of the said deceased: That she has possessed herself of the whole of his personal property, as well that to which she is entitled, as that to which complainants are entitled, under and by virtue of the statute of 22d and 23d Car. II. and that she refuses to give to complainants their part or share of the undisposed personal property of testator. The bill further sets forth, that complainants are the brother and sister, and next of kin of testa*tor; prays for a discovery of the personal property not disposed of by the said last will and testament; and also for distribution thereof agreeably to the above mentioned statute.

*238

*239

To which bill the defendant put in the following answer: She admits that the said John Dill did duly make and publish such will as in the bill mentioned; that the testator departed this life without issue then living, leaving the said will unrevoked and unaltered; that the complainants are the brother and sister and next of kin of the said John Dill; that she has taken upon herself the sole execution of the said last will and testament, and has also taken possession of the whole of the personal property which testator died possessed of, as well that particularly mentioned in the will, as that not particularly mentioned therein: That the Taylors, Jane Elizabeth and Thomas are her children by a former husband.—The defendant refuses to give up to complainants any part of the personal property of the said John Dill; the whole of it being, she alleges, disposed of by the said last will and testament; and further answering sets forth a former will, made by the said John Dill, in which it appears that the Taylors were at the time of the making thereof the objects of his bounty.

The cause came on to a hearing in September, 1791, and was argued by Mr. Gaillard, Mr. E. Rutledge, Mr. Pringle and General Pinckney for complainants,—and by Mr. Read, Mr. Ford, and Mr. Desaussure for defendant.

The great point in contest depended on the construction of the residuary claim. For complainants it was contended, that the residuary clause was so vague and uncertain, that it must be declared void; and if the court declared the residuary clause void for uncertainty, then the complainants would be entitled under the statute of distributions as next of kin, which was a clear title; otherwise it would be to prefer a doubtful title to a clear one. That if an estate is given to one for life, remainder to another, and it does not say for what term, the person in remainder takes a fee. If a person devises to a stranger, after the death of his wife, he gives no estate to her by *implication; secus if he devises to his heir at law. With regard to the devise of the rest and residue of the testator's real estate, it meant nothing; for he had devised all his real estate specifically. Subsequent restrictive words are to control prior general words: There are restrictive words in the residuary clause in this bill, which limit the bequests of that clause to the two Taylors, to the property previously bequeathed to their mother; and prevent the general words of the residuary clause from carrying every thing, otherwise undisposed of, to them. No general introductory words are in this will, whence to infer that the testator intended not to die intestate with regard to any part of the estate. The heir is not to be disinherited but by plain words. The personal estate, not properly or clearly disposed of, goes to the next of kin by the act of law, as the real estate does to the heir at law.

*240

The cases cited for complainants were, 2 Stra. 844. 3 Atk. 8, 231–4. 1 Atk. 496, 231. 3 Burr. 1634. 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 178, 207. Talbot 52, 44. 1 P. Wms. 550–5. 4 Burn's Eccl. Law, 103. 5 Bac. 522–9. 2 Stra. 1261. 3 Bro. P. C. 257. 7 Bro. P. C. 18.

For defendant it was argued, that a will is to be so construed as to give effect to all its parts. If the construction in favour of defendant is made, it gives full effect to every provision of the will; if not, then a part of the will is made a nullity. The court will not suppose the testator had no meaning in the residuary clause under discussion: It will rather seek a meaning with astuteness. It seems manifest the testator meant to dispose of the whole estate; yet the complainant's construction would defeat such intention; and the bulk of the personal estate would go as undisposed property.

The cases cited for defendant were, 3 Burr. 1541. 3 Atk. 257, 283, 409–62–5. Talb. 157. Cowper, 271, 356. 2 Burr. 767, (as to supplying words;) 2 P. Wms. 194, &c. 1 Burr. 38, 50. 5 Burr. 2638–9. 1 Atk. 524, 411. 1 Ves. 225, 107–8. 3 Burr. 1618. 2 Bac. 81.

Chancellor H. RUTLEDGE delivered the following judgment of the court:

*241

*This case must be determined according to the rules laid down for the construction of wills, and which have uniformly prevailed. Among others it is a rule, that the construction must be of what appears on the face of the will; that no technical form is necessary to convey the testator's meaning, which must be collected by attending to the several parts of it, and considering and comparing them together; not by an arbitrary construction, but by a violent and strong presumption arising from the several parts of it compared and taken together. A paper was produced and permitted to be read by consent of parties purporting to be a former will of the testator, but the court have taken no notice of it; it was totally revoked by the subsequent will, and therefore ought not to be at all considered. It was objected, that in the will before us there are no introductory words to shew an intention in the testator to dispose of his whole estate; but we do not think it at all necessary to have such words introduced. It is to be presumed, when a person sits down to make his will, that he intends to dispose of his whole estate. Introductory words cannot vary the construction of a devise so as to enlarge the estate of a devisee, unless there are words in the devise itself sufficient to carry the degree of interest contended for; but wherever they assist to shew the intention of testator, the courts have laid hold of them, as they do of every other circumstance in a will, which may help to guide their judgment to the right and true construction of it. The point before the court, is upon the construction of the residuary clause in the will. It is contended by the complainants, that the residuary clause is so ambiguously expressed that it cannot, but by implication, be construed to dispose of the residue of the personal estate; that the words, "which I have hereinbefore given and bequeathed to my wife," are restrictive words, and must have reference to the lands and negroes given to defendant the widow in the former part of the will, wherein the testator had given her an express estate for life. The residuary clause must have some operation; the court cannot reject it altogether, in order to determine that the testator has not disposed of his residuary per*sonal estate. If it stands, and the construction contended for is allowed, it would have the effect totally to defeat the devises to J. Dill and J. Taylor, to whom the lands and negroes are given absolutely after the death of defendant; and it cannot be presumed that the testator, by a general sweeping clause at the end of his will, intended at one blow to destroy all the former devises and bequests of his will. Implication is of two kinds, a necessary and a possible one; and if it be necessary to supply or reject words to make testator's intent take effect, so as it is consistent with law, the court will make that necessary implication; as the court of king's bench did in the case of Robinson and Robinson, in which it was determined, that on the true construction of a will, by necessary implication to effectuate the manifest general intent of the testator's will a devisee should take an estate in fee, notwithstanding the express estate be for life, and no longer; the latter words were rejected to create an estate tail. And in Coryton and Helier, lord Hardwicke by a construction taken from all parts of the will considered together, to imply the usual qualification, if he should so long live, in the disposition of the estate, supplied these words, which had been omitted, as he said, by the negligence and ignorance of the writer. This will is most ignorantly drawn, but it is not so dark as that the testator's meaning from the whole will taken together may not be discovered. It is observed that the complainant Smith is not taken notice of by testator in any part of his will; and complainant Dill not otherwise than as an executor: From which it may fairly be inferred, that the testator thought he had provided sufficiently for the family by giving complainant's son a plantation and negroes on the death of defendant. She and her children appear to have been the principal objects of his bounty; the children had lived with him from early infancy, and he seems to have adopted them, having no children of his own. In order to come at the testator's intention, his whole will must be attended to: He first gives his wife sundry negroes absolutely; and the penner of the will, out of abundant caution, and to secure them, as he thought, most effectually, gave *them to her and her heirs for ever. In the following clauses he gives her several tracts of land for life, he then gives other tracts to other persons absolutely, reserving however to her an estate for life in them; and also some negroes, which he had bequeathed to his nephew J. Dill absolutely: Then comes the residuary clause, which is very inaccurately penned; but the court must put such construction on it as will best answer the testator's intent; for agreeable to the rule in Com. 45, such construction should be made that all the words of the will should stand if possible. The court is not confined to the order of placing the words in the will, for to make the sense plainer they should be sometimes transposed. From the ambiguity of the expressions, it would seem as if the testator intended to restrain the bequest to the lands and negroes given in the former part of the will. It is absurd to call the lands and negroes in the foregoing clauses of the will his residuary estate, because they are bequests of particuar parts of his estate; and it would be repugnant and contradictory to those devises, inasmuch as he had before parted with the absolute property by those bequests: And by the construction contended for this intent would be entirely defeated, and the first parts of his will overturned. A question is asked, will you reject those words in the residuary bequest? No; but the court will so construe and expound them that they may have effect. As the testator from the preceding clauses in his will, has given his whole real estate to his wife for life, and some of his personal, although he had previousy disposed of the fee simple to other persons; and as he has by the last clause given the rest, residue and remainder of his real and personal estate to J. E. Taylor and T. Taylor after the death of his wife, manifestly under the idea that he had given it her for life, and by subsequent words says she shall have those lands and negroes for life,—the court are therefore of opinion, that according to the rules of construction, comparing and taking together all the clauses of this will, and by attending to the several parts of it, by necessary implication, a very violent and strong presumption arises, that testator did not intend to leave *any part of his estate undisposed of: That as the Court ought not to strike out entirely any of the words of the will, yet they should so construe and expound them, that they may have effect. Therefore we think, upon the whole of the will taken and collected together, the intent of the testator in the residuary clause is sufficiently apparent, and clear to decree that the residue of the testator's real and personal estate is well bequeathed to his wife the defendant for life, and after her death to J. E. Taylor and Thomas Taylor.—It was therefore decreed, that the bill be dismissed with costs.

*242

*243

*244

1 Desaus. 244

Case LXX.

Present—Chancellors J. Rutledge, Hutson and Mathews.

Administrators of JOHN HARLESTON v. Executors of THOMAS LYNCH, and HAMILTON and Wife.

(December, 1784.)

[Husband and Wife ⇐11.]

A brother devises to his sisters the residue of his estate. One of them is married, and her husband dies before the will is proved or any division made of her brother's estate. The husband not having reduced this estate to possession, his representatives cannot take it, but it survives to the wife.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Cape v. Adams, 1 Desaus. 569.

For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 49; Dec. Dig. ⇐11.]

[Wills ⇐869.]

[A will directed a sale of all the testator's property, for the benefit of his sisters, one of whom was married; but the will was not proved, and nothing was done thereunder, until after the death of such sister's husband. Held, that such sister was entitled to her share of the estate, discharged from the debts of her husband.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 2213; Dec. Dig. ⇐869.]

(This case was omitted by accident in its proper place.)

The complainants by their bill charge, that Thomas Lynch, of the state of South Carolina, being seized and possessed of a considerable real and personal estate, did by his will, dated the eleventh day of May, 1779, direct that in case he should have no child, all his estate, both real and personal, should be sold by his executors, or a majority of them, and the money arising therefrom be disposed of one-third to his wife during her widowhood, with liberty to her to dispose of the same by will whilst she remained his widow; but if she died intestate, or married again, that part should sink into the residue of his estate, and go therewith; and then gives and bequeaths all the rest and residue of his estate whatever, to his sisters Sabina, Esther and Elizabeth, the said Elizabeth being then the wife of John Harleston, who on his marriage with her had settled £20,000 of the then currency of this state; and by a codicil to the said will, bearing date the 27th July, 1779, after some alterations respecting the legacy to his wife, he ratified and confirmed the will, and appointed the defendants and

*245

Joseph Allston, since de*ceased, executors—That Thomas Lynch shortly after the execution of the codicil, being in a bad state of health, and having no child, embarked on board the Fair American, and sailed in her for St. Eustatius, in company with several other vessels, from which she was parted in a storm, and has never since been heard of—That John Harleston being sent to congress on public business before the will was proved, never returned to this state during the British usurpation, but died about the month of April, 1781, having first made his will; in which, after sundry legacies, he gives the residue of his estate to his cousin Nicholas Harleston, and appointed his wife executrix, and Isaac Motte, Esq. executor, who refusing to qualify, the complainants obtained administration, collected the personal estate of the deceased, and finding it insufficient to discharge his debts, applied to the Rev. Mr. Smith, the only qualified executor on Mr. Lynch's will, to render an account, and deliver over to the complainants that part of the residuary estate which was left to Elizabeth the wife of the said John Harleston, and which the complainants were advised by operation of law vested in the said John: But the defendants refused to comply with the requests, alleging that the same was the absolute property of the said Elizabeth, she having survived her husband, who had never reduced the property in question to possession. The bill therefore prays that the defendants should be compelled to account with the complainants, and to deliver over to them what was bequeathed by Thomas Lynch to his sister Elizabeth.

The defendant Robert Smith, who is the only qualified executor on the will of the said Thomas Lynch, by answer admits, that Thomas Lynch, his testator, did by his will convey to his executors the whole of his estate, as well real as personal, with directions to sell the same and divide the money which might arise therefrom among his sisters, in such manner as is set forth in the complainants' bill; one of which sisters was Elizabeth, then the wife of John Harleston, Esq. and now of major James Hamilton: That Thomas Lynch sailed from this state for St. Eustatius, in July or August, 1779, and was then in ill health; *and that the vessel in which he sailed has never been satisfactorily accounted for, but whether or when she was captured or perished at sea is unknown—That the will of Mr. Lynch was never proved till after the evacuation of this state by the British: That Mr. Harleston made such will and died at such time as is set forth in the bill; but that he the said Harleston was never possessed of any part of the testator Thomas Lynch's estate: That it having been directed to be sold and the money paid to Elizabeth the wife of the said John, it was a mere chose in action, and consequently survived to her, even if Mr. Harleston had outlived Mr. Lynch, which defendant does not admit to have been the case: That although Mr. Harleston did settle £20,000. of the then currency on his wife at their marriage, and which he considered to have been about a moiety of her then fortune, yet it is evident from his will that he never considered himself as entitled to the estate in question, because, although in the event of her marrying or claiming her settlement, he gave from her every the most minute articles of his own property, yet he scrupulously secured to her the fortune which he had acquired by her, even to her waiting-maid and her children. Wherefore, as no proof has been or can be offered to shew that Mr. Harleston outlived Mr. Lynch,—as even if it had, the estate in question being a chose in action survived to Mr. Hamilton, and as the testator has given proofs that he did not consider the estate as his,—the defendant prays that the bill might be dismissed with costs.

*246

The case came on to be argued in September, 1784, Mr. Bee for complainant, and Mr. T. Pinckney for defendant.

For complainant it was argued, that the property in question is a personal chattel, and not a chose in action. 1 Bac. 286, 290. A husband and wife being separated, a legacy left to wife, vests in the husband. 1 Vern. 261. 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 58, 69. 1 P. Wms. 125. Harleston was never in possession of the estate, owing to the possession of the country by the enemy. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 144. There was a marriage settlement by Harleston on his wife, *therefore the husband was a purchaser of all the wife's estate. 2 Vern. 501. 3 P. Wms. 199. The husband settles out of his own estate. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 143.

*247

Mr. T. Pinckney contended,—A chose in action is a thing that cannot be obtained without suit. Co. Lit. A chose in action must be reduced to possession by the husband, or it survives to the wife. 1 Bac. 289. 1 Eq. Cas. 68, 3 Atk. 20, Bond v. Simons, 726.

On the back of Chancellor MATHEWS'S brief, are the following remarks, made by the court in giving its judgment on the case.

The property of the testator Lynch being directed to be sold for the benefit of his three sisters; although the will was not proved till after the war, owing to the calamitous situation of this country, and consequently could not be carried into execution, and that not through any laches of the executors; and Mr. Harleston, husband of one of the legatees in Mr. Lynch's will, having died, prior to any thing having been done by the executors, and this court considering that to be done which was intended to be done, we must therefore consider the property which Mrs. Harleston was entitled to under her brother's will, in the nature of a chose in action, and never having been reduced into possession by her husband, it survives to her, and she cannot be legally deprived of it: And although there are creditors in the case, we cannot divest her of her right for their benefit.—Therefore the bill must be dismissed with costs.

1 Desaus. 247

Case LXXI.

ROGER SMITH, Esq., Administrator of Major Charles Motte, Deceased, v. JOHN HUGER, Esq., Surviving Acting Executor of Jacob Motte, Sen., Esq., Deceased.

(March, 1791.)

[Executors and Administrators ⟸294, 301.]

Executor advances money, and becomes bound for a legatee for sundry debts—the legatee dies insolvent—the executor is allowed to deduct the amount for which he is liable for the legatee, before he shall be compelled to pay the legacy to the administrator of legatee; and the executor who is so liable dying, his co-executor may retain for the benefit of his estate.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Williams v. McCardell, 14 S. C. 222.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1177, 1223; Dec. Dig. ⟸294, 301.]

[Executors and Administrators ⟸301.]

[Where an executor had made advances, and had become security in considerable sums for a legatee, who afterwards died insolvent, the executor was allowed to retain such sums from the amount of the legacy, though there was no express understanding to that effect at the time of making the advances.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1223; Dec. Dig. ⟸301.]

The complainant Roger Smith, administrator of the goods and chattels, rights and credits, which were of Charles Motte, deceased, shews, that Jacob Motte, the father of the said Charles Motte, being seized and possess*ed of a real and personal estate, made his last will and testament in writing, bearing date the 2d day of October, 1767, wherein, after several specific and pecuniary legacies, he directed that his executors should sell and dispose of all his estate not specifically devised and bequeathed, and divide the monies which should arise therefrom, as well as the monies due to him on bond, note, or account, into eleven shares, one eleventh share of which monies he gave and bequeathed to his said son Charles Motte, his executors, administrators, and assigns; and of his said will nominated John Huger, Jacob Motte, and several other persons executors—That the said testator died in 1770, leaving his said will of full force—That after the death of the said testator, Jacob Motte and John Huger duly proved the said will, qualified as executors on the same, and took on themselves the execution and burden thereof—That the said Jacob Motte, the executor, from time to time became security for the said Charles Motte, and occasionally paid money to and for him, but he never came to a final settlement with the said Charles, nor had he any express authority from the said Charles to charge the money which he paid to him and for him, and the securityships which he entered into for him, (some of which he has been obliged to pay, and some of which he will be eventually obliged to pay,) to the particular account of the legacy which the said Charles was entitled to under the will of his said father. Your orator further shews, that the said Charles Motte was killed before the lines of Savannah, in the month of October, 1779, and that your said orator has administered on the estate—That Jacob Motte, one of the executors of the said Charles Motte's father, departed this life in the year 1780, and that the final settlement of the affairs of the said estate have devolved on John Huger, the only acting executor of the said Jacob Motte the elder—That in consequence thereof, your orator, as the administrator of the said Charles Motte, has requested him to come to a settlement of all the accounts of the estate of the said Jacob Motte, and to pay over to him what on a fair settlement shall appear to be due—That the said John Huger is very *willing to comply with his request in part, but insists (as he is directed by the representatives of Jacob Motte, the brother of the said Charles,) that the monies which the said Jacob Motte has paid to and for the said Charles, and the monies which he was liable, and his representatives are liable to pay on the account of the said Charles Motte, should be deducted, alleging that the said Jacob Motte paid the said monies and became such security on the credit of the funds which were in his hands and under his control, and of which the court would not have divested him had he been living, until those respective claims now set up as discount, were allowed. But your orator conceives as the said Charles Motte's estate is not sufficient to discharge his debts, the said discount should not be allowed unless by the direction of this honorable court. To the end therefore that the said John Huger may be compelled to come to a settlement with your orator and pay over to him or otherwise satisfy him for any balance which may be due, your complainant prays your honors to grant him such relief as he may be justly entitled to.

*248

*249

The defendant in his answer admits the facts charged, and that he has been called upon as executor of Jacob Motte, Sen. to come to a settlement of the affairs of the said estate and to pay over or otherwise satisfactorily satisfy him for such balance as may be due to him as the administrator of the said Charles Motte; but it was in his opinion impossible to do it without the intervention and opinion of this honorable court inasmuch as he well knows that the late Jacob Motte the brother of the said Charles Motte did pay to and for him and became his security to divers people to a considerable amount; all which sums the representatives of the said Jacob Motte insist should be deducted out of the share to which the said Charles was entitled; the more especially as they allege and so this defendant believes the truth to be, that the said Charles Motte's estate will not be sufficient to discharge his debts, and without they are allowed to retain they will be considerable loosers. This defendant therefore submits the cause to the consideration of this *honorable court, being ready and willing to do whatever to them shall appear to be right and just.

*250

This case coming on to be heard, the court decreed that the defendant has a right to retain in his hands as much as will be sufficient to indemnify his co-executor Jacob Motte for all sums he stood engaged for on account of Charles Motte, out of the legacy left him by his father; and that he be also allowed such sums as he has actually paid on account of said legacy.

---

1 Desaus. 250

Case LXXII.

Present—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

CLITHERALL v. JOHN A. OGILVIE.

(March, 1792.)

[Specific Performance ⟸25, 53.]

The court refused to decree the specific performance of a contract, for the sale of land, where the inadequacy of price was very great: though no direct fraud or imposition in the buyer. But the seller was a young man just of age, and ignorant of the real value of the land: and acted a little precipitately on being urged.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Bunch v. Hurst, 3 Desaus. 293, 294, 5 Am. Dec. 551; Butler v. Haskell, 4 Desaus. 696; Gasque v. Small, 2 Strob. Eq. 80.

For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 56, 167; Dec. Dig. ⟸25, 53.]

The complainant's bill is filed to compel the defendant to a specific performance of a contract in writing for the sale of a tract of land on Santee to the complainant. The bill sets forth that the complainant being desirous of obtaining a body of land to plant, he applied to Mr. Ogilvie the defendant for a lease of his lands on Santee. In the conversation held with him by the complainant Clitherall, Mr. Ogilvie discovered an inclination to sell the land, which he valued at £3500 sterling. Afterwards and on the 4th September, 1789, complainant Clitherall on behalf of himself and Mr. Deas offered to become the purchasers, at the price he had mentioned, payable in four years, by annual instalments. Mr. Ogilvie said as it was a matter of importance he would consult his friends. On the 12th September, the complainant Clitherall wrote to Mr. Ogilvie, and enquired if he would complete the contract. Mr. Ogilvie immediately called on complainant and brought a plat of the land, and asked complainant if he would give £4000 for it, to which he answered he would not. He then asked for complainant's proposals in writing which were given to him, and he went away. A few days after they met in the street, and agreed to proceed to Mr. Deas's; on their way Mr. Ogilvie delivered the complainant Clitherall, a letter, in answer to the pro*positions which he had received. On perusing the letter (a copy of which is filed) the complainant observed that the sum of £4000 was to be paid in specie; but agreed to pay £3500 in London, with the interest of seven per cent. When they arrived at Mr. Deas's some discussion took place, and the parties drew up a written agreement, which was satisfactory, by which the complainant agreed to pay £3500 by four equal annual instalments, with interest at seven per cent. the whole payable in England, to Mr. Ogilvie for his half of Acheson's Island on Santee describing the same: he on his part agreeing to convey the said lands to the said Clitherall and Deas. At the same time a memorandum was drawn up of the deed of conveyance, bonds and mortgage proper to be prepared for execution, and the same was left with the privity and assent of Mr. Ogilvie with Mr. Henry Deas, (then a student of law) to draw the papers; the said J. A. Ogilvie saying there was no particular lawyer whom he wished to draw them. It was noted that Mr. Bee was to join in the titles as trustee. The papers were accordingly drawn, and on the 17th September, the complainant Clitherall called on Mr. Ogilvie with them. He took them, in order (as he said) to have them examined by his lawyer; and appointed said Clitherall to call on him the next morning. He accordingly did so, and found that Mr. Ogilvie had gone out; but he wrote him a note the same day saying he would call on him the following Monday. He accordingly did so, accompanied by a friend, and they had a conversation the result of which was that Mr. Ogilvie declined to complete the bargain by executing titles to the complainant—complainant has since understood that Mr. Ogilvie employed counsel, as early as the 17th September, in order to evade the said agreement, under pretence that he was unwarily drawn into the agreement, by artifices used by complainant,—and that the price was greatly inadequate; and that he had no right to sell the land, the legal title being in a trustee—though complainant alleges that the business was conducted with great openness and fairness on his part, and with great apparent deliberation on the part of the defendant, who asked *and obtained time to consult his friends, before he entered into the said agreement. The complainant charges that the true intent of the said parties was that the said Ogilvie should convey said land in fee simple to complainant for the said price. The complainant insists that if the inadequacy of price were ever so great, (which however he denies) yet being attended with no fraud or deception, it ought not to vitiate so solemn and deliberate an agreement entered into by a person of competent years—and the complainant disavows any endeavours to depreciate the land, or to keep Mr. Ogilvie from the knowledge of the real value thereof—and though Mr. Deas did request Mr. Ogilvie to keep the sale a secret from Dr. Lynah, it was solely with a view that the surrender of his lease might be more easily obtained by Mr. Ogilvie, to whom he had once offered it—and this request was made after the agreement was signed.

*251

*252

The bill prayed that the defendant or such other person as may have the same, may bring into court the defendant's mother's marriage settlement, and all other deeds relative to his right or title to the said land, which are or may be in his power; and that he may be compelled to make a specific performance of his said contract and agreement, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, and to execute proper deeds for conveying the same to the complainant; and that the complainant may have possession of the said estate and premises as soon as the said lease to Dr. Lynah shall be surrendered or expired, and that the complainant may have such further relief as he is entitled to.

The defendant John A. Ogilvie in his answer, states, that his mother inherited together with other estates a large body of lands on Acheson's Island in Santee;—and on the intermarriage of his mother with his father, the said estates were settled on them, with limitations over to their issue. That after the death of his mother in the year 1785, the defendant's father sent him from England to this country, and appointed Mr. Bee, and two other gentlemen his guardians. These guardians (having a power also from defendant's brother Charles) leased, to Dr. Ly*nah on the 19th May, 1787, four hundred acres of their half of said Island, for five years, commencing on the 1st January, 1788.

*253

That the defendant arrived at the age of twenty-one years, some time in the year 1789, and he assumed the management of his property; soon after which to wit, in September, 1789, Dr. Clitherall, and the late J. Deas, jun. called on him, and requested a lease of the land on Acheson's Island. He answered that he could not, as it was already leased. They then asked him if he would sell the land, and what he considered the value; to which he answered that he could not, as he owned only half (his brother owning the other moiety) and that it had never been divided—that he had never seen the lands, and did not know the value of them; except from the opinion of his father, who considered them worth £3500; but that his cousin Mr. Ogilvie, he believed knew its value, and he would write to him on the subject if they wished to know it: To which one of the parties answered that would not answer their purpose as they wanted lands immediately. They then parted; but within three days after the complainant Dr. Clitherall, returned to the defendant, and said that he with Mr. Deas would give him £3500 for the purchase of the said land: to be paid by them in four equal annual instalments, and the payments to be secured by mortgage; but a stranger coming in put an end to the conversation. On the same day the defendant asked Mr. James Gairdner, who lived in the same house with him, what he thought of the offer. He answered that he did not know the value of the land and advised him to write to his cousin on the subject. On the 12th September, the defendant received a letter from Dr. Clitherall requesting to know if he really would sell the land. The defendant immediately called on Dr. Clitherall at his house; and requested him to put his proposition in writing which he accordingly did. Defendant asked Dr. Clitherall if he would give £4000 for the land but he refused it. Defendant took home the proposals to reflect, and to consult his friends. He did consult Mr. Bee, his former guardian, who finding that the defendant's father *had estimated the value of the land (in 1785) at £3500 advised the defendant to accept that price; and agreed (as the defendant then understood him) that he would join in the sale of the land, as the attorney of the defendant's brother Charles. Under the influence of these circumstances, the defendant says he determined to sell the lands; and wrote to Dr. Clitherall to that effect, as stated in the bill. That meeting the Doctor in the street, he informed him of his determination, and they proceeded to Mr. Deas's, where he entered into the contract for the sale of the land, containing 1,538 acres of swamp and marsh land, and defendant bound himself in a penalty of £3500 to make titles to the land—The other parties were not bound by any penalty. The complainant did ask the defendant if he had any desire that any particular gentleman of the bar should draw the papers and title deeds; but Mr. Deas expressing a wish that his brother might draw them, the defendant acquiesced. The contract was drawn up, and the memorandum stated in the bill, was left with Mr. Henry Deas to draw the conveyances, mortgage, &c. On the following Friday, Dr. Clitherall called on the defendant with the titles, and requested that they might be then executed; but the defendant objected to the immediate execution as he wished them examined by a gentleman of the bar. The Doctor endeavored to remove the objection by assuring him that they had been already examined by a gentleman of the profession;—but finding that the defendant persisted he left the papers. Early the next day an intimate friend of defendant called on him and enquired of him if he had sold Acheson's Island to complainant, and at what price. Defendant disclosed to him all that had passed. His friend then told him that the land consisting of 600 acres of prime tide land, was worth three times as much as the price offered for it, and that defendant had no right to sell more than his own moiety. But defendant informed him that Mr. Bee was to join in the titles;—on examining the conveyances brought by Dr. Clitherall, it was found that Mr. Bee's name was not inserted in them. Reflecting on these things, the defendant resolved not to proceed till he *had made further enquiries; and he wrote to Dr. Clitherall that he would call on him on Monday. In the mean time he set on foot enquiries by which he learnt that the land was worth at least £15,000—and knowing that his title alone would not be a good one for all the land, and conceiving that Mr. Bee when he learnt the real value of the land would not execute the titles, and believing that the complainant would not endeavor to bind him to a contract founded entirely in mistake, he went with a friend to Dr. Clitherall and Mr. Deas, and he explained to them how he had acted in ignorance, and pressed to be released from his contract:—But finding that they insisted on his executing the titles, he withdrew.

*254

*255

The defendant denies that he had any idea of selling the land until the offer was made to him by the complainant—That he consulted no friend at first but Mr. Gardiner, who accidentally lived in the house with him, and who was quite ignorant of the land as above stated; and he afterwards consulted no other person but Mr. Bee. The defendant admits that counsel were retained for him on Friday, with a view to get rid of the agreement, but it was done by a friend without the defendant's knowledge. The defendant, did state to complainant, that Mr. Bee would join him in the execution of the conveyances, and it was expressly agreed between them that Mr. Bee was to be a party to the titles, as the trustee of Charles Ogilvie; yet Mr. Bee's name was omitted in the deeds prepared under the complainant's directions. That the complainant Dr. Clitherall some days before the signing, and Mr. Deas at the time of signing the agreement, requested defendant not to mention any thing of the matter to Dr. Lynah; which the defendant promised,—and he kept his word. The defendant claims the land under his mother's marriage settlement; and he does not know of any other papers relative to said land. Defendant prays to be released from his said contract, and that the complainant's bill may be dismissed.

The cause came to a hearing, and it was fully proved that the land was worth more than three times the stipulated price.

*256

*The case was argued by Mr. Pringle for the complainant, and by Mr. E. Rutledge and Gen. Pinckney for defendant.

For the complainant it was insisted that this was a fair contract. The defendant was of full age and competent to act. There was no surprize, no circumvention, no importunity, no unfairness of any kind; and there is no case where the court has gone so far, as to refuse to carry the contract into execution, on the ground of inadequacy of price alone. See 2 Powell, p. 1. This court is not the guardian to watch over and control the contracts of adults. Nor does this court possess an arbitrary discretion to set aside, or to refuse to enforce contracts; there must be strong and reasonable grounds. See 3 Atk. 187. If an agreement is certain and fair, this court will enforce it. See 1 Powell, 139. 2 Powell, 263. 2 Atk. 587. 2 P. Wms. 191. 3 P. Wms. 290. Bacon, Title Trust.

For the defendant it was argued that Mr. Bee was to have been a party to the deeds according to the agreement; but in the deeds prepared by complainant his name was not mentioned. See 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 16, 17. 3 Atk. 386. 2 Atk. 18. Talbot's Cases, 236. It is discretionary with this court to enforce the execution of agreements or not. Where the consideration is grossly inadequate the court will not enforce agreement. 1. Vesey, 279. In this case the price agreed to be given was three or four times less than the value of the land. There is a distinction between contracts executed and executory. 1 Levins, Mosely, 364. 2 Vesey, 17, 566. 3 P. Wms. 129. The penalty was all on one side. The complainant was not bound by any penalty. The estate in question was a trust estate; the legal title was in the trustees of the marriage settlement; consequently Mr. Ogilvie's titles would not have been good. 1 P. Wms. 121, 496. To induce the court to carry an agreement into execution, it must be fair, certain and just in all its parts. 3 Atk. 386. Watching for an heir as soon as he comes of age, to get a bargain out of him, is a catching bargain and will be discountenanced by the court. See Pope & Roots. 7 Bro. P. C. 148. 1 P. Wms. 277. 2 Powell on Contracts, 36, *77, 8, 9. Young heirs even when of age, are under the care and protection of the court. 1 P. Wms. 310, 318. 3 P. Wms. 131. See 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 18. It is the constant rule of the court not to enforce hard bargains, but to leave the party to his remedy at law. 2 Atk. 134. This was a hard bargain obtained by an experienced man, from a young man just of age, ignorant of the value of the estate, and rather too much urged. It would be against conscience to compel the defendant to take £3500 for property worth more than £10,000.

*257

After briefly stating the case, the court delivered the following decree:

There is no appearance of fraud on the part of complainant: if there was, that alone would be sufficient to induce the court to withhold its aid in compelling a specific performance of this agreement. The case being then wholly divested of fraud, imposition or misrepresentation, and defendant although a young man, yet not being in necessitous circumstances or his estate in expectancy, few of the cases that have been cited are immediately applicable: for on one or other of the grounds above mentioned, most of the cases have been determined; as in the case of Barnardiston v. Lingood, where B. was in distressed circumstances, and his estate in expectancy, he was relieved against his bargain as being an inconsiderate one, and made without proper consideration.—So in the case of Chesterfield v. Janson;—How v. Weldon was a transaction of fraud. The question for the consideration of the court is whether under all the circumstances of this case, the court will interfere and decree a specific execution of the agreement, or leave party to his remedy at law. The power of the court to carry articles into execution is not doubted, and though discretionary, yet is not an arbitrary discretion; but must be governed by rules of equity. Now though there is no actual fraud charged on complainant, yet in order to entitle him to a specific performance of the agreement, it ought to be fair, certain, just, equal in all its parts, and for adequate consideration. If any of these ingredients are wanting the court will not decree a specific performance. That *being a settled rule of this court, we are to see whether this case comes within it. As to the certainty of the thing sold, that will not admit a doubt. The land is partly described in the agreement. Though there is more contained in the agreement than the defendant had a right to dispose of, and which from his answer he was apprised of, and which he certainly never could have intended to sell, his letter on that subject mentions his half of Acheson's Island. Whether this agreement was fair, just and equal in all its parts, is next to be considered. It cannot be doubted we think, that the complainant must have known something of the value of the lands before his application to the defendant. The situation and fertility of soil in that part of the country is pretty well known to persons who have been resident any time in this country; and the pressing importunity of the complainant to conclude the bargain; his repeated visits to the defendant, at a time too when the land was under lease, and he could not get immediate possession, all plainly and strongly indicate that he knew very well what he was about. On the other hand the reluctance of defendant (a young man but just of age, ignorant of the land and its value) to determine the matter hastily; his wishing to consult with a friend whom he thought well acquainted with the value of land, shew plainly he was not desirous of selling immediately: and that he was not sufficiently competent to determine on the value, (which has been clearly proved by the evidence of maj. Pinckney:) all these circumstances shew that though no fraud or imposition on complainant's part, yet there was such an eagerness, such an anxiety in him to conclude the bargain, such an astuteness of conduct, as do not give it all the marks of fairness, justice and equality. The next point is, whether there be an adequate consideration for the land? Though an inadequate consideration may not alone be sufficient ground to set aside a contract, yet it is a material ingredient, and will go a great way where the property has been sold for a sum grossly inadequate to its real value.† The court al*though it may not go so far as to set aside the agreement, will not however lend its aid in compelling a specific performance, but leave the party to his remedy at law, to recover damages for the performance. That the consideration is enormously inadequate, we need only refer to the testimony of major Pinckney, from whence it appears that the land at the lowest valuation, must be worth four times as much as was agreed to be given for it. Is not this then such a case as the lord chancellor mentions, where the inadequacy, is so strong, gross and manifest, that a man of common sense must exclaim at the inequality of it? Had the deficiency been a few hundred pounds *only, the court would not have hesitated to decree a specific performance.

*258

*259

*260

Powel thinks the better opinion to be, that the mere fact of a bargain being unreasonable is not a sufficient ground to set it aside in equity, if the parties are of age, perfectly acquainted with their rights, each aware of what is done, free from deception, and speak what they respectively mean. He may be right but will it be said that all those circumstances concur in this case? They certainly do not, for the defendant has contracted to sell the whole of the land when he was only entitled to half. Was he aware of the land being worth four times as much as he sold it for? Most undoubtedly not. But there is a distinction to be made between the court's setting aside an unreasonable contract, after it is executed, and compelling a specific performance of such an one. In the latter case they will use their discretion with greater liberality, than in the former. In-*disturbing the contracts of individuals, adult, acting sui juris, not disqualified by idiocy or insanity, nor compelled by necessity; so on the other hand, it would be a great mischief to the community, and a reproach to the justice of the country, if contracts of very great inequality, obtained by fraud, or surprise, or the skilful management of intelligent men, from weakness, or inexperience, or necessity could not be examined into, and set aside. To steer the middle course has been found to be the difficulty.

†This is a question which calls for the exercise of the highest legal discretion—For as on the one hand courts of justice are cautious of

*259

The reluctance of the court to interfere has been manifested by many decided cases, in which it refused to set aside contracts. See Wood v. Fenwick, Prec. Ch. 206. Willis v. Terrigan, 2 Atk. 251. Nicholas v. Gold, 2 Vesey, 422. Motte v. Atwood, 5 Vesey, 845.—And see the case of White v. Damon, 7 Vesey, 30, 4, 5,—In which lord Rosslyn dismissed a bill for the performance of a contract on the ground of inadequacy merely: But on a re-hearing lord Eldon said that inadequacy alone, did not warrant such a decree without other circumstances. The necessity the court has been under of overcoming its reluctance to interfere in contracts to prevent great injustice is apparent from the following cases: Twistleton v. Griffith, 1 P. Wms. 310. Clarkson v. Hanway, 2 P. Wms. 203. Barnardiston v. Lingood, 2 Atk. 133, Ibid. 324. How v. Weldin, 2 Vesey, sen. 518; also, 2 Ver. 627. Evans v. Lewellin, 2 Bro. C. C. 150 & 326; 2 Bro. P. C. 396; 3 Atk. 383, 5; 1 Ves. 12.

On the ground of inadequacy of price, the court appears to have had great difficulty to lay down any general rule. By the civil law a rule was prescribed, That in the sale of immovables, if the price be less than half of the real value, at the time of the sale, the seller may get the sale to be declared void; and that independent of the honesty or knavery of the buyer or of his ignorance or knowledge of the value of the thing purchased. If there was no fault in the buyer, he should be bound to restore the fruits, only from the time of the demand: but if there were other vices in the sale, such as usury, fraud, or violence, the purchaser will be bound to make restitution of the fruits from the time of his possession of the thing, deducting the interest of the price he paid.††

*260

*Our laws, however jealous of protecting men in their property even against their own indiscretion, have never gone so far. And the rule seems to be that mere inadequacy of price, in a contract deliberately made between two persons, consusant of their rights, and competent to manage their own affairs, shall not be a ground purely of itself, to vitiate the contract. But the decided cases express a qualification which in reality is a material variation of the rule itself: for it is added, that the inadequacy of price shall not vitiate the contract, unless it be so gross, that every good man would at once exclaim against it, and as would furnish violent presumptive evidence of fraud, imposition, or oppression in the buyer; or weakness, ignorance, or deep necessity in the seller. See Underhill v. Howard, 11 Vesey, 209.—7 Bro. P. C. 70. Coles v. Trecothick, 9 Vesey, 246—4 Bro. P. C. 557. Emery v. Wade, 8 Vesey, 517.—5 Ves. 846.

It is agreed on all hands that the court is not bound to decree a specific performance in every case, where it will not set aside the contract; nor bound to set aside every contract, of which it will not decree the specific performance. In a case of great inadequacy, arising from the gross negligence of the agent, and a want of due authority, the bill for specific performance was dismissed, although there was no impeachment of the plaintiff; but without prejudice to his remedy at law. The court will not decree specific performance where there is any surprise, making it not fair and honest to proceed and call for specific performance. 10 Vesey, 305, 314, Mortlock v. Buller.

†† 1 Domat. 74. Book 1, § 9. Cooper's Justinian, p.

deed if this contract had been executed in all its parts, without the circumstance of defendant's being a young man just come of age and he had *applied to have it set aside, probably the court might have refused to do it:—But being altogether an executory contract, and the complainant coming here for a specific execution, this court will not depart from the constant rule in the case of a hard bargain, where it is not absolutely executed, but executory only; of refusing to carry it into execution.

*261

It was objected that the defendant was of full age: this is true; but he was just come of age; only a few months. When under age the law took care of him. Young heirs even when of age are under the care of this court, and then want it most; the law taking care of them till that time.

If the parties at the time of entering into an agreement respecting a claim capable of being precisely ascertained, be at the time of the contract ignorant of the precise value of it, but stipulates under an idea that what he is to receive will be equal in value to what he claims, this will be a sufficient ground for equity to set aside the agreement, if the thing received be not adequate to the value when precisely ascertained. It is pretty evident that the defendant was ignorant of the value of the property he was about to sell, and that he parted with it under an idea that what he was to receive was equal to the value of it, or he would most undoubtedly not have made the agreement he did: and from the testimony of major Pinckney it is evident, that the sum stipulated for, was extremely inadequate to the value of the land, even when not in a state of cultivation. The value was at least four times as much as was to be given for it; and this court will not decree a specific execution of articles, when extremely unreasonable or unconscionable, though no direct fraud proved; but will leave the party to his remedy at law.

It has been contended for complainant that the whole land should be conveyed, though it is evident from the deed of settlement, defendant is entitled only to a moiety. To decree according to complainant's wish, we must deprive defendant's brother of his right, which cannot be done consistently with any principle of equity. This court has certainly no right to order the brother to join in the conveyance. Lord Hardwicke has declared there *is no instance of decreeing a partial performance of articles, but it must decree all or none; and where some parts have appeared very unreasonable the court have said we will not do that, and therefore as we must decree all or none, the bill must be dismissed.

*262

In the case of Corking v. Pratt there the agreement was relative to the distribution of intestate's estate and it was set aside because the value of the distributive share was greater than was known at the time of the agreement. Underwood v. Hitchcox, lord chancellor declared that the court is not obliged to decree every agreement entered into, though for valuable consideration. Agreements of which there should be specific performance should be for adequate consideration; and there not being adequate consideration in this case the court would not decree specific execution. And in the case of Gwynne v. Heaton, the lord chancellor Thurlow, said, where the property sold is for a sum grossly inadequate, the court have never suffered it to stand. The real proportion of value has been stated in the case to shew that it was grossly inadequate. This is a very strong case; the most so of any cited and amongst the latest determinations. The cases of Young v. Clarke, in Precedents in Chancery, 538; and Kein v. Stukely, in 2nd Brown; are cases that have not been cited, where the court refused to decree specific execution of an unreasonable agreement. In one of those cases, the defendant had never seen the land, knew nothing of the nature or value of it, desired time to consider of it before he came to any agreement. It appeared and was proved that the lands were worth and plaintiff received one hundred pounds per annum more than he was to pay defendant: That defendant had no judgment of the value of land: By the importunity of plaintiff he was prevailed on to agree to make the leap: He afterwards discovered the imposition and refused to execute the agreement. The court is not bound to decree specific execution, where articles appear unreasonable or unjust, though there is no direct fraud; yet from the great under value of land it appeared to be an unreasonable and shameful contract, yet it was good and the court left plaintiff to his *legal remedy to recover what damages he could by nonperformance of the articles, and dismissed bill as to the specific execution.

*263

The court on full consideration of the case under discussion and all the circumstances attending it, and from the evidence on the part of the defendant (although there is no proof of fraud or imposition on part of complainant) are of opinion that the sum for which the land was agreed to be sold is grossly inadequate to its real value: That being an unreasonable contract and a very hard bargain, it would be both unreasonable and unjustifiable to decree a specific performance of the agreement. They will therefore leave th complainant to his remedy at law to recover his damages for the non-performance of the agreement, and dismiss his bill with costs.

1 Desaus. 263

Case LXXIII.

Present—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

Ex parte ANN BERESFORD, by Her Next Friend.

(March, 1792.)

[Husband and Wife ⟸12, 31.]

The court will order new settlement in favor of the wife, on a new accession of fortune; though opposed by the creditors of the husband and wife, who are in danger of not being fully paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 60, 63, 182; Dec. Dig. ⟸12, 31.]

The petition states, that under the will of Thomas Law Elliot, and on the death of his son and daughter without issue, the petitioner's former husband Charles Elliot, became entitled together with his sister Mary Rowand to all his real and personal estate; which Bernard Elliot, having intermarried with the daughter, retained (notwithstanding her death) under pretence that the limitation over to Charles Elliot and Mary Rowand was void.

That Bernard Elliot at length relinquished all the real estate to Charles Elliot and Robert Rowand the husband of Mary, but retained the personal till his death, in 1778; on which it came into the hands of his executors.

That Charles Elliot died in 1781, on which his wife the petitioner, became entitled under his will to one half of all his personal estate, after payment of debts and legacies; the other half he bequeathed to his daughter Jane Riley Elliot, now the wife of Col. Washington.

*264

*That some after his death the petitioner intermarried with the Hon. Richard Beresford, Esq.—but before the marriage executed indentures of lease and release between herself on the one part, Thomas Ferguson and Roger Parker Saunders on the other, and her intended husband on the third part, by which in order to secure to herself, and to her sole and separate use, all her estate real and personal, notwithstanding the marriage, she conveyed to Thomas Ferguson and Roger Parker Saunders their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, all her property of which she was possessed or to which she was in any manner entitled in trust for her till the solemnization of the marriage, and immediately after for the use of her intended husband, during his and her joint lives, and then to the use of herself or to such persons as she should appoint.

That sometime after the marriage was solemnized Charles Elliot's executors being dead or having renounced, the above mentioned Richard Beresford and William Washington obtained administration of his goods with the will annexed, and together with Robert and Mary Rowand, brought their bill against the surviving executors, and son of Bernard Elliot, for an account and delivery over of all Thomas Law Elliot's real and personal estate. On which it was decreed that the master should report, what personal property of Thomas Law Elliot came into Bernard Elliot's possession, together with the profits that had accrued, and what was the value of such as had been lost, and that the defendants should deliver over and account to the complainants in manner as in their bill they prayed, which hath not yet been done.

That the said Richard Beresford the petitioner's present husband, having contracted sundry debts, both before and after the marriage, some of his creditors brought their bill alleging that the petitioner's interest in the above mentioned estate was liable to their respective demands; on hearing which bill and the answer of your petitioner and her husband, it was decreed, that her interest was not liable to their demands, but after the determination of the joint lives of her and her husband, should remain to her *entire or her appointees; and that during the joint lives she should receive a maintenance out of the profits of the estate, (which were appropriated to pay the creditors during her husband's life.)

*265

That should the above mentioned account and delivery over from the executors of Bernard Elliot to Richard Beresford, Col. Washington and Robert Rowand take place, that part of the property to be delivered over, which the petitioner is entitled to by the will of her former husband Charles Elliot, might, being personal property, be supposed to vest in her present husband, by his creditors, and therefore to be subject to his debts, which is contrary to the will, marriage settlement, and several other decrees above mentioned, and to the rights of your petitioner. That the maintenance out of the profits of the estate, amounting to only 300*l.* per annum, and the use of a country house and house servants, is very inadequate to her suitable support, and inconsiderable when compared with the large estate which she possessed at her marriage, and which with prudent management is capable of producing from two to three thousand pounds a year. She therefore prays, that the said part be settled to her sole and separate use in such manner as the court may think most effectual and most conducive to her advantage.

This application by Mrs. Beresford was opposed by the creditors of her husband, and by those who held his bonds in which she had united with him.

The cause was argued by Mr. Harper, Gen. Pinckney, and Mr. Parker for the petitioner, and by Mr. Pringle, and Messrs. Desaussure and Ford for the creditors.

For the petitioner it was contended that on the accession of fortune to a wife, she is entitled to an increase of the provision made for her by settlement. That it was peculiarly proper in this case, where already a large income arising from the wife's fortune was carried away to creditors, and a small annual allowance reserved for her maintenance. That the accession of fortune in this case was peculiarly within the reach of the court, as it *arose out of a decree of the court itself, and the property still completely under its control. That it could not be said to be reduced to possession by the husband, so as to give him the real ownership by virtue of his marital rights, and therefore could not be subjected by the creditors of Mr. Beresford to the payment of their demands. The counsel cited for the petitioner 1 Eq. Cas. 64. 2 Eq. Cas. 146. 1 Strange 238. 2 Vesey, sen. 79, 91, 561. 2 Atk. 419, 420—Jewson and Moulson—Also, a case decided in this court of Harleston v. Hamilton and wife.

*266

On the part of the creditor it was contended that when the marriage between Mrs. Beresford and her husband took place, a settlement was made of all the estate she then possessed. That this is so secured that the creditors of her husband can get no part of the capital, only the income; and out of that the court has reserved 300*l.* per annum for a maintenance: on the death of the husband the rights of the creditors to be paid out of that estate would cease according to the decree, and they would go unpaid. That here is an accession of fortune, of personal estate since the marriage, not included in the settlement, and to which the marital rights attach. That it would be harsh to creditors for this court to interfere, and by ordering a new settlement, to take from them the only chance of payment which they have. The creditors are legally entitled to be paid out of this property, as soon as the husband reduces it to possession. Will the court interfere and deprive them of the benefit of their legal rights, in a case where the wife already has an ample settlement which protects a large estate, from their claims; the income only, during the husband's life, being liable to their demands. See 1 Vesey, 539. 1 P. Wms. 382, 458. The court in allowing Mrs. B. 300*l.* per annum for her maintenance, out of the income of the estate, which was wholly the husband's according to the terms of the settlement, went very far indeed in taking from creditors what they were entitled to. It would be too much to deduct still more from the funds from which the creditors have a chance of being paid. Even where there are no debts the court never goes so far as to settle the *whole of the wife's fortune, unless the husband abandons the wife, or uses her cruelly and neglects her. See 2 Atk. 511, 207. See 2 Vern. 270. 1 P. Wms. 458. 3 P. Wms. 12. 2 P. Wms. 639.†

*267

The court after deliberation delivered the following decree:

This court ever has regarded the claims of creditors with the most favourable eye, and in no instance more so, than the present, for at the time we decreed the estate in question, to be the right of those who claimed under the limitation in the wills of T. L. Elliot, and of Charles Elliot, and were about referring the matter to the master to report a settlement in behalf of Mrs. Beresford, upon its being suggested by some of the gentlemen at the bar that they would wish to be heard on the part of the creditors of Mr. Beresford, against such appropriation of the property; the court without the least hesitation complied with the request, and have patiently waited upwards of nine months, for the question to be brought forward; it has now been fully argued and we are called on to decide: It has been contended on the part of petitioners, that the property in question is included in the settlement made prior to Mrs. Beresford's marriage with Mr. Beresford, and therefore has been already decided on by this court, in the case of Bethune and others v. Beresford and others, and Saunders, and that that settlement has been fully established by this court.

The counsel on the other side, insists that it is not included in that settlement, but that it is altogether a new case, totally unconnected with the other, and must stand on its own bottom—But at the same time admits, that a possibility might in equity be assigned. We are of the latter opinion, and at the time we made the decree in the former cause, we were governed by the intrinsic merits of that case, at the same time we did not lose sight of the present case, and whether determined for, or against the interest of Mrs. Beresford, would at a future day be governed accordingly—that is, to make Mrs. Beresford an additional allowance out of this property if the cause *went in her favor; or if otherwise, on a petition for that purpose, to make her some reasonable additional allowance out of the trust estate. We will therefore consider the present case, as we did the former, on its own merits. The cases in general, that have been quoted on the present occasion, were also brought under our review in the former cause, but with the addition of those which now apply to the point of accession of fortune—We think it unnecessary to go over the same ground again with regard to the impeachment of marriage settlements, for the relief of creditors, as we went so fully into that doctrine before—But with regard to those respecting accession of fortune, and which the husband could not come at without coming into this court, and where we ought or ought not to impose terms on him, or where there are creditors in the case, how far the court ought to consider it as their duty to relieve them at the expense of the wife, is the question which first presents itself for our consideration. In all cases where the court refuses to make a settlement on the wife out of an accession of property acquired since marriage, and where there are creditors, it has been governed by this principle that an adequate one had already been made or ordered by the court, which would take from creditors their common law rights. The term adequate, is a relative term, and must here have reference to the quantity of the estate brought by the wife. It has been reiterated by the counsel on the part of the creditors, that this court has already given Mrs. Beresford such an adequate settlement, and that it would be unreasonable for us now to add to it, at the expense of the creditors. This court has done no such thing; all we did, was to make her some provision out of a settlement made prior to her marriage with Mr. Beresford, the whole of which Mr. Beresford's creditors wanted to possess themselves of; and we were well warranted in what we did, from the invariable run of authorities, that where creditors came here to seek equity against the husband, their debtor, whose whole possessions were acquired by the marriage, this court has always taken care that they should do equity, by making the wife a reasonable allowance out of her own fortune, as *they cannot be placed on a better footing, than the husband would have been. And what was this allowance? £300. a year, out of an estate, that was said to be capable of producing between £2000. and £3000. per annum. But we will suppose its probable produce not to be more than £1200. or £1500. per annum; surely then the allowance by this court was a very moderate one, especially too when it is considered, that it was for the support of both Mr. and Mrs. Beresford, which is but £150. per annum for Mrs. Beresford out of so large an estate as she brought her husband on her marriage with him. Under these circumstances, we must next consider how far the claims of the creditors to the property now contended for, is such as this court ought to support, and extend to them that relief they pray for. It is first necessary to examine into the nature of this estate, what it originally was, and what it now is. It is said that it was a reversionary estate in Mrs. Beresford, and when reduced to a certainty, as it now is, being a personalty, is liable to the husband's debts, and this court ought not to interpose its authority to prevent their availing themselves of the right over it which the law gives them. It never was a reversionary estate in Mrs. Beresford, but rather a contingent limitation in Charles Elliot, but which never had been by him reduced into possession; on the contrary his right was contested in this court, and as we believe, that point of law, on which the limitation in the will of T. L. Elliott was founded, never had been judicially decided in this country, there were two opinions on it, and each supported by some of the most eminent counsel of that, as well as of the present day, and until this court had decided that question, it could only be called as we have already mentioned a contingent limitation to Charles Elliot—So that Mrs. Beresford can be no otherwise considered than as a legatee, claiming under the will of her former husband Charles Elliot. Then without dispute, this court has a right on the husband coming here for his wife's legacy to impose terms on him, and as the creditors can only stand in his place, the same authority reaches them. The principal question then is, whether, if this is not a *property to be considered as included in Mrs. Beresford's marriage settlement—But as an accession of fortune since the execution of that deed, the court having already made her a provision out of the trust estate, this accession ought not now to be left for the benefit of the creditors of Mr. Beresford? We have already said, we did not think it is included in the marriage settlement, because although a reversion is assignable, yet this not being such an estate in Mrs. Beresford, was not by the words of that deed vested in the trustees, for to admit that it was, would be rendering that clause by far too comprehensive, as it would sweep into its vortex, every descent, devise, bequest or gift, that would have fallen or have been made to Mrs. Beresford, by her numerous relations and friends. This would be going beyond every allowance that the law admits of. Further, if it is to be considered as included in that deed, the court would take no notice of the present application, as it ought to have been for an increased allowance out of the trust estate.—But the court not considering it as included in that deed, they have turned their thoughts to the merits of the present petition. It might here be asked, whether there was any probability that the present creditors could have trusted Mr. Beresford on this contingent, litigated interest, that he might possibly become entitled to at some future day—We can by no means suppose so, when they saw him already in possession of a very large estate, and on which the credit must certainly have been given. It has been further contended on the part of the creditors, that this court ought not to countenance the present application, as the parties had their remedy at law. Why was not this objection made at the hearing of the cause? It would then have been proper, but it certainly is now out of season; the cause has been fully argued, the court has decreed, the objection is therefore inadmissible in this stage of the business; Mr. Beresford is before the court and properly so, we shall therefore decide on what we think is the true equity of the case; and as we do not consider the former provision made for Mrs. Beresford by this court, to be such an adequate provision proportioned to the estate, she has *altogether brought her husband, and which must always govern the decisions on this point, and as this accession of fortune will produce an income of no more than £100. per annum, we think it is to be considered, to be so far from an extravagant, that it is so very moderate an addition to be made to what was formerly allowed her, that the prayer of her petition ought to be granted. Let it therefore be referred to the master to report a proper settlement accordingly.

*268

† See the later cases, Mitford v. Mitford, 9 Vesey, 87. Carr v. Taylor, 10 Vesey, 574.

*269

*270

*271

1 Desaus. 271

Case LXXIV.

Present—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

LOGAN v. The Executor of ABRAHAM LADSON.

(June, 1792.)

[Perpetuities ⟸4.]

A bequest to a person and if he should die without issue living at his death, then a limitation over to another person, the limitation over is good.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perpetuities, Cent. Dig. § 30; Dec. Dig. ⟸4.]

[Remainders ⟸12.]

[A limitation in remainder of personal property is good, if it is to take effect during, or at the expiration of, a life or lives in being.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Remainders, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. ⟸12.]

The question in this case arose on a clause of the will of Mrs. Rachel Ladson, the mother of Abraham Ladson, the defendant's testator. She bequeathed to her son Abraham Ladson, certain personal estate, with a limitation over to Miss Perry if he should die without issue living at the time of his death. Abraham died without leaving issue living at his death; and the complainant who had married the lady to whom the limitation over was made, filed a bill for recovery of the property. The defendant admitted the will, but insisted that the limitation over was too remote, and therefore void as tending to a perpetuity.

The court said that the only question then for its determination was, whether the limitation over being of personal estate is warranted by the rules of law, or whether it is too remote. If this was a new question it would be proper and necessary to enter into a minute discussion of the principles on which it is to be determined and to assign the particular reasons and grounds of the decree in this case, but the numerous adjudications already had on the same point in this court and the court of chancery in England, renders such a discussion altogether needless. Suffice it to say, that although a limitation over of a personal chattel after a dying without issue generally will *not be admitted, yet if it is confined within a life or lives in being, or within ten months, or the birth of a child, or in case of the death of such child before the age of twenty-one years, the limitation over is good, for then the danger of the perpetuity, which is said to be so much abhorred by the law is avoided; all the candles are lighted and are consuming together, and the last remainder is in reality only to the remainder man who happens to survive the rest. The cases of Atkinson and Hutchinson, in 3 P. Wms. 258, and of Sheffield and Lord Orrery, in 3 Atk. 282, and Read and Snell, 2 Atk. 642, determined in England, and those of Sams and Mathews [1 Desaus. 127] and Beresford v. Elliott [1 Desaus. 183] in this court, are strong in point. Those authorities must not now be shaken, and future cases of a similar kind must be decided agreeable to those determinations.

*272

The court is of opinion therefore that the limitation over to Rachael Perry, on the contingency of A. Ladson dying without lawful issue living at the time of his death, was good—and decree that the property bequeathed by the will of Rachael Ladson to Rachael Perry on such contingency, be delivered up to the complainants: That the defendants do account before the master for the value of such of the property as was sold by their testator, and also for the profits and income of the property from the time of his death; and that the costs of this suit be paid by defendants out of the estate of their testator.

1 Desaus. 272

Case LXXV.

Present—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

Executors of WILLINGHAM v. Executors of SIMONS.

(June, 1792.)

[Husband and Wife ⟸23½.]

Payment to a creditor's wife is void but may be made good by the husband's confirmation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 147; Dec. Dig. ⟸23½.]

On a full view of this case, there appears to us, but a single point on which the decision of the case must ultimately rest: That is, whether, the last payment by Willingham to Mrs. Simons, although illegal in the first instance, is by any subsequent act of Colonel Simons, her husband, so far sanctioned, as to render it a good and valid payment. If it is to be so considered, this deter*mines all other points that have been brought into contest: We are of opinion, it must be taken by the rules of law, to be a sufficient payment and final discharge of the original contract. Neither the defendant nor Mrs. Simons deny that the money was paid over to Col. Simons her husband, but rather acquiesce in the charge that it was paid to him: Nor is there the least evidence, to shew the contrary. Nor is there any evidence offered to shew that Colonel Simons ever made any attempts to return the money to Willingham, and to insist on his right to the negroes, only that as the defendant says several years after he heard him once upbraid Willingham for the manner in which he had paid the money. From whence we must conclude, that there was such a consent and acquiescence on the part of Colonel Simons in the receipt of the money, as will be binding on him: Consequently the whole original contract has been fully completed on the part of Willingham. One thing however we would wish to be particularly attended to, which is, that we are decidedly of opinion the payment to Mrs. Simons was to all intents illegal:—Nor can any payments to a wife, of money owing to the husband, ever be made legal but by some subsequent act, or some very strong presumptive consent of the husband, which is so in the present case. As to the bill of sale from Willingham to Simons, it appears to be absolute, but when contrasted with other evidence, particularly the letter from Simons, which is subsequent to the bill of sale to Willingham, it is clearly shewn to have been intended as conditional. It is however made so by Simons himself, because he demands either the negroes or money: Then either the delivery of the negroes or payment of the money would have been a satisfaction of the debt. The latter was what Willingham chose, and we have already said must be taken as a satisfaction and full discharge of the original contract.

*273

It is therefore decreed, That the heir at law of Col. Simons do forthwith execute titles to the person entitled to the same as representative of Willingham: That the bill of sale by Willingham to Simons for the four negroes *be delivered up to be cancelled, and the injunction be made perpetual, and the costs of this suit be paid out of the estate of the defendant's testator.

*274

1 Desaus. 274

Case LXXVI.

Present—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

PARKER, TOPHAM, SOWDEN and Others v. JOHN M'IVER, JAMES SHOOLBRED and Others.

(June, 1792.)

Bill filed by attaching creditors against the captain and agents of the consignors of wines. [Sales ⟸296.]

Vender has a right to stop goods in transitu, where there has not been an actual delivery to the bankrupt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 845; Dec. Dig. ⟸296.]

[Attachment ⟸180.]

The Captain has a right to claim as creditor in possession of the property which was actually the bankrupt's.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. § 550; Dec. Dig. ⟸180.]

[Shipping ⟸69.]

The Captain is not entitled to commissions on drawing the bills, having funds in his hands to save him harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Shipping, Cent. Dig. § 296; Dec. Dig. ⟸69.]

[Shipping ⟸69.]

The Captain is not entitled to the £1000 claimed; he not having shewn how he was entitled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Shipping, Cent. Dig. §§ 201, 293, 307, 312, 313, 315, 317, 318; Dec. Dig. ⟸69.]

[Sales ⟸296.]

[A constructive delivery of goods to an agent of the vendee, for the purpose of being transmitted to the vendee, though vesting the property in the vendee for all other purposes, will not destroy the vendor's right to stop in transitu.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 837; Dec. Dig. ⟸296.]

This case was briefly as follows:—G. Howell, a merchant of London, fitted out the brig Favorite, placed a cargo on board, and put Capt. John M'Iver in command of her, with instructions to pursue a particular voyage. Capt. M'Iver accordingly went to Madeira, where he obtained a cargo of wine from certain merchants—He delivered them portions of his outward cargo in part payment for the wines, and bills were drawn on Howell for the balances. He then sailed for Africa, procured some slaves, and sailed for America. On arriving off the bar of Charleston, his brig was boarded by Mr. Shoolbred, who informed him that Howell had become bankrupt, and that the shippers of the wines had sent orders to him and other agents, to stop the wines, in transitu, as the bills of exchange drawn for payment of the wines had all been returned protested: He accordingly delivered to Mr. Shoolbred as agent of some of the shippers of the wine, the invoices, bills of lading, &c. relative to the said wines. He then came into port with his vessel and cargo, except the negroes, whom he sent by a lighter to Georgia. Attachments at law were served on Capt. M'Iver at the suit of the present complainants who were general creditors of G. Howell. The Captain made returns to the attachments stating the facts, and claiming the vessel, the slaves, and a small part of the wine, (which had not been delivered to Mr. Shoolbred and the other agents of the shippers of the wine) as creditor in possession, for what was due to him by Mr. Howell.

*275

*By an order of the Court of Common Pleas, a sale was made of the vessel and that part of the wine not delivered up, and the money directed to abide the future order of the court.

The attaching creditors filed their bill in this court against Capt. M'Iver, and Mr. Shoolbred, and Tummos, to discover all the facts in the case, and to obtain a general decision upon the conflicting rights of the attaching creditors, the shippers of the wine, the captain, and any other persons who set up claims against Howell.

The Captain in his answer to the bill, stated, that he had been appointed captain of the brig Favorite and sent on a voyage by G. Howell, the reputed owner, with a cargo of about the value of £1500 sterling, with which he sailed to Madeira, with instructions to deliver the cargo in different proportions to certain commercial houses, and to take on board a cargo of wines on account of Howell, from those houses, for which they were to draw bills on him. This was accordingly done, and those houses furnished a cargo of wine in different proportions, and drew bills for part of the amount of the wine, on G. Howell;—But they required defendant to draw bills for the balance due for the wines, or they would not permit the wines to be carried away; which the defendant at first refused to do, but afterwards acquiesced in, and drew bills on Mr. Howell to the amount of about £4200.—All which bills have been returned protested, and sent after this defendant for settlement: though G. Howell never expected or directed that this defendant should draw bills for the wine, as his agent: That he proceeded to Africa as he was directed, and getting a few slaves sailed for America: That defendant believing the slaves were not obtained with the sole funds of Howell, but with the property of Messrs. Wilsons of London, who have required an account of defendant: That he was boarded off the bar of Charleston by Mr. Shoolbred, who informed him of the bankruptcy of Mr. Howell; and with the authority which he had from one of the Madeira mercantile houses who had furnished the wine, to apply to him for the stoppage in transitu and the restoration of their property; which

*276

Mr. Shoolbred *considered the wines to be, and demanded from him their account: That on reflection he resolved to comply with Mr. Shoolbred's demand, on his agreeing to save him harmless on account of the bills he had drawn, reserving to himself a right to keep so much of the wine which had been paid for by the funds of said Howell, as would together with the brigantine, be sufficient to discharge defendant's private demands against said Howell. Accordingly whilst he was at sea he delivered to Mr. Shoolbred, all the original invoices that he had of the said wines, from said commercial house at Madeira, and all the original bills of lading except one, which he could not then find, but delivered him a copy thereof, and gave him an assignment of all the said wines, and a written engagement to make it more full and ample when required: That he afterwards found the missing bill of lading, and delivered it to Mr. Shoolbred: That with respect to forty pipes of wine shipped by another house at Madeira, he did at sea deliver them with the bills of lading and manifest to Messrs. Tunno as the agent of that house, they expressly agreeing to indemnify him from the bills he had drawn for the same; That with respect to the other wines, he claimed the same as creditor in possession; they having been paid for with the effects of the said Howell, and they have been sold by order of the Court of Common Pleas, and the money remains subject to the order of the Court: That being assured by legal men whom he sent up to consult, that he would have a lien on the goods to the amount of his demands, he sent the negroes to Georgia, and came with the vessel and cargo of wine into the port of Charleston, whereupon the complainants served him with copies of attachments. Mr. Shoolbred's and Messrs. Tunno's answers corroborated Capt. M'Iver's as far as the facts came within their knowledge, and they set up claims for their respective principals on the ground that they had a right to stop the goods in transitu, at least as far as they were not paid for.

The cause came to a hearing in the month of June, 1792, and many points were made in the case; but the only questions necessary to be noticed, are the following:

*277

*1st. Were these wines so vested in Howell, that the shippers could not stop them in transitu?

2d. Had Capt. M'Iver the right to retain as creditor in possession, such of the property as had been absolutely paid for with the funds of Howell?

3d. Had Capt. M'Iver a right to charge commissions on drawing the bills of exchange?

4th. Whether the Captain was entitled to £1000 on a special contract with the bankrupt Howell, for certain specific services?

For complainants it was contended that the right arising from the attachments laid by Howell's creditors, was superior to that of the shippers of the wines, or of M'Iver as creditor in possession: That the payment of part of the price of the wines, and the delivery of them, vested the property so completely in Howell, that the shippers or former owners had no right to stop them in transitu, but his general creditors might attach them as Howell's property: their attachments had their full effect from the service of copies citing the persons in possession to make return, though no actual seizure should be made. That M'Iver was the agent of Howell, and his possession was Howell's. That if the consignee puts his mark on the goods, it is such an act of possession and ownership as will not allow him to be divested of them by the seller, in case of the bankruptcy of the person to whom consigned; especially where consignee is really a purchaser. A bill of lading can convey no property, unless it is endorsed to the person so in possession. See 1 Stra. 165. 2 Durnf. 65, 70. 3 Durnf. 470. 1 Durnf. 216, 748. M'Iver had no right to deliver or dispose of the goods as he did to Tunno and Shoolbred. His act could not divest the property out of Howell, and revest it in the former owners of the wine; and Tunno had no power from one of the houses in Madeira till after the attachments had been served;—His act therefore is a mere nullity. The cases of stopping in transitu, are where the consignors reserved the power in their own hands of endorsing the bills of lading to whom they pleased; and where they were endorsed to a different person from him to whom they were originally *shipped. Such is the case of Hill and others v. Miller. There was no actual delivery of the wines at sea, to Mr. Shoolbred or Tunno, but simply of the bills of lading and invoices, which M'Iver improperly considered sufficient to authorize him to make out his manifest, as he did of the two parcels of wine as consigned to Shoolbred and Tunno, which was contrary to the fact. The Captain had no right to endorse the bills of lading, under the circumstances of the case. If M'Iver was the agent of Howell, then his possession was Howell's, and the property was in Howell; and it was too late to stop it in transitu. If he was not Howell's agent, then he had no right to act as he did, and change the relative situation of the parties; and his delivery to Shoolbred was a nullity, and the attachments must operate. If the property was not vested in Howell, how can M'Iver claim as creditor in possession? Whose creditor does he pretend to be? Howell's. And can Howell be owner for part, and not owner for the remainder of the wines shipped under the same circumstances, and in the same undivided parcels. Without denying the doctrine of the power of consignor to stop goods in transitu, it must be the case of a mere consignor to a mere consignee—not where the property has been paid for by goods in part, and bills in part, and the right actually vested, and the property delivered to the agent of the purchaser. And as to M'Iver's claim as creditor in possession, he is indemnified by the agents of the shippers, and in no danger; consequently he ought not to be allowed to set up that claim to the prejudice of others.

*278

For the defendant it was contended that to the extent of what is justly due to M'Iver he is creditor in possession under the express provisions of the attachment act, and he cannot be deprived of it. Indeed as far as he made himself liable for the wines, by drawing the bills, the property was in M'Iver. See 2 Vern. 203, 564. 1 Atk. 245, 162, 190, 228, 233. The court would have protected M'Iver even against Howell's demand of the wine till the bills were paid—a fortiori against his attaching creditors. Besides his demand as creditor in possession is on the vessel, and such articles as were not delivered to the agents *of the shippers of the wine, for other debts due him, independent of his liability on the bills drawn on Howell and protested. See 2 Vesey, 674. Lichbarrow and Mason. It is a settled doctrine that the consignor of goods may stop them in transitu, if not paid for. The present complainants stand on weak ground. They never had possession of the bills of lading; they never paid a cent for these goods; they are mere general creditors with no sort of equity to induce the court to favor them against the owners of the wines, who have been paid but a small proportion of what is due for them. For this court to interfere, it would be to take money out of one man's pocket to put in anothers, with less of equity in his claim. The consignors ask to be paid out of their own effects. If M'Iver was not the agent of Howell, and had no power to draw the bills, then there was no delivery to Howell or any person on his behalf, and the property in the wines remained in the shippers, or in M'Iver who had made himself responsible on the bills drawn for payment; consequently the attachments could not affect the property as Howell's. If M'Iver was the agent of Howell, then he had a right to do any acts in relation to the property which justice and fairness required; and justice required that the goods should on the bankruptcy of Howell be restored to the original owners, who were unpaid, and who could not otherwise be paid; rather than suffer it to go to pay general creditors. Nor could the bankruptcy of Howell prevent the agent doing so; because the effects of the bankrupt laws do not extend out of Great Britain. The bankrupt laws cannot affect property at sea, and which never comes within the jurisdiction of the English courts. See 3 D. and East 466. Cooper 636. See also 1 D. and E. 645. Dougl. 659. Stra.

*279

533. The partial payment was earnest money, and that only binds the bargain; but you cannot take the goods till the whole price is paid, at common law. Hobart 41.

The vendee cannot even bring suit for goods till payment is made, unless a future day of payment is given. It is as clear law as it is justice, that if the vendor can get his goods again from the carrier, or master of the ship, *by fair means, he has a right to keep them; so here the agents and friends of the Madeira merchants got possession of the wines with the consent of the captain or carrier, given deliberately, on the purest principles of justice and equity, to render to every one his own. See 3 P. Wms. 186. It is immaterial whether goods are sent by a common or special carrier, the right to stop them in transitu is the same. See Henry Blackstone 364, expressly to that point. The case of Lichbarrow and Mason reported in D. and East, has been reversed in the exchequer chamber, as stated by Henry Blackstone. There is no assignment in this case of the bills of lading by Howell, and the distinction is between actions between the vender and vendee, and actions between the vendor and the assignee of the vendee, who has innocently advanced money without notice on assignment of the bills of lading. In the first, the vender has a right to repossess himself of the goods in transitu. In the second not, and a statutable assignment by the bankrupt laws, does not produce the same effect with the actual assignment to a third person for valuable consideration. For the innocent assignee for valuable consideration has a right to be repaid what he advanced on the credit of the bill of lading. But the assignment under the statute is not for any new consideration.

*280

As to Capt. M'Iver's demands for commissions on the bills drawn at Madeira on Howell, he was obliged to draw to procure the wines, and he ran great risk by thus making himself liable. Mercantile men are in the habit of charging commissions in such cases, and the witnesses think that the usage is established. If so, Capt. M'Iver is entitled to the benefit of it.

The questions of the Captain's right to charge commissions on the amount of the bills drawn at Madeira, and his claim to 1000*l.* on a special contract with Howell, were briefly argued and submitted to the court.

September, 1792.

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the judgment of the Court as follows: The first point is whether the Captain is an agent for the consignee, and delivery to him such an actual delivery to the consignee as divests the consignor *of all property in the goods, and of the right to stop them in transitu, on the bankruptcy of the consignee, and thereby making the goods liable to the attachments issued by the general creditors of the bankrupt? In the opinion of the court, the Captain can by no means be considered as the agent of the consignee, and delivery to him actual delivery to the consignee. If he was there never could a case happen, where the consignor could retake the property in transitu. The Captain like a common carrier undertakes for the safe keeping and transporting of goods committed to his custody, and to deliver them to the order of the consignor, or such person as may be named in the bill of lading. He acquires a special property, to support his possession and to enable him to perform his contract to deliver. But as to the allegation that the Captain (M'Iver) was in this case the special agent of Howell, there is no foundation for it. The bills of lading are in the usual form; to deliver one parcel of wine to the agent of Howell in Charleston, and another parcel to himself in London. M'Iver being appointed to the command of the vessel by Howell does not vary the case. He stands on the same ground as a carrier, with any other commander of a vessel, unless some written authority be shewn proving him to have been a special agent of Howell.

*281

In all the cases decided, the court of law has made a very proper distinction between an actual and a constructive delivery to the vendee in order to support the right of the consignor to stop the goods in transitu.

In the case of Stokes v. La Riviere, 3 Durnf. & E. 466, in 1784, a person living at Lisle, sent an order to the plaintiff for goods to be consigned to him. They were sent by the particular conveyance mentioned in the instructions, by way of Ostend; at which place and before they got into the possession of the consignee, they were attached by the defendant for a debt due him by the consignee, but not until after the plaintiff had heard of the insolvency of the consignee, and had countermanded the delivery. Lord Mansfield held that the constructive possession of the consignee, to whose special agent the goods had been delivered for the purpose *of being transmitted to him, was not to be regarded, but that there must be an actual delivery to the consignee himself. So here the goods being stopped while they were in transitu, and before the vendee had actually taken possession, the vendors were competent to countermand the delivery in the event which had happened; and certainly the goods must be considered in transitu, until they arrive at the ultimate place of delivery, which did not happen here. This case is exactly similar to that before us.

*282

The case of the lessee of Blanchard v. Beal, 3 Durnf. & E., in 1785, is still stronger to shew the necessity of an actual possession by the bankrupt, in contradistinction to a constructive possession, by the intervention of an agent. Per lord Mansfield. "Though goods may be considered as delivered to the vendee for many purposes, yet as for this purpose there must be an absolute and actual possession by the bankrupt, otherwise they may be stopped in transitu. A delivery to a third person to convey is not sufficient." These authorities have been cited in subsequent cases, and recognized in the court of King's Bench by the present judges of that court.

In Ellis v. Hunt and others, assignees of Moore, 3 Durnf. & E. 469, in 1789, which was an action of trover for a quantity of files, the case was as follows: The goods had been carried to the place of destination, and the consignee being a bankrupt, his assignees had put their mark upon them, but had not removed them. The consignor some days after countermanded the delivery; and the question was, whether there was such an actual delivery and possession by the consignee or his assignees, as would debar the consignor of his right to stop the goods in transitu, and it was determined that he had lost the right. I quote this case principally on account of the following circumstance in it: The goods were brought to the Falcon Inn on the 22d November: Immediately on their arrival in town they were attached by the creditors of the bankrupt: On the 15th a docket was struck, and on the 18th a commission of bankruptcy issued against him: On the 24th a provisional assignment was executed by the commissioners to John *Wills, who demanded the goods, and on the same day put his mark on the cask, but did not remove it. The attachment was withdrawn, but the case does not mention on what principle. I suppose it must have been because he had been declared a bankrupt on the 18th, four days before, and all his right had been assigned to the commissioners previous thereto. Buller J.

*283

In all the cases that have been decided on this subject, the line has been precisely drawn; and they all turn on the question, whether there has been an actual delivery to the bankrupt. It is of the utmost importance to adhere to the line for if we break through it, we shall endanger the authority of the cases already decided. There may be cases where as between buyer and seller, if no bankruptcy happen, the goods are considered as in the possession of the buyer, the instant they go out of the possession of the vendor. As if A. order goods to be sent by a particular carrier at his own risk; delivery to the carrier is delivery to A. to every other purpose. But if he becomes insolvent or bankrupt, before the carrier actually delivers them to him, the vendor might seize them; because it is only a constructive delivery to the vendee. An actual delivery is necessary to divest the vendor's right to stop the goods in transitu. It is a right founded on equitable principles, originally established by the courts of equity, and since adopted by the courts of law. But to avail himself of it, the vendor must stop the goods before they get into the actual possession of the vendee.

Solomons v. ———, 2 D. & E. 674, in 1788. One Hague bought a quantity of lead from the defendant at Liverpool, and ordered it to be shipped to Rouen in France. It was accordingly shipped from Chester by the defendant, and bills of lading were endorsed and sent to Hague. The plaintiff afterwards gave Hague acceptances for £700 and Hague delivered him the bills of lading as a security. The vessel sailed, but was forced back by stress of weather to Chester. Hague having become bankrupt, and the defendant not having received the price of his goods, stopped them, while they were on board of the ship in England, and took them away. The plaintiff demanded the *lead, which was refused to be delivered, and an action was thereupon brought. The acceptances had not been paid.

*284

Lord Kenyon. This is a harsh demand against the defendant, who it is confessed has not received the value of the goods in question. The first case on this subject is Tollet's assignees v. Prescott. That has never been impeached in the smallest degree; on the contrary it has always been mentioned by the court with approbation. As between vendor and vendee, where the price is not paid the former has a right to stop the goods in transitu in case of bankruptcy of the latter.

In Lichbarrow v. Mason, 2 D. & E. 70 (1787), in the Court of King's Bench, Ashurst said; where the delivery is to be at a distant place, as between vendor and vendee, the contract is ambulatory until delivery; and therefore in case of the insolvency of the vendee in the mean time, the vendor may stop the goods in transitu.

The same case was afterwards removed by writ of error into the Exchequer Chamber (1790), where lord Loughborough in delivering the opinion of the court said, that the sale is not executed before delivery, and in the simplicity of former times, a delivery into the actual possession of the vendee or his servant was always supposed. In the variety and extent of dealing, the delivery may be presumed from circumstances, so as to vest a property in the vendee. A destination of goods by the vendor to the use of the vendee, marking them, removing them for the purpose of being delivered, may all entitle the vendee to act as owner to assign, and to bring an action against a third person, to whose hands they may have come. But the title of the vendor is never entirely divested, until the goods have come into the possession of the vendee. He has therefore a complete right for just cause to retract the intended delivery, and to stop the goods in transitu.

The cases determined in the courts of law have confirmed this doctrine.

The case of Bowering v. Veruler, called the Dutch case, proves, that the consignor does not part with all his right on shipping goods. For in this case the consignor hearing of the insolvency of the consignee, after the goods *had been shipped, but before the ship had sailed, summoned the ship master before the court at Amsterdam, who ordered him to sign other bills of lading to the order of Veruler, notwithstanding he had signed bills to deliver to Bowering or order. H. Blackstone 364.

*285

The case of the assignees of Tollet v. Prescott, 1 Atk. 245, is the first that was determined on this subject; all subsequent determinations have been bottomed on the authority of that case; and they all uniformly agree, as between the consignor and consignee, in supporting the right of the owner unpaid, to stop the goods in transitu. And in the case last mentioned lord Hardwicke went further, and decreed in favor of the consignor in the first instance, against the indorsee of the bill of lading without notice; and said he could not see the reason, why the principal should not have his goods again, unless it was because his being in possession of the bills of lading might have gained the bankrupt a credit.

I take no notice of the cases relative to principal and factors, because, they do not immediately apply; and the case of Wiseman v. Vandeput is no otherwise applicable than to shew, that it is allowable in equity for the consignor to take any means short of force or violence to regain possession of the goods, before they come to the hands of the bankrupt or his assignees.

It is observable that from the determination in the case of the assignees of Tollet v. Prescott, to that of Mason v. Lichbarrow in the Exchequer Chamber, there is but one similar to this; that is the case of Stokes v. La Riviere.

The cases are all between either consignor and consignee, assignees of the bankrupt and consignor, or indorsees of consignee and consignor. This is a case between the creditors of a bankrupt attaching goods not paid for, which were consigned to the bankrupt subsequent to his becoming so; the consignor in a foreign country, ignorant of the situation of his consignee; which goods were never actually delivered to, or in the possession of the bankrupt, who indeed had absconded, and his bankruptcy been docketted previous to the signing of the bills of lading.

*286

*The whole train of adjudications concur in the following points: That nothing short of actual delivery and possession of goods by the consignee, will divest the consignor of his legal right to stop them in transitu: That the contract is ambulatory as between the vendor and vendee, where the goods are to be delivered at a distant place, until delivery; and that in case of the vendee's insolvency in the meantime, they may be stopped by the vendor in transitu; and lastly that they must be considered in transitu until they arrive at the ultimate place of delivery.

It is not contended that Howell ever assigned the bills of lading, or that he ever had possession of them, or of the invoices; indeed it was impossible that he could have them, as he had absconded, and his bankruptcy was docketted before the bills were signed.

It is a leading maxim in courts of equity that he who seeks equity must first do equity; and it is certainly much more consonant to equity and justice, that the consignor of the goods, which were unpaid for, should be allowed to retain them, if he can by any means get possession before they are delivered; than that old creditors who never trusted on the faith of those goods, should get an undue preference, and have their whole debts paid in the first place, and leave the consignor to come in as a creditor for a shilling in the pound, notwithstanding he has the goods in his own custody, and a specific lien on them. Where the equity is equal between the parties, the legal title must prevail. Now according to the foregoing cases, Shoolbred and others, (acting for the owners of the wine) having never been entirely divested of their legal title, the goods not having been actually delivered, nor in the possession of Howell, and having a right to stop them in transitu, obtained the bills of lading and invoice and possession of the goods by their agent as far as was practicable, previous to their coming within the state. This court will lay hold on any circumstances to secure to them the advantage they have gained. Though we incline to favor creditors as much as we can, yet they must shew that they have a superior right to other persons. *This being a case between old creditors of a bankrupt, and the consignors of the goods never paid for or delivered, the defendants have most unquestionably a far superior equity to the complainants, and we will not deprive them of the possession they have obtained. If Howell or his assignees were before the court, they could not get the goods from Searle & Co. without paying for them, and the complainants claiming under him cannot be in a better situation. Upon the whole of this point therefore we are clearly of opinion, that the goods having never been actually delivered to, or in the possession of Howell, the attachment would not lie on them; for the act requires that the goods attached should be the property of the absent debtor. I do not think Calvalhall's case materially different. For though M'Iver was not the agent by regular power of attorney, yet on the principle that the goods were never actually delivered to, or in the possession of Howell, they must be considered as in transitu, and no more liable to the attachment, not being the property of Howell. Indeed the case of Stokes v. La Riviere strongly favours this opinion; for the property being attached prevented them from being carried to the consignee, by which means they were given up to the consignor. And the case of Hill v. Miller determined by this court, will also warrant a decree in favor of the defendant M'Iver.

*287

The second point is whether the defendant M'Iver has a right to retain as creditor in possession to satisfy his demand against Howell? It cannot be doubted that M'Iver has a preferable lien on such property as was actually Howell's, as creditor in possession, to satisfy his demand; but to no part of that which belonged to the Madeira merchants, except so far as they may have property of Howell's in their possession, yet unaccounted for. The attachment act gives him the preference as creditor in possession.

The third point is respecting commissions. As to the seventy-nine pipes shipped by Searle & Co.—It appears from their account current, that M'Iver was considered by them as the shipper. They have made him debtor *for them, and have taken his bills on Howell for the whole amount. The goods seem to be shipped on his credit alone, for he swears that Searle & Co. positively threatened to take the wines back and prevent his sailing, unless he would draw bills. Standing in that point of view, we consider him as the real shipper of forty pipes of wine, and therefore not entitled to commissions, being himself personally responsible: nor ought he to be allowed a commission on Calvalhall's wines. Several merchants were examined, who declared it to be the custom, that where persons endorsed bills, they were entitled to commissions, whether there was a deposit or not, because of the risque which they run in making themselves personally responsible. In the present case there was little or no risk, for M'Iver was full handed, having not only all the wines for which he had drawn bills in his own custody, and they too fully insured, but those likewise which belonged to Howell, that had already been paid for.

*288

The fourth point. Is M'Iver entitled to the 1000*l.* (which he claimed under a special agreement.) We think he is not entitled, because he has not shewn what were the objects he was to perform, or whether he has performed them. It would be very extraordinary to decree him that sum without knowing what were the services to be done, or if he had performed them in whole or in part. This is a matter resting altogether in his own knowledge; and as he has not thought proper to discover by his answer whether he has done his part, nor brought any evidence to prove it, we must conclude from his silence on the subject, that he has not accomplished the several important objects, and therefore is not entitled to the reward. The wages and other allowances made him may be reasonably presumed a sufficient compensation for his services, merely as Captain of the vessel. The bill of complainants was therefore dismissed.†

Mr. Pringle, Mr. Ford, Mr. Read for complainants, Mr. Rutledge, Gen. Pinckney for defendants.

†See the cases on the right of stopping goods in transitu, collected in Cooper's Justinian in the notes, pages 461 to 466. The principal cases are Wiseman v. Vandeput, 2 Vern. 203. 1 Atk. 245. Cowper 296. 1 Henry Blackstone 357. 364. 2 H. Blackstone 211. 2 Term Rep. 63. 674. 3 Do. 119. 464. 5 Do. 683. 6 Do. 20. 7 Do. 65. 441. 8 Do. 330. 1 East Rep. 4. 515. 3 Do. 93. 583. 5 Do. 175. 6 Do. 20. 9 Do. 506. 3 Caine's New York Rep. 182. 1 Johnson's N. Y. Rep. 1. in error.

1 Desaus. *289

*Case LXXVII.

Present—Chancellors Linson, Mathews and Rutledge.

JAMES DENTON v. ALEXANDER M'KENZIE.

(June, 1792.)

[Trusts ⟸20, 100.]

A person agreeing verbally to bid in land for another at Sheriff's sale shall be bound and decreed to hold in trust, though he took the titles in his own name, and pleaded the statute of frauds in bar: but the agent had tendered an account in which he charged his friend with the amount of the purchase money.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 25, 151; Dec. Dig. ⟸20, 100.]

[Equity ⟸345.]

[The answer of defendant, so far as responsive to the bill, must be taken as true unless it be overturned by two witnesses, or one with strong corroborative circumstances.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 722; Dec. Dig. ⟸345.]

The complainant's bill charged, That on the 21st July, 1787, he purchased from the corporation of Charleston the lease of the Fish Market and of the premises adjoining thereto with the right of collecting toll on fish, and with liberty to erect buildings on the premises for fourteen years, at £42. sterling per annum: That he laid out on the said premises in repairs and buildings £770. sterling, particularly in erecting a house and kitchen on the same: That the said buildings being nearly finished he was applied to by defendant for a lease of the whole of the said premises, which the complainant accordingly let to defendant for three years at £200. per annum, payable quarterly: That it was then agreed that defendant should pay down to complainant, at the expiration of the first quarter £50. in cash, which complainant wanted to pay a judgment obtained against him for £40. 8s. 9d. and costs, and that the rent thereafter to grow due should be applied towards finishing the dwelling house and kitchen, or to reimburse defendant on that account, till the whole was paid, and afterwards to be paid to complainant; which agreement more fully appears by a memorandum in writing at the foot of the lease between the said parties, dated 8th August, 1788: That at the expiration of the first quarter, complainant called on defendant for his rent in order to enable him to pay the judgment and costs above mentioned, and defendant promised to procure the money: but failing in his promise, the complainant's estate in the said leased premises was sold by the Sheriff on the 18th Nov. 1788, for £505.—That the purchaser not complying with the terms of sale, the Sheriff again advertised the same for sale, and when the day of sale was near complainant again applied to defendant for his rent, in order to enable him to pay said judgment, inter*est and costs, which then amounted to £63. 5s. 9d.—That defendant notwithstanding his promises still failing to procure the money, promised complainant, that if a resale took place, that he would buy in the property as a friend and trustee of the complainant and for his use:—That on the day of sale, the 11th Dec. 1788, as agreed upon, the defendant did attend as trustee for the complainant and bought the premises aforesaid for £66. 6s. 9d. which was only a nominal sum, and to cover the defendant and costs: That the defendant still neglecting to raise and pay the said debt and costs (although largely in arrear to complainant as well for rent as on account) complainant on 24th Feb. 1789, advanced defendant £35. 4s. 6d. towards making payment to the Sheriff, in order to prevent any after or other resale of the premises, for which sum complainant took defendant's receipt as for cash lent, copy of which is filed with bill: That the Sheriff having executed titles to defendant for the premises, the defendant brought the same to complainant and saying he had cleared the complainant of all encumbrances on that property, asked complainant to release him from his lease, telling complainant that the rent of 200*l.* per annum was more than he could make, on which complainant expressed his unwillingness to hold defendant, whom he considered as his friend, to a bad bargain: That defendant left the premises, and complainant took possession thereof, as his own property, with defendant's consent. The complainant further charges that the defendant conscious of the trust before set forth, and that the premises were bought in by him in trust for complainant, afterwards and after the complainant had as aforesaid taken possession of the premises, to wit, on the 15th May, 1789, delivered to complainant an account signed with defendant's own hand and dated on the said 15th May, in which he hath not only charged complainant with the sum paid at the Sheriff's sale as the price of the Fish Market and premises, but also with ten shillings for punch drank at the coffee house at the sale; and complainant refers to defendant's account, a copy of which is filed, and alleges that the same plainly proves that the *said premises were bought in by defendant for and on account of complainant. Complainant further charges that, on or about the 1st January, 1790, he moved to Columbia, and left his said house in possession of Charles Snowden, and the market in possession of Joseph Pope, and that on Mr. Snowden's advertising the said house, the defendant to the great surprise of the complainant, demanded the keys and claimed the house as his property, and on Mr. Snowden's refusing to deliver up the keys the defendant forced the door and took possession of the said dwelling house and dispossessed Pope of the market. That defendant continued possessed until 1st March, 1790, when he rented the same to one Plunkett who gave possession to the complainant, who lately had possession of the premises. Complainant further shews that defendant is considerably indebted to him on account of the said lease which is in full force and uncancelled, and notwithstanding repeated applications refuses to come to any liquidation or settlement of accounts with complainant, or to declare the trust, or assign and set over the premises to complainant, or for his use, as in justice and equity he ought to do. Complainant prays the defendant may be compelled to release and assign to complainant, for his own use the remainder of said lease, and deliver up all sales, titles, deeds and evidences thereto relating, and account for the rents and profits thereof after deducting for finishing and repairing the premises, and that defendant may be decreed to pay costs, and that complainant may be further relieved, &c. he prays process of subpœna, and so forth.

*290

*291

The defendant Alexander M'Kenzie as to so much of the complainant's bill as seeks to compel defendant to release and assign to complainant the remainder of the lease of the premises in bill mentioned, and to deliver up titles, &c. relative thereto pursuant to the pretended agreement in bill mentioned, and as to any relief thereby prayed touching such agreement, pleads in bar and saith that by an act of parliament of 29 Car. 2d. and of force in this state; it is amongst other things enacted, "That from and after the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised; and that from and after the said four and twentieth day of June, all declarations or creations of trust or confidences of any lands, tenements or hereditaments, shall be manifested and proved by some writing signed by the party who is by law enabled to declare such trust, or by his last will in writing, or else they shall be utterly void, and of none effect," as by the said act may appear: And defendant avers that neither he, nor any person by him authorised, ever made or signed any contract to purchase the premises in trust for, or to the use of the complainant, and therefore pleads the said act in bar as aforesaid.

*292

24th June, 1677, no action shall be *brought to charge any person upon any contract of lands tenements or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof shall be in writing, and signed by the

The defendant also put in an answer, and therein admitted with some qualifications, many of the facts charged by the complainant: That on the Sheriff's making sale of the premises, to satisfy a debt due by complainant, and the purchaser not complying with the terms of sale, the property was put up for sale a second time, after due advertisement, and it was knocked off to the defendant on the 11th Dec. 1788, as the highest bidder, without any fraud or collusion, and he has received sufficient titles from the said Sheriff, and denies any such conversation or agreement respecting the purchase as is pretended by complainant. He also denies that he did attend at sale in pursuance of the said pretended agreement, and as a trustee bid off the said Market and premises for the sum in bill mentioned, or that it was bid only as a nominal one, and to cover debt and costs. Defendant positively denies that complainant advanced £35 to pay said judgment, interest and costs, and to prevent a resale of the premises: That he recollects he did give complainant a receipt for £35 but it was not received in one sum on the day of the receipt, but at divers times and not to pay the judgment, but on the general account of *defendant against complainant, defendant having satisfied the said judgment in January, except a small balance which he paid in February; or that he was at all in arrear to complainant. Defendant denies that he ever brought the Sheriff's titles to complainant, and that thereupon such or any other conversation passed between them as in bill mentioned. Defendant in his amended answer, avers that both himself and complainant considered said lease vacated by Sheriff's sale. Defendant says that although complainant did take possession of the premises about 15th May, 1789, yet he denies that it was in right of, or under any other circumstances, or in any other manner than is by defendant set forth. Defendant admits that he delivered to complainant the account marked B. exhibited with bill; but denies it was from any consciousness or as any evidence of the trust alleged by bill; but that complainant having murmured at the low price for which the lease was sold by the Sheriff, defendant told him that if he would reimburse and pay him all the monies he owed him in a certain time, to wit; in a few months thereafter, he would convey to him the premises, to which proposition the complainant would not consent: That defendant mentioned the above to his solicitor in his instructions before he put in his answer, but his solicitor did not think it material to insert, and he delivered the account to his solicitor filed with his answer including the £72 paid to the sheriff for the premises. Defendant admits he removed from the premises, but on the 4th April and not May, and permitted complainant to take possession, but as his tenant, and under the following circumstances: That sometime after the sale complainant called on defendant and saying he was ruined by the sale of his property to defendant, the defendant let complainant have the premises as tenant at will at £150 per annum, which he in fact considered as nominal, not expecting complainant would be able to pay him: That on complainant removing to Columbia he did take upon himself to direct Mr. Snowden to let the house on his account, and did let the Market to Joseph Pope; and defendant admits that on

*293

*294

Mr. Snowden's advertising the house to *let, he did claim and take possession of the same as his property, and did endeavour to dispossess the said Pope of the Market, which he conceived he was warranted to do: That defendant did exercise acts of ownership over the premises until the 1st March, 1790, when he let the same to a certain Plunkett, of whom complainant unduly procured possession. Defendant saith he is willing to come to a fair settlement of accounts with complainant as he is confident there will be a balance in his favour. He admits he claims the premises as his own by virtue of the Sheriff's titles aforesaid, and denies that he ever agreed to purchase in trust for complainant. Defendant denies combination and prays dismission with costs.

That complainant hath also repeatedly since the sale asserted and acknowledged the defendant to be the purchaser and owner of the premises, particularly on the occasion of a suit being brought against him by the city corporation: That defendant by reason of complainant's pretended trust has been prevented from deriving any advantage from the premises, while the ground rent is accumulating and the premises going out of repair and sinking in value.

The cause came on to be heard on the ——— June, 1792. The following testimony was given:—Mr. Kennedy the Sheriff swore, That at the sale of the premises he told Denton that if he could get any one to bid off the land so as to satisfy the debt and costs, he wanted no more. It was knocked off to M'Kenzie whom he considered as the friend of Denton, and in his opinion it was bought in for Denton.

Mr. Grant swore, That M'Kenzie desired witness to go to the sale of the land, and bid for it: and he understood that if he had bought it, it was to be for Denton. He heard M'Kenzie say he owed Denton £50 on the day of sale. After the sale he heard M'Kenzie tell Denton he had got a good bargain, and if Denton would pay him back, for all the improvements he had made on the premises he would let him have the premises back again.

B. Cudworth swore, That M'Kenzie told him he had Denton's property so much at his command, that he *might do what he pleased with it, but he was not so great a villain as to take such an advantage of him. But that if Denton would pay him all he owed him (for improvements) he would give it up to him. That on winding up the accounts there was but a small balance due to M'Kenzie, about £12. But M'Kenzie said there was a great deal more due to him and he would avail himself of all the advantages he could under the purchase of the land.

*295

Wall swore, That he was joined with Cudworth in adjusting the accounts between the parties, and there appeared to be a large balance due to M'Kenzie; provided, he was not to be chargeable with the rent.

Mr. Holmes stated, That on his bringing a suit against Denton, he brought M'Kenzie to prove that the property belonged absolutely to M'Kenzie, but he (Mr. Holmes) did not then believe it.

The cause was argued by Mr. Read and Gen. Pinckney for complainant, and Mr. Holmes and Mr. Pringle for defendant.

Mr. Read, said, That as to the plea in bar, the account rendered by the defendant and signed by him, in which he charges him with the money he paid for the premises in question, is such a memorandum in writing as will take the case out of the statute of frauds, and consequently defeat the plea in bar. The merits were clearly with the complainant.

Mr. Holmes for defendant, contended, That if an agreement is signed by only one of the parties, and there is nothing to bind the other party, it is not such an agreement as will take the case out of the operation of the statute. Pow. on Con. 280. It is true that where the deed is drawn by one party and signed by the other it will bind both. 1 Vern. 271. 1 P. Wms. 282, 770. 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 49. If a man agrees with another by parol to purchase his house, and pays him part of the purchase money, and the other refuses to carry the agreement into execution a specific execution cannot be compelled.—There is no other remedy but an action at law for damages. If it be admitted that this is a fraudulent trans-ac*tion, yet the complainant can have no remedy, being particeps fraudis; and the Sheriff's titles to M'Kenzie must be conclusive on the parties themselves, though it might have been different as to creditors.

*296

Mr. Pringle for defendant, Overruling the plea in bar would not tend to set aside the conveyance by the Sheriff to M'Kenzie: The court will still decide on the whole merits. 1 Atk. 13. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 47, 50. 2 Vern. 627. 2 Atk. 283. 2 Com. Digest 124. The defendant having denied every thing in his answer, the plaintiff must prove every thing charged in the bill to entitle himself to relief. 2 P. Wms. 222.

If Mr. Kennedy thought, (as he swore) That M'Kenzie purchased in the property for Denton, why did he not then mention that there ought to be some clause in the deed stating the trust for Denton. Quoted 1 Powell 429, 434, 185.

Gen. Pinckney for complainant, If one party by letter proposes terms of sale to another, and the party to whom the terms are so proposed, acts upon it, both parties are bound, the first by the letter, and the second by his act, which shews an assent on his part to the proposals. Taking possession by the proposed vendee is such an act. The statute of frauds was intended to prevent frauds, and not to cover them. 3 Atk. 388–9. It does not appear at this time that there was any intention to defraud creditors. See 2 Powell 149. 2 Ves. 281, 516. It is manifest from the facts proved in the case that the purchase was made by M'Kenzie for Denton: and if he were not to be held bound to convey to Denton, would be protecting him in a gross fraud, and violation of a private confidence, by which he would be a great gainer at the expense of the man whom he pretended to befriend. This would be an abuse of the statute, and would be intolerable. Justice is the great object of the court, and when it perceives that fraud would defeat its justice, it will not permit it to take sanctuary under a statute made expressly to prevent fraud.

July, 1792.

The court first overruled the plea in bar; and afterwards Chancellor MATHEWS delivered the decree of the *court as follows: As this is a case of considerable importance the court would have taken longer time to consider it, had there been any difficulty in our minds with respect to the decision, we ought to give; but as we think it a very plain case, when stripped of all the extraneous matter that has been introduced, in the course of the arguments on it, we are as well prepared now as we should be at any future day to decide on it. The most important point in the case is, whether the purchase by Mr. M'Kenzie, of the land in question, and the titles from the Sheriff to him, vests in him such a right, as he cannot now be divested of. If the purchase was a fair bona fide and unconditional one, it then could admit of no doubt, because the titles are so drawn as to vest an absolute estate in M'Kenzie, of the whole interest that was in Denton. The court must therefore proceed with great caution, when they are called on to divest a man of such a right; especially too, when the evidence offered for this purpose, is one article in an account rendered by defendant to complainant charging him with the purchase money for the land, and this is to be corroborated by parol testimony. With regard to the first point: The words of the statute of frauds are "That no action shall be brought whereby to charge any person on any contract or sale of lands, or any interest therein, unless the agreement on which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith," &c. Is the account then, signed and delivered by defendant, in which he has charged the complainant with the consideration money for the purchase of the land, such a memorandum or note in writing, signed by the party to be charged therewith, as will take this case out of the statute, and let the complainant in to a full investigation of the whole transaction relative to the purchase by defendant? We have already by overruling the plea in bar, determined that the article in the account above mentioned, ought to be considered as such a note, as is sufficient to comply with the true intent and spirit of the law, which is meant to prevent, and not to protect fraud. This difficulty be*ing removed, and the case standing on its intrinsic merits, we are next to consider, whether the parol evidence which has been admitted in corroboration of the written evidence amounts to such a proof of an intended trust on the part of defendant for the benefit of complainant, as this court will enforce the execution of, notwithstanding the absolute conveyance to the defendant. The complainant by his bill expressly charges that such was the intention at the time of the sale. The defendant by his answer positively denies it; recourse must then be had to the evidence to see whether it is sufficient to invalidate the answer of defendant. That such was the intention of the parties originally, is strongly evinced by the charge made by defendant in his account against complainant. If it was not so, why charge him with the money, which if the purchase was on his own account, unconnected with complainant ought to have been paid by himself, and in which the com plainant could have had no interest or concern? But it was said the defendant was ultimately obliged to pay the money; and that the part that is said to have been paid by complainant was not on account of the purchase of the land, but for a debt then owing by complainant to defendant. But Kennedy swears that he received £10. of the purchase money from complainant which is a strong circumstance that the purchase was not made by defendant on his own account. Yet he charges complainant with the whole purchase money, and even the liquor drank at the sale, or at some other time, when the land was to have been sold. That he was obliged afterwards to pay the purchase money will not alter the nature of the original purchase, because defendant had his remedy against complainant to compel him to a reimbursement; and his lien on the land was such as he could not have been ousted of, until he had been satisfied for his debt out of it. We will now take a view of the parol evidence. Mr. Kennedy who may be said to have been the vendor, swears, that he told complainant previous to the sale, that if he could get any friend to purchase the land for him, so as it was bid up to the amount of debt and costs on the execution on which it was sold he would *require no more. That it was accordingly bid off barely for the debt and costs by the defendant whom he considered as the confidential friend of complainant; and considered it as purchased by him for complainant. The next witness Mr. Parker, swears that he attended at the sale, as the friend of his brother, at whose suit the land was sold, and agreed also to the terms proposed by Kennedy to complainant; and that he was the next highest bidder to defendant, to whom it was knocked off; and that he considered the purchase to be on complainant's account. The next witness Mr. Grant, swears defendant desired him to purchase the land at the sale: he did not positively say for whom; but he understood that had he bought it, it was to have been on account of complainant. The next witness Mr. Cudworth, swears defendant told him he had complainant's property, meaning that in question, so much at his command, that he might do what he pleased with it, but that he was not so great a villain as to take such an advantage of him; he would give it up to him. Here is a long train of violent presumptive evidence, that the purchase was made by defendant for account and use of complainant: but that of Cudworth goes further; to him the defendant acknowledges the property to be complainant's and that he was not villain enough to defraud him of it. We do not consider the rules of evidence to go so great lengths as has been contended for; that is, that there must be two positive witnesses to contradict a fact denied by defendant in his answer: We think the rule is not so strict; but that if there is one positive witness and strong circumstantial evidence, amounting to violent presumption, especially in a case like the present, it is sufficient to destroy the testimony of defendant's answer. In one particular it is pointedly contradicted by two witnesses. He says it was at the first sale that the lease for ten years was produced by him: but Kennedy and another declared it was at the second; and we think if ever there was a case in which this court ought to be induced to give the most liberal construction to the above rule, it is in the present case, otherwise justice would become a mere ignis fatuus, it might be sought *after, but would never be substantially obtained. What is the conduct of the defendant on the present occasion? After every appearance of an intention of purchasing a valuable property of another person, in order to befriend that person, and the company present at the sale being impressed with such an idea, decline bidding on the ostensible friend of an unfortunate man, that he might get back his property at the easiest possible rate: That when he has so possessed himself of it, at a twelfth part of its real worth (as Neilson says he offered £600. for it and they asked £1200.) got the titles in his own name, in order to vest the property absolutely in himself, and now sets up this title to secure the same to himself and endeavour to shield himself under a statute intended to prevent such nefarious practices, is such a degree of hardiness, and such an attempt to pervert the true scope and beneficial effects of that law, as must ever receive the frowns of this court. We have been induced to admit evidence in this case, that in many others we must have rejected: And why? Because (we are sorry we are obliged to say so) there is such a badge of fraud imprinted on the very front of this transaction, as called loudly on us to give the latitude to the evidence produced on this occasion, which we now do; for if we should not, true justice could not be come at. It is an observation that has been frequently made, that the rules of evidence at law, and in this court are the same. There was a time in which this observation would have applied, but we well know that even so long ago as the time of lord Harcourt, and since him that great luminary of the law of equity lord Hardwicke, who was the first chancellor that reduced the principles of this court to a regular system, for the furtherance of justice, was obliged to declare, and so declaring to determine, that although at law fraud must be proved, yet in this court it will be presumed; and on this principle has this court ever since acted. If then fraud might be here presumed, how well warranted are we in saying, that in this case it is not only to be presumed from most part of the evidence before us, but from some parts it has also been proved. Lord Harcourt goes still *farther, and says either suppressio veri or suggestio falsi is each of them a good reason to set aside any deed or conveyance. In the present case both of these reasons strongly apply; for here there is a suppressio veri, in the defendant's attempting to conceal the purposes for which the purchase was made. There is also suggestio falsi, because his answer is positive that it was on his own account and no other that the purchase was made; both of which are contradicted by sufficient evidence. It is also well known to be laid down in many of the books, that this court will lay hold of almost any circumstance to prevent a fraud, so odious is every approach of such conduct viewed here.

*297

*298

*299

*300

*301

The case of Oliphant and Singleton has been quoted, but we do not think it any ways analogous to the principal case, for in that there was not the least suggestion of fraud. The case of Dalzel v. Timrod, was where a deed of conveyance was made to Catharine M'Infuss; and parol evidence was brought to prove that the intention of the donor was to convey to Catharine M'Infuss the elder: but the donor being a minor and there not being the least appearance of overreaching or fraud attempted, the donor too being dead, we thought it too much to set aside so solemn a deed on this parol evidence: That it was intended to one person, but by mistake was made in the name of another. As to the deed of the 5th of August, 1788, purporting to be a sale of complainant's lease for ten years to defendant of the premises in question, as little or no notice has been taken of it by the counsel in argument, but the whole stress has been laid on the Sheriff's titles, it is unnecessary for us to say any more on it, than that had the creditors of the complainant been before this court, to pray relief against this deed, we should then have thought it necessary to give some opinion on it; but as things are, let it sleep till called for, if any one should think it worth while to do so. From a full view and deep consideration of the whole case, we are of opinion that the attempt now made by the defendant to reserve to himself the absolute property in the land in question, deserves no other epithet than that of *a gross fraud and imposition on a too credulous man; and were we to pursue the rigid rules of this court, we would make no other decree than a conveyance of the land to the complainant, and leave the defendant to his remedy at law for any demands he may have against the complainant: but as we do not consider complainant as blameless in some other parts of the transaction, we will proceed to consider the other parts of the pleadings and evidence before us. The defendant's account shews that there has been considerable dealings between him and complainant, and there appears to be a large balance due him on that account; so does his answer. The evidence of Grant and Cudworth also proves that the objection on the part of defendant to restore the complainant's property, was that he might be indemnified out of it for what complainant owed him. We will not therefore deprive him of his lien on the property; but let the accounts be referred to the master to enquire into and finally adjust and settle the same, and report accordingly. That the defendant in the mean time hold the land as a security for what might be found due to him, but as a trustee only for complainant until the further order of this court: and to enable the master more readily to adjust the accounts, we direct him to allow complainant the rent agreed for by the lease of the 8th of August, 1788, for the time therein specified.

*302

---

1 Desaus. 302

Case LXXVIII.

Present—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

HOPKINS v. WAINWRIGHT, Executor of WAINWRIGHT.

(September, 1792.)

[Executors and Administrators ⇐288.]

Demurrer by an executor to a bill filed for an account of the estate by a legatee (whose legacy was not yet due) was overruled. The court said that on a charge of wasting the assets this would require an account and oblige executor to secure the legacy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1147; Dec. Dig. ⇐288.]

After hearing argument in this case, Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court as follows: The defendant has demurred because the bill does not contain matter of equity sufficient to establish any right or demand against him. What is a demurrer? It is an allegation of the defendant which (admitting the matters of fact alleged by the bill to be true as they are therein set *forth) insists they are insufficient for plaintiff to oblige defendant to answer—Let us see whether this demurrer can be supported. The bill charges that the defendant's testator left complainant legacies to be paid out of monies, bonds, treasury indents, &c.—which legacies should be placed at interest and paid when complainant should attain twenty-one years of age, or day of marriage. That after testator's death the defendant possessed himself of all the bonds, &c.—never returned an inventory of the estate or any schedule of money, &c.—and never rendered an account of his administration: That judgments to a considerable amount have been obtained against him: That as the greatest part of estate the defendant possessed was originally the testator's, it is but reasonable the legacies should be secured out of bonds of the testator, or by a specific lien on his estate prior to the creditors of defendant: That he has refused to render an account to complainant or to secure the legacies—The bill therefore prays a discovery of assets, how he has disposed of them, and that he may be compelled to pay the legacies, or assign over bonds for that purpose. If these alleged facts are true, which the demurrer admits—Is there any foundation for supporting the demurrer? Although the complainant may not be entitled to immediate possession of the legacies, yet it is the business of this court on application to see that the executor secures them agreeable to the testator's directions. It was never doubted that this court had authority to call executors to an account; and to require and enforce a faithful administration of the assets of the testator. It is true the probate of wills, and the return of inventories is within the peculiar jurisdiction of ecclesiastical court: and the defendant might be called on there to do it: but that court cannot enforce obedience to its decrees in so compulsory a manner, nor give such complete and effectual remedy as this court can. This court will not arbitrarily interpose its authority by obliging executors to give security, they being appointed by testator himself, and undoubtedly in his confidence: but it is suggested that he is wasting the assets, and persons interested are likely to be injured. There *can be no doubt of the power of the court to interfere: and though it might not in the present case perhaps take the property out of the executor's hands, yet it will take care that he secures the legacies so that complainant may receive them when they shall become due or payable. The demurrer was overruled; and the defendant ordered to answer.

*303

*304

---

1 Desaus. 304

Case LXXIX.

Present—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

THOMAS SMITH and A. BONSALL v. the Executors of G. SMITH, Who was the Executor of A. Smith.

(September, 1792.)

[Executors and Administrators ⇐158.]

Executor's estate made liable for the value of the estate of testator sold by him without authority—and also made liable for the securities which might prove defective.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Evans v. Evans' Ex'rs, 1 Desaus. 520; Trescot v. Trescot, 1 McCord, Eq. 432.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 646½; Dec. Dig. ⇐158.]

The bill in this case was filed to make the estate of G. Smith liable for the value of the personal estate of A. Smith, which it was alleged he had improperly sold during the revolutionary war, without authority under the will of his testator. The bill charged that the will not only gave no direct authority to sell, but on the contrary directed that the personal estate, after certain specific and pecuniary bequests to the widow of the testator, should be equally divided between the two children of the testator: That the will also authorized the executor to lay out the monies growing out of his estate, for the advantage of testator's children: That the executor without applying to the court of chancery and without any necessity to justify it, disposed at public sale of all the personal estate: and omitted to take good security for some of the purchases: and did not take bond from some of the purchasers for two years after the sale, when the depreciation of the currency had rendered the money of little value: and omitted to sue or procure good security on the bonds of those who were known to be in bad circumstances.

There are no traces of the proofs or of the arguments in this case; but Chancellor MATHEWS made the following entry on his brief: It was "decreed that G. Smith, the executor of A. Smith having sold the estate of the *testator, without any authority under the will, or otherwise, do account to complainants for the amount sales, except so much thereof as was directed by the will of A. Smith to be borrowed to pay his widow's legacy; as it was immaterial whether the executor sold to pay the legacy, or borrowed for that purpose, as it must have been paid at last: and as the estate was not sufficiently productive to do so out of the profits, a sale must ultimately have been had recourse to. And if any of the securities taken for the sales should prove defective, the estate of the executor G. Smith must be accountable, he having acted illegally in the sale thereof."

*305

---

1 Desaus. 305

Case LXXX.

LENNOX and Wife v. W. H. GIBBES.

(June, 1792.)

[Husband and Wife ⟸29.]

The act for recording marriage settlements is so obscurely worded that the court would not enlarge its application but restricted it to the very terms used in the law, and pronounced that part of the act was unintelligible and inoperative.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Cheney v. Lubbock, 1 Nott & McC. 451; Garner v. Garner's Ex'rs, 1 Desaus. 414; Croft v. Arthur, 3 Desaus. 233, 234.

For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 158-168, 205, 882; Dec. Dig. ⟸29.]

[Husband and Wife ⟸29.]

[The statute of March 8, 1785, in relation to the recording of marriage settlements, applies, so far as the neglect to comply therewith is rendered penal, only to settlement subsequently entered into.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 167; Dec. Dig. ⟸29.]

Chancellor HUTSON delivered the decree of the court:

The bill prays an injunction to stay proceedings at law. The decree in this case must be grounded altogether on the construction to be given to a law of this state passed on the 8th of March, 1785; entitled "an act, to oblige all persons interested in marriage deeds and contracts to record them in the Secretary's Office of this state." The first clause of this act is merely directory or prescriptive, viz. That all marriage settlements then existing should be recorded within a limited time. The second is to the same effect, respecting such as should be thereafter entered into, within the state. The third clause is the only one which contains a penalty for neglecting or refusing to record such marriage deed, settlement, or contract as therein recited: In which clause the word such, must be considered as a relative, and by every rule of grammatical construction must be confined to that clause as its antecedent. Upon our first perusal of the act, we were led to imagine that there must have been an error in the printing of it, and that we might have all doubt on the subject removed, we thought it advisable to procure a certified copy of the original act as ratified and *recorded from the Secretary's Office, and we found it verbatim et literatim the same as the printed copy. Having ascertained this fact, we proceeded to consider the act by all the rules and principles, grammatical and legal, which are made use of in the construction of laws; and we find the several parts or clauses so disjointed, unconnected and independent of each other, that we cannot presume to say whether the Legislature meant to extend the penalty to the two preceding clauses or not; and to add words to give the law a different construction from what it at present admits of, would be to exercise legislative power, which we certainly have no right to do. We must therefore take the law as we find it, and our decisions are to be governed by it as it is. We observe further that the people of every free country are to be governed by the laws as they are promulgated to them. Every law therefore to enforce due obedience to its mandates, ought to be clear, precise and determinate, so as that he that reads it may understand it: But in the present case it is exactly the reverse. To enforce therefore such a law would be to entrap and ensnare not only the ignorant and unwary, but the most wise and prudent citizens in the state; and it would be infinitely preferable that every mischief intended to have been remedied by the law should ensue, rather than so dangerous a principle should be countenanced in our jurisprudence. It has been contended at the bar, that as the law was intended for the benefit of creditors, who are always favoured in this court, it ought to receive the most enlarged, liberal and beneficial construction for them. That creditors ought to be and are always favoured in this court there can be no doubt, and the construction contended for might have been in the contemplation of the Legislature when framing the law, but as we have already observed, we cannot render that perfect and effective, which is imperfect and defective. And there is another rule equally incontrovertible which applies here, and which we must pay due regard to; that is, that penal laws are to be strictly construed in this, as well as in the courts of common law. The opinion of lord keeper

*306

*307

Somers in the *case of Taylor and Wheeler in Vernon 565, on this point, is in these words: "It would be too hard to extend a penal law in a court of equity to the prejudice of the plaintiff," &c. &c. The principle here laid down is very applicable to the present case, for could the law have operated as has been contended for, it certainly would have been highly penal on the present complainants. On the whole of the case, we are of opinion that the law is so grossly defective and imperfect, that we cannot think ourselves warranted under it, to decree the penalty against the parties interested in the marriage settlement now in question, for not having recorded the same, so as to subject the property thereby intended to be secured for their benefit, to the debts contracted by the complainant James Lennox, any otherwise than as he may be entitled to the profits thereof.

It is therefore decreed, That the injunction quoad the principal† of the property contained in the said settlement be made perpetual, and that each party pay their own costs.

† As far as the husband was entitled to the profits, they were considered and made liable to his debts.

1 Desaus. 307

Case LXXXI.

Present—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

JOB COLCOCK v. PIERCE BUTLER.

(September, 1792.)

[Specific Performance ⇐100.]

The court will not decree the specific performance of a contract for the purchase of a house, where the seller has not complied with the terms, by having the buildings completed within the stipulated time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 309; Dec. Dig. ⇐100.]

[Specific Performance ⇐95.]

[A lis pendens to foreclose a mortgage is not notice to a previous purchaser of the mortgaged premises, as between him and the mortgagor.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 276; Dec. Dig. ⇐95.]

This was a bill filed by the complainant to compel the specific performance of a contract whereby defendant agreed to purchase two houses in Charleston from the complainant at a valuation. The complainant states that he purchased lots in town which cost him £2200. on which he erected houses which cost him £3700.—That he afterwards, on the 20th April, 1786, contracted with major Butler for the purchase of a plantation on John's Island, at the price of £5000. sterling; now not saleable at more than £1000.—On this amount the defendant has judgment at law against the complainant. That in July, 1787, *the complainant was desirous to make a substantial payment to major Butler, (who had no security to the bonds) and for that purpose agreed with his attornies to convey the house and lots abovementioned to him. and the attornies Mr. Rutledge and Mr Payne, who it is charged had full powers, agreed to accept the same at a valuation to be made by indifferent men, in payment to major Butler: The unfinished house to be finished within three months in the same manner as the first house: That two persons Mr. Toomer and Mr. Eveleigh were chosen to value them; who did so at £7100.—That major Butler was advised of these transactions, and acquiesced in them, and directed Mr. Payne to sell the houses on his account, and he accordingly called on Mr. Colcock (in his character of Vendue Master) to advertise them for sale, and they were put up for sale as the property of major Butler, but were not actually sold, for defect of bidders: That the complainant exerted himself to finish the house according to the agreement, but the difficulty of getting workmen and materials prevented his completely finishing the work for about six months, though the material parts were done much earlier: That the complainant was willing to pay rent during the short delay of finishing the building—But that the defendant availing himself of that delay, refuses to comply with the contract. The bill prayed for specific performance of the agreement.

*308

The defendant by his answer denies that the power of attorney gave his attornies such power as was charged: That it was nothing more than a common printed power with authority to receive and pay monies and institute suits: That however rather than that his acting attorney Mr. Payne should be a sufferer for exceeding his powers, he was determined to submit to a moderate loss: and expecting that Colcock would perform his part of the agreement he wrote a letter acquiescing in the agreement; though he was then aware that it was not binding on him. The defendant also afterwards offered to ratify the agreement if the appraisers would themselves become the purchasers from him at £500. less than the appraisement: That the defendant never received any of the rents: *That the complainant must have supposed the bargain to have been at an end, as he gave in the spring of 1789, an order to repay out of the rents of the said houses, monies which were absolutely loaned to him by the defendant. And the building could not have been finished in six months, as Colcock borrowed £46. of defendant a year after the contract to glaze and finish it off: That defendant must have considered the bargain at an end and the property his own, for he went to the expense of a slated roof; and he advertised the house for sale as the property of the estate of Vanderhorst (from whom complainant had purchased it, and mortgaged it back) and complainant made a payment on his debt to defendant on the John's Island purchase, which was unnecessary if this contract was subsisting.

*309

At the hearing of this case it appeared from Mr. Payne's testimony, that the power of attorney was a common power to receive and pay money; and gave no special power to purchase houses.—But that major Butler unwilling that his attorney should suffer for exceeding his powers wrote a letter acquiescing in his conduct, and gave orders to Mr. Payne to have the houses sold: That it was Colcock's own proposition to finish the houses in three months; that is, sometime in November: That on the receipt of the letter of the 28th August, 1787, from major Butler, he, Payne, called on Colcock and informed him of it. On the 19th October, 1787, the advertisement for the sale of the houses took place —But they would not bring the price they were valued at, and major Butler had desired that they should not be sold under the appraisement: The witness did receive several small payments of rent—one of £5 and two of £7. 10s. each at different times, before the arrival of major Butler. He supplied complainant with £46. in July, 1788. Major Butler at first said he would pay the £1000. penalty; afterwards he said he would avail himself of Mr. Colcock's not having complied with the agreement.—Mr. Colcock said there was another agreement in which £5575. was to be given. Witness did not understand the agreement was conditional. Both parties broke the verbal agreement—*Did not know that any deduction was to be made from the price of the plantation. The mortgage of the houses by Colcock to Vanderhorst's estate was foreclosed in December, 1789, and the property sold.

*310

Mr. Rutledge testified that he was satisfied the power did not extend to give the attornies the authority they exercised.

Mr. Toomer proved the valuation.

Mr. Donaldson said he was well acquainted with the houses, they were finished in a plain manner.

Major Bocquet bought the property at the sale (under the mortgage) for £4000.

Mr. Ford for the complainant, argued that there was a fair and regular contract by which the defendant was bound, and the court ought to decree a specific execution. There was no pretence of unfairness. It was made openly, and the price fixed by indifferent third persons of unimpeached character, chosen by the parties, and well versed in such matters. Then as to the power:—If the attornies had not full authority, major Butler confirmed their contract by a letter, and even authorized one of them to sell the houses on his account. This was communicated to Colcock who rested satisfied therewith, and took no steps to obtain a purchaser for the property, which was his main object, to enable him to pay for the plantation; and upon the faith of that agreement he went on to make expensive finishings to the houses which he might not otherwise have gone into: That the attorney of major Butler actually offered the houses for sale as his property, and received part of the rents: That the only pretence on which the contract could be shaken, is that one of the houses was not entirely finished within three months as agreed upon. It was substantially finished and wanted only the ornamental finishing which was done in about six months. That this defect in point of time is not regarded in such contracts—It is not deemed material; for compensation could be made in rent for such time as it was untenantable. That if the valuation was a high one, property having fallen considerably since, the same could be said of the plantation purchased *by Colcock from Butler: It was bought at a price far greater than could be obtained now, (as appeared by the evidence)—That it would be most unequal and therefore inequitable that whilst the complainant Colcock should be held to his purchase, which indeed he did not contest, that the other party should be released from his contract, when both stood on the same ground, to wit: That both had agreed to give large prices for property which had since fallen greatly in price. The equity then of the parties is equal; and it would be very hard to hold one of them bound and the other absolved. The offer of the house, and the sale was expressly to meet the debt on the purchase of the land. It was alleged that the houses not being finished in time, major Butler could not sell them. But he did not wait for the time to expire. He ordered his agent to sell the houses immediately, even before the three months were elapsed. See 1 P. Wms. 61, 542. 1 Bro. C. C. 26, 440, 785. The case of Cass v. Ruddele, 2 Vern. 280, is strongly in point. See also 2 Vern. 423. When an agreement is performed in part by one party, it is too late for the other to get off. See 4 Bro. P. C. Though the vendor does not tender conveyances in the time limited in the articles the court will not regard the neglect; but will still decree a specific performance. 1 Atk. 12, Gibson v. Patterson. The insertion of a penalty in the articles of agreement will never prevent the court from decreeing specific execution.—2 Atk. 371, Howard v. Hopkins. Letters by a man to his agent, are good evidence against him to establish an agreement. 3 Atk. 503, Welford v. Beasly. Colcock might have recovered the £1000. penalty at law from Butler, and Butler might have recovered as much damage from Colcock, as he could shew he sustained by the house not being finished in time. 1 Lord Raym. 124, 420. See 1 Vesey 258 and 444. The repairing or finishing the house was not a condition precedent. See 1 Vern. 83, 167, 222. 2 Vern. 366. Upon every principle then of contract, of equity, of equality, complainant was entitled to a decree for the specific execution of this agreement.

*311

*312

*General Pinckney for defendant, contended that the power of attorney in common form, gave no authority to purchase lands; and that if, by the letter of the defendant, in which from delicacy to his attornies, who had exceeded their powers, he acquiesced in the agreement made for him by them with the complainant, he had a right to require that the terms should be strictly complied with. That by the agreement the unfinished house was to have been finished in three months—But it was not finished in six months; and indeed not fully for a twelvemonth. This was a real disadvantage to defendant. If finished he might have sold, as it was his intention to do. But he could not sell, and real estate meantime fell rapidly in price. The payment of rent by complainant would be no equivalent for the fall of price. But in fact no rent had been paid by Colcock and defendant himself never received any rent. That the court would more readily forbear to exercise its extraordinary power of decreeing the specific execution of contracts, under such circumstances of error and hardship. That the price agreed upon to be given by his attornies was excessive: and defendant offered to ratify the agreement if the appraisers would give in bonds £500. less than the appraisement; which they refused. That the complainant himself conceived the bargain was at an end, for he gave in the spring of 1789, an order to repay out of the rents of the said houses monies which were loaned him by the defendant. He also covered it with a slated roof which was far more expensive than a shingled roof. He was not bound to do this by the agreement. His doing so is an additional evidence that he considered the agreement at an end—And he also made a payment on his debt for the John's Island land, which would have been unnecessary, if he had relied on this agreement—And finally he advertised the house for sale, as belonging to the estate of Vanderhorst (from whom Colcock had bought it) which he would not have done if he had considered the agreement binding and subsisting. That specific execution of a contract is an equity—and parol evidence will be admitted to rebut an equity. It will be received to shew that a written agree*ment has been waived in part, or in whole or varied in the terms by a subsequent parol agreement. Powel on Contr. 427. 6 Bro. P. C. 580. Where a bargain is made and all the parties consent to dissolve it, and other conditions are proposed, the new agreement destroys the former bargain. 2 Mod. Rep. 243. For new agreement see 4 Burr. 2483. In Gorman v. Salisbury, 1 Vern. 240, a bill for specific execution was dismissed, a new and a different agreement being shewn. So in Legal and Miller, 2 Vesey 299—and in another case, by the master of the rolls. 2 Vesey, 376.

*313

Where one party has trifled or shewn a backwardness in complying with his part of the agreement, equity will consider this a good objection to decreeing a specific execution in his favor, especially if circumstances are altered, in the mean time—2 Powell on Contr. 260. 1 Bro. P. C. 27. 5 Viner, 538. See also 2 Burr. 1012. Moses v. M'Farlane. A party seeking specific execution of a contract must shew that he has performed all that was contracted to be done on his part, to entitle him to a specific performance. 2 Powell on Contr. 19, 20, 21, 26. The rule of all agreements is, that they must be performed on all hands.

When a bill was filed by the representatives of Vanderhorst's estate to foreclose the equity of redemption in these houses and lots, the defendant Butler was not made a party, as he ought to have been, if he was interested. Hinde 151. Colcock was made defendant—he did not demur to the bill of foreclosure, and thus admitted that the equity of redemption was in him. See Hinde 158. 2 Atk. 51, Ashhurst v. Eyre, and Plunket v. Penson.

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court:

This was a bill for specific performance of a contract to accept of two houses at a valuation. The confirmation of defendant by letter legalized his attorney's contract, so far as to make it an executory contract. This court will in some cases relieve, even where there is a penalty, and decree a specific performance. In this case it appears on the face of the agreement, that one *of the houses which was unfinished, was to be finished by complainant within three months; whereas it appeared by the evidence that it was not finished for eleven months. The court will in some instances relieve against lapse of time, but this was immoderate; and the property rapidly depreciating. All the cases respecting compensation relate to instances where compensation can be precisely ascertained. The rent would not be complete compensation for the great decline in the value of the property. Indeed it is impossible to ascertain it. It is a case sounding in damages and not for this court. If the house had been finished according to contract, it might have been sold before the great fall of price. Perhaps the unfinished state of it prevented offers. Besides, the complainant gave no notice to the defendant of the bill filed for the foreclosure of the mortgage on the houses, for the debt due by complainant to Vanderhorst. The lis pendens is not notice in such a case as this; he should have had actual notice.—Complainant acted as owner of the houses, received rents, &c. But the court thinks the immoderate laches of the complainant in finishing the house is alone sufficient to bar complainant from relief in this case. Defendant early after his return refused to comply with the contract; yet the complainant never filed his bill for four years after, and till the property was greatly depreciated. When sold under mortgage, the property did not bring half the sum the defendant contracted for. The complainant must be left to his remedy at law.

*314

Desaussure and Ford for complainant—Gen. Pinckney for defendant.—Bill dismissed with costs.

---

1 Desaus. 314

Case LXXXII.

Present—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

LADSON and ROSE v. WARD and BLAKE, Executors of F. Rose.

(March, 1793.)

[Wills ⟸714.]

A father bequeaths legacies to the children of a deceased son: This shall not be construed to be in satisfaction of a debt due by the father to the son's estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1698, 1699; Dec. Dig. ⟸714.]

[Wills ⟸139.]

[Cited in Beresford v. Elliott's Ex'rs, 1 Desaus. 189, to the point that in the construction of a will the court is governed by the intention of the testator.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 952, 955, 957; Dec. Dig. ⟸139.]

This was a bill filed for the recovery of certain legacies, and the settlement of an estate in the hands of the executors.

*315

*There were many points disputed in this case, but they were chiefly questions of fact, and of account, and involved no point of any importance but one. It was as follows: Francis Rose, the father of Thomas Rose, was indebted to the latter on a stated account, appearing on the son's books. After the son's death, the father got possession of the books and papers of his son; and at his own death he left them in the condition he found them, the charge open and subsisting. He bequeathed several legacies to his grand children, the children of his son Thomas.

It was contended for the complainants, who were interested in the father's estate, that these legacies were given in satisfaction of the debt above mentioned.

The court however stated, that it could not discover any thing like an intention in the testator to give the legacies to his grand children in satisfaction of this debt to his son; nor any design to make the legacies conditional, and to depend upon the executor of the son releasing the debt due by the father to the son's estate. That unless there had appeared an intention in the testator to do this, the court would not raise such a presumption. For the doctrine that legacies were generally supposed to be bequeathed in satisfaction of pre-existing debts (which had many limitations) could not have any application to this case. The debt due by the father was to the son's estate—the legacies were to the grand children—they were in distinct rights—creditors, and perhaps legatees of the son, might have an interest in the son's estate, so that the executors of the son could not properly release the debt. The court therefore decreed in favor of the legacies to the grand children, without considering the same to be in satisfaction of the debt.

---

1 Desaus. 315

Case LXXXIII.

Present—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

The Executors of SHUBRICK v. N. RUSSELL, Executor of Livingston.

(March, 1793.)

[Principal and Surety ⟸109.]

A security is not released from his liability by the obligee taking collateral security, and even indulging that security.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Green's Ex'rs v. Warrington, 1 Desaus. 433; Providence Mach. Co. v. Browning, 70 S. C. 155, 49 S. E. 325.

For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. § 219; Dec. Dig. ⟸109.]

[Equity ⟸43.]

[Cited in Lee v. Waring, 3 Desaus. 66; Susong v. Vaiden, 10 S. C. 255, 30 Am. Rep. 50, to the point that, where one of the obligors in a joint bond died leaving the surviving obligors insolvent, a court of equity has jurisdiction of a suit against the representatives of the deceased obligor, for satisfaction of the bond, since, the bond being joint, the only remedy at law would be against the survivors.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 130; Dec. Dig. ⟸43.]

[Equity ⟸117.]

[After answer the defendant cannot object that a person jointly liable with him is not made a party. Such objection should be taken by plea or demurrer.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 289; Dec. Dig. ⟸117.]

[Principal and Surety ⟸163.]

[The obligee having given time on collateral security, the court, on decreeing payment by the surety and a transfer of the collateral security to him, extended the time of payment in accordance with that of the collateral security.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. § 446; Dec. Dig. ⟸163.]

[Principal and Surety ⟸168.]

[The fact that one of the obligors in a joint bond is a surety does not affect his liability to the obligee, so as to make it incumbent upon the obligee to proceed against the principal in the first instance.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. § 471; Dec. Dig. ⟸168.]

The complainants' bill stated that Abraham Livingston, together with Stacey Hepburn, now deceased, and J. *Dorsius, were jointly bound unto complainants' testator, Thomas Shubrick, by their two several bonds, bearing date the 30th July 1779, in the penal sum of £290.000 of the then currency, conditioned for the payment of £145.000 like money, on the first day of January 1780, with interest from the date. That before the said bonds became payable, to wit, in August 1779, their testator died, having first duly executed his will, whereof he appointed the complainants' executors, who qualified on the said will. That Stacey Hepburn died some years since in the state of Pennsylvania or New York insolvent; and that the said Abraham Livingston died in 1780, in affluent circumstances, and of his will appointed Nathaniel Russell executor, who has alone qualified thereon, and possessed himself of property belonging to the said Abraham Livingston more than sufficient to pay all his debts. That John Dorsius is and has been for many years past insolvent—that as the said bonds with interest thereon remain unpaid, your orators applied to the said Nathaniel Russell to discharge the same, but he having refused to do so, they applied to an attorney at law to compel the payment thereof. That the said attorney discovering that the bonds were joint bonds, and not joint and several, applied to the attorney of said N. Russell, informed him thereof, and requested to know whether he would waive the objection which in strictness of law he might insist on from the said bonds being joint, or whether he would compel complainants to seek their remedy in the court of equity; but the said N. Russell insisted that complainants should pursue their remedy in equity, alleging that it appears from indorsements on the bonds that a bond of John M'Queen was received by your orators, which if paid was to go to the exoneration of Abraham Livingston's bond, and charging moreover the complainants with having neglected to recover the amount of the said J. M'Queen's bond, and inferring from thence that the loss should fall on the estate of complainants' testator, and that Abraham Livingston's estate should be freed from the debt—whereas, the complainants insist that the bonds of the said John M'Queen was intended by the parties to be received as a collateral security, and not as *an absolute payment. That very shortly after the said bond was given, the said J. M'Queen withdrew to the state of Georgia, from thence he went to Europe, returned again to Georgia, and there remained until he withdrew with his property to Saint Augustine. That frequent applications were made to the said John M'Queen for payment whilst he was in Georgia, but from the disturbed state of all money transactions from the time the said bond was given until the said John M'Queen went off to East Florida, it was impracticable to enforce the payment, and the complainants insist that they used more diligence for the receipt of the money than they were bound to do.—The complainants therefore pray that the said N. Russell may true answer make to all and singular the matters and things in bill charged; that he may admit assets, and be compelled by decree of the court of equity to pay what may appear to be justly due them.

*316

*317

The defendant admits that his testator the said Abraham Livingston, deceased, did join with one John Dorsius as the securities of Stacey Hepburn in the bonds in bill mentioned, which said bonds were given to secure the purchase money of a certain plantation or tract of land situate on Santee river, sold by the said Thomas Shubrick, deceased, to the said Stacey Hepburn, and that the complainants are the qualified and acting executors of the said Thomas Shubrick, deceased, whom he believes to have died at the time, and made the will in bill mentioned. That this defendant is the qualified and acting executor of the said Abraham Livingston, and is possessed of the assets belonging to his testator's estate. That John Dorsius is at present generally thought to be insolvent, but the defendant positively asserts that he has been informed, and believes that Stacey Hepburn in bill mentioned, is still alive and resident in the state of Pennsylvania or New-York. Defendant admits that application was made to his attorney to permit an action to be instituted against him as executor aforesaid at common law, and that the same has been refused, founded on a conviction that complainants' demand is illegal, and that their conduct had long since discharged his testator's estate *from all responsibility as joint obligor or security to the bonds in bill mentioned: for defendant swears that he was not only ignorant of the negotiation entered into between Mr. Hepburn and the complainants with respect to John M'Queen's bond, but never knew or heard of the existence of Livingston's bond, now attempted to be set up, until some time in the month of June last, when he received a letter from Thomas Shubrick, one of the complainants, a copy whereof is filed with the bill. The defendant admits that he refuses to pay any part of the bond in bill mentioned, and trusts that the honourable court will discharge his testator's estate from all demands on account thereof; for that independently of complainants' neglect to use diligence to recover the debt in the first instance of Stacey Hepburn, (instead of accepting of John M'Queen's bonds, and afterwards neglecting to pursue like measures with due diligence to recover the money due by John M'Queen, by which the same is said to be lost) if application had been made to his testator in his life time after the said bonds became due, it was always in his power either to have discharged the same, or to have indemnified himself by retaining the amount: for that in March 1780, near three months after the said bonds were due, Mr. Livingston paid to Stacey Hepburn for the purchase of the very land bought by him of Mr. Shubrick £500,000 of the then currency: And that even at the time that the complainants took upon themselves to accept of John M'Queen's bond, as is in bill set forth, Mr. Hepburn was in good circumstances, and fully adequate to the payment of his debt: or had the complainant then made known to defendant the existence of the said bonds, it was in his power to have secured his testator's estate against the same, as at the time John M'Queen's bonds were received from Mr. Hepburn, the estate of Mr. Livingston was still indebted to the latter in a sum nearly, if not equal to the amount of his securityship: And which, for want of information on the subject, this defendant has since paid or assumed to pay, as will appear by the testimony of several persons: or this defendant might have prevailed on Hepburn, who was then competent thereto, to give more *certain and effectual means of indemnifying his testator's estate, than what John M'Queen's bonds proved. That Dorsius (although he believes he is now insolvent) had resources soon after the war, he thinks to have answered the debt, if he had been timely resorted to, or might have contributed in part. The defendant submits to the decree that may be made, but prays that the estate of Livingston may be discharged.

*318

*319

This cause came to a hearing. John Price was examined as a witness: He stated that he went to Georgia in the year 1788, to settle some affairs with John M'Queen, and he offered him lands and negroes in payment.

Mr. Stirk proved that he forwarded to Mr. M'Queen in East Florida a statement of debts to the amount of £20,000 without including the interest; and that was not one half of his debts. M'Queen left Georgia for Florida in February 1791. The whole of his property was not nearly sufficient to pay his debts. The tender law of Georgia expired on the 14th August 1790.

Mr. Holmes and Mr. E. Rutledge for the complainants argued, that a person signing his name as security to a bond, makes no difference in his responsibility: He is as liable as the principal. The only use of a security so distinguishing himself on the bond is, that if he should be obliged to pay the debt, he may more easily shew his real character, and recover over from the principal. This was the opinion of the court of law in the case of Rivers v. Kennedy. The court said that either principal or security might be sued as they could be got at; the holder of the bond taking a collateral security, as was done in this case by taking M'Queen's bond, does not extinguish the original debt, or diminish the liability of the security. It is not a prejudice to him, but a benefit; and the renewal of that collateral bond, or taking a new for an old one, did not diminish the value of that collateral security.

Mr. Ward for the defendant insisted, that Mr. Livingston, the security for Hepburn, was discharged by the conduct of the creditor. Livingston became largely indebted by a purchase to Hepburn, and great payments were made by him, and afterwards by his executors down *to 1784. If the executors had been apprised of this demand, they could have protected Livingston's estate by reserving funds, instead of paying them away to Hepburn and his assignee Mr. Hazlehurst.

*320

No resort has been had to the principal Hepburn—but the principal ought to be first resorted to. See 2 P. Wms. 542. 1 Vern. 196. 2 Vernon, 393, 688, 3 Atk. 91. Dyer, 56. 2 Bro. C. C. 579, Nisbet v. Smith and others, which is a strong case to this point.

If two persons are jointly bound in a bond, and one dies, you cannot sue the executor of the deceased obligor, but must have recourse to the surviving obligor. 2 Bacon, 697. 2 Vern. 99.

Again, a person taking a collateral security, and it fails, he cannot come on a security in the original contract, having varied the nature of the debt. 2 Atk. 341. At all events, when the collateral security was taken in 1783, it should have been strictly pursued, and the money recovered. The bond debt of M'Queen might have been recovered, and Livingston the security exonerated. Instead of which, the old bond was given up to him, a new one taken, and the time of payment extended to 1785. In May 1784, Rose sold M'Queen's negroes to the amount of £5000, sterling, and other property; land was also sold. In 1785, he had still a large estate in lands and slaves, yet no steps were taken to recover the debt on bond which had been taken as a collateral security. In 1791, Mr. Shubrick saw him at Savannah, and still took no steps against him. It was the fault therefore of the executors of Shubrick that the debt from M'Queen was finally lost, and Livingston's estate ought to be exonerated.

Mr. Pringle for defendant argued, that joint obligors (as in this case) could not be made to pay more than their respective proportions, pari passu. 2 Ventris, 348. If three join in a bond, and one or two die, the obligation survives in the nature of joint tenants, and the surviving obligor only is liable. 2 Comyn's Digest, 318, 324. 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 93. 1 Vernon, 196. In the case of Rivers and Kennedy, (quoted on the other side) the bond was joint and several. Where a person has taken the bond of *another for, or as collateral to, a bond due to himself, he cannot sue the bond due him till he has shewn that he has used due diligence to recover the money from the collateral bond and has failed. See Domat. 377.

*321

General Pinckney for complainant said, no substantial objection can be made for want of parties to the bill, because the proper mode of objection would have been by demurrer or plea. But neither demurrer or plea could have had any effect, as the bill charges that one of the parties is without the limits of the state; and the complainant has a right to have recourse to those within the jurisdiction of the court. You may also take out a joint execution against several persons; but you may order the sheriff to levy on the property of either. See 2 Comyn's 323.

It is the duty of the obligor to make payment on the day the bond is due, and not of the obligee to demand payment. 3 Bacon, 693, 713. The obligee besides, could not demand payment of the principal when the bond fell due. The state was then in the hands of the enemy, and the courts of justice were shut up. This accounts for some of the delay in pursuing Hepburn. Afterwards he went away. 2 Atk. 31. 2 Ves. 371. Mr. Shubrick was not bound to take payment from M'Queen (on the collateral bond) in lands and negroes, as it seems his other creditors were obliged to do, which shews how difficult it was to get payments from him, and how little reliance could be placed on that collateral security. †

*322

*In March 1793, chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court.

This is a suit brought by the executors of an obligee, against the executors of a deceased joint obligor, the surviving obligor being insolvent. For the defendant it was contended, that he was not liable, because the bond being joint, the survivor alone is chargeable. At law, the obligee's only remedy is against the survivor alone. In equity, the obligee has a remedy, and an equitable, though not a legal lien (claim) on the estate of the deceased obligor. It is objected that the surviving obligor (who is out of the state) should have been made a party. If the defendant would take advantage of this omission, he should have pleaded or demurred for want of parties; but the defendant having answered, he cannot now take advantage of it. It is not denied by the answer that the surviving obligors are insolvent, and that one of them is out of the state, if he is not dead. The case is reduced to a single question, whether, as there is no legal remedy for the obligee, there is an equitable one: and undoubtedly there is—for though a joint obligation, the heirs and executors are bound by the bond, and must be answerable. It was also objected that the deceased (defendant's testator) was only a security to this bond, and was not liable, because the obligee had varied the original contract by taking a new security, whereby the original security was discharged. The facts are as follows: The debt on the original bond was due on the 1st of January, 1780; it was not paid. The enemy soon after got possession of the country, and did not evacuate it till December,

*323

1782. In March, 1783, *the legislature interposed and prevented suits being brought for recovery of debts, but permitted the demand of security. One of the obligors was insolvent, and defendant's testator, Livingston, was dead, and he had no representative here till 1784. The obligee was also dead, and his executor could not compel payment from Hepburn, another of the obligors. They did what

†What acts an obligee may do in favour of an obligor, without releasing the liability of another obligor, especially if he be only surety in the bond, and what will amount to a release, it requires some care to ascertain. It does seem to be established, that a creditor giving further time to the principal debtor for payment, without communicating with the security, releases the surety. See Nisbett v. Smith and others, decided by lord chancellor Thurlow, 2 Bro. C. C. 579, and Rees v. Berrington, decided by lord Loughborough, 2 Vesey jr. 540: and both are grounded on the decision of lord Hardwicke, in Skip v. Huey, in 3 Atk. 91, and even on much older cases.

Lord Eldon, in the case of Wright v. Simpson, 6 Vesey, 734, expressly agrees with these cases. But he seems to doubt whether there is any obligation, as between the obligee and the surety, of active diligence against the principal. He considered the surety as guarantee; and that it was his business to see that the principal pays the debt, and *not that of the creditor. The holder of the security may therefore, in general, exact payment of the surety. But in late cases, it has been decided, that the surety has a right to call on the creditor to do the most he can for his benefit. And some cases have gone one step further, and required the creditor to place the surety in his situation, provided there was no risk, delay, or expense to the creditor. See Cooke's bankrupt law, 211. 3 Bro. C. C. 237. 3 Vesey, 243.

*322

The subject however requires very critical examination. See the cases collected by Mr. Cooper, in his notes to Justinian's Institutes, 462, 3, 4, and 613. See too 6 Vesey, 805, 6, 7, ex parte Gifford. 10 Vesey, 409, 10, &c. ex parte Rushforth. See also 2 Vern. 608. 11 Vesey, 22. 14 Vesey, 160.

they deemed the next best thing, which was to demand security under the law from Hepburn. He prevailed upon Mr. M'Queen (then in possession of great property, and in high credit) to give his bond on the 30th of November, 1783, as additional collateral security for the debt; not as payment, or the original bonds would have been given up; and the receipts on them shew that they were not to be considered as discharged, until Mr. M'Queen's bond should be paid. This case is not therefore like Skip v. Huey in Atkins, for there the original bond was given up; nor like the case of Ratcliffe v. Graves, Vernon, 196, where the admon bond had been given up. The complainants in those cases did not obtain relief, the bonds having been cancelled. In the case before the court, the security is not changed nor varied; not destroyed, but strengthened.—The second bond from M'Queen was a consolidation of principal and interest, and complainant obtained a more substantial security, by taking an assignment of a mortgage of real estate. A new idea has prevailed lately, that the security is not liable for the debt, till measures are taken to recover the debt from principal. But this is erroneous. A case solemnly decided in the common pleas has recently settled that point. And moreover, that taking collateral security, will not discharge the original security to a bond. It would be a harsh doctrine to be established. There is some blame imputable to complainant for not apprising defendant of the transactions with the collateral security; but not so much as to make him lose his debt. He has done nothing to forfeit it. He pursued reasonable measures to recover from M'Queen, and could get nothing but some lands. Referred to the master to report what is due on the bonds, and it is decreed that the defendant do forthwith pay the amount. And that there*upon, the complainant assign to defendant the bond and mortgage taken from M'Queen as collateral security.—Defendant to pay the costs of this suit. Afterwards, the defendant petitioned the court for a re-hearing in the cause, which was granted; and after argument, chancellor Mathews delivered the following decree of the court:

*324

The petitioner complains, that the former decree made executor of Livingston liable without a previous enquiry, whether the assets in his hands were adequate or not. No suggestion was made at the former trial of any apprehended deficiency; but as it is now brought forward, the court is disposed to open the decree to let in the executor of Livingston, to shew the extent of assets in his hands. And as it now appears that the executor of Shubrick had extended the time of the payment of the bond of M'Queen, the collateral security, the court thinks it right to extend the credit to the executor of Livingston to the same periods. But the court cannot, after the renewed argument, on the petition for rehearing, see any ground to alter the first decree, as to the debt itself; either by releasing the estate of Livingston from the payment of any part thereof, or by restricting the liability of his estate to a mere contributory share.

It was decreed that the executor should submit the accounts of his administration of the estate to the master; and that he should pay out of the assets the amount of complainant's demand at certain periods fixed by the court.

---

1 Desaus. 324

Case LXXXIV.

Present—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

JOHN DRAYTON, for Himself and as Next Friend of His Sister Mary Drayton, an Infant, v. CHARLES DRAYTON and Others, Executors of John Drayton, Deceased.

(March, 1793.)

[Wills ⊂=551.]

A father devises and bequeaths certain estates, real and personal, to his son John, and directs that in case of the death of that son John under age, or without lawful issue, those estates should go to the testator's four surviving sons, or the survivor of them. After testator's death, one of his sons, William Henry, dies, leaving children. Then the son John dies under age, and without issue. The survivorship construed to relate to the death of the testator, and thus to let in the children of Wm. Henry, in order to give effect to the intent.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Swinton v. Legare, 2 McCord, Eq. 442, 443; Roundtree v. Roundtree, 26 S. C. 472, 473, 2 S. E. 474.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1188; Dec. Dig. ⊂=551.]

[Wills ⊂=627.]

[A devise to several persons, "to be equally divided between them," constitutes a tenancy in common, unless clearly qualified by other words in the will.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1454; Dec. Dig. ⊂=627.]

[Wills ⊂=497.]

[Cited in Addison v. Addison, 9 Rich. Eq. 67, to the point that grandchildren cannot take under a devise to children unless no children survive testator.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1080–1086; Dec. Dig. ⊂=497.]

[Wills ⊂=777.]

[Cited in Swinton v. Legare, 2 McCord, Eq. 445, to the point that, where there is a limitation over in a will to "survivors" and all but one die before testator, the legacy lapses.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 2003; Dec. Dig. ⊂=777.]

The bill states that John Drayton, grand father of the complainants, being seized and possessed of a large real *and personal estate, duly executed his last will on the 1st of May, 1779, and amongst other things devised several plantations, slaves, &c. to his youngest son John, then an infant, and his heirs: Provided, that if his said son John should die under age, and without lawful issue, that the lands given him (named Mount Pleasant) and the house in Broad-street, also given to him (but subject to a life estate in testator's widow) should be sold, and the money equally divided among his four surviving sons, William Henry, Charles, Glen and Thomas, or the survivors of them. And also, that in case the said John Drayton, the son, should die under age, and without issue, all his real and personal estate (not otherwise disposed of by the will) should be divided equally among his surviving brothers. The testator died in the month of June, 1779, leaving a widow and five sons, William Henry, Charles, Glen, Thomas and John, and two daughters, Ann and Susannah. That the eldest son William Henry died in the month of October, 1779, intestate, leaving two children, John and Mary, the complainants. That soon after William Henry's death, his youngest brother, John, died under age and without issue. The surviving brothers purchased for a valuable consideration all the rights of the widow of the testator in the estate of the testator.—That Charles, Glen, and Thomas Drayton, have sold the estates, devised to the younger brother, John, and have refused to allow complainants any part of the proceeds, alleging that they are not entitled to any part thereof, as their father, William Henry, died before the younger brother John. Complainants insist upon their right, and pray that defendants may be obliged to account to them for one fourth of the said estate, and for such other relief as they are entitled to. To this bill the defendants demurred, on the ground that the complainants were not entitled to any part of the said estates, as their father William Henry had died before the said son John; and the surviving brothers were entitled to the whole. So that there being no equity in the bill, they pray the bill may be dismissed.

*325

*326

*The defendants also filed an answer to the bill, in which they admitted all the facts alleged by the complainants. The defendants admitting all the facts charged in the complainants' bill, insist, that upon the death of their elder brother William Henry, and subsequently of their younger brother John, they were entitled under their father's will, as survivors, to all the estates devised and bequeathed to John. The defendants admit that they purchased all the widow's rights in the estate for about £3570. That believing themselves the owners of the estate of John, they advertised the same for sale, and attempted a sale thereof in February, 1786; but no real bidders appearing, different tracts of land were knocked down to the defendants severally, at large prices, they really bidding to promote the sale, and not with any view to become purchasers: and not at that time having any idea that complainants had any interest in the said property, they considered it quite immaterial, how they arranged the business among themselves. But if they had anticipated such a claim, they would either have not put up the property for sale, or would not have bid off the same at high nominal prices: And they insist that it would be very hard on them to hold them to those purchases, made under such circumstances. That defendants sold the house in Broad-street, believing it to be their property. That they divided the negroes of their brother John's estate, on the supposition that they belonged to them, and worked them indiscriminately with their own. The defendants answer other points made by the bill, and conclude in the usual manner. The cause came to a hearing, and was argued by Mr. Ford and Mr. Read for complainants, and by Mr. E. Rutledge and general Pinckney and Mr. Pringle for defendants.

Mr. Ford contended that the words in the will gave a tenancy in common, and not a joint tenancy. The words "equally to be divided" have been uniformly decided to make a tenancy in common, both in wills and deeds. See 1 Vesey, 165. 1 P. Wms. 14, 196. 341. 1 Atk. 493, 4. 2 Atk. 122, 3 Atk. 525. 2 Ves. 252, 7. There was therefore no jus accrescendi in this case. The son John died *under age, and without issue. This was the contingency expressly provided for by the will, which directs in case of the death of his son John in his minority, and without issue, that the lands devised to him should be sold, and the money arising from the sale should be equally divided amongst his four surviving sons, William, Charles, Glen and Thomas, or the survivors of them. And that all the rest of the real and personal property bequeathed to John, should (on his decease as aforesaid) be equally divided amongst his surviving brothers. And so of the house in Broad-street, after the death or marriage of Mrs. R. Drayton, the widow. The word "surviving" in these clauses, does not appear to have had reference to the fact of the brothers surviving John, but of their being surviving or living at the testator's death. A different construction would be to suppose that the testator meant to make a tontine among his sons, and that if all but one of them had died before John, that one surviving should take all, though the other sons might have left children. This would be an unreasonable construction, and therefore not maintainable; and the property would not be equally divided among his four sons, as the will expresses it. The equality manifestly intended by the testator among his sons, would be defeated. There is no death fixed or referred to in this part of the clause, and none in the testator's contemplation apparently but his own death, which must be the event to which the word surviving relates. The words to be paid or equally divided among my four sons above mentioned, to wit: William Henry, Charles, Glen and Thomas, amount to a descriptio personæ, of those who are to take. The testator did not mean to cut off the issue of his children—this is manifest through all the provisions of the will; yet the construction contended for would cut off William Henry's children, who were alive when testator made his will. Every view of the case shews that the testator had reference to his own death when he spoke of his surviving sons. This view makes all consistent and reasonable; and would let in the children of any of his four named sons, who survived him, but died before the son John. Many cases have been de*cided where to give effect to the intent, the words of survivorship have been construed to relate to the death of the testator himself. See Bindon v. Suffolk, 1 P. Wms. 96, decreed by lord ch. Cowper. And though that decision was reversed by the house of lords, it has been adhered to by the best judges. Lord Hardwicke, in Hawes v. Hawes, reported in 1 Vesey, sen. 14, and also in 3 Atkins, 525, approved of the above decision, and agrees with lord ch. Cowper, that the testator's death was the proper time to fix on in such cases. See Stringer v. Phillips, 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 292, which was recognised by lord Mansfield in Vere and Al v. Hill. See too the reasoning in Stones v. Heurtly. 1 Vesey. 165.

*327

*328

Mr. Read for complainants enforced the reasoning of Mr. Ford, and quoted 1 Bro. C. C. 240, 1. The interest given to the son John, vested immediately on the death of testator.

Mr. Pringle, Mr. E. Rutledge, and general Pinckney for defendants contended, that with regard to part of the property devised to the son John, to wit, the house, it did not vest in him till his mother's death; therefore, the survivorship cannot relate to the death of the testator. They quoted 1 P. Wms. 274. 3 Burr, 1541, 1885. 1 Bro. C. C. 215. Freeman 301, 2. They insisted that the defendants were not bound by the purchase they had made at the sale of the lands of John, for as the executors sold without authority, the sales were void. The will directed a sale, but did not say by whom; yet the executors sold, before the law of 1787 authorised sales in such cases. They could not give good titles. If the purchasers had been strangers, and bought in the lands at a low price, the complainants could have prevented the sale taking effect (if their claims are established.) The sale therefore ought not to be binding on the defendants.

The court delivered the following decree:

The case before us is upon the construction of the following clauses, in the will of J. Drayton, grand-father of complainants, and father of defendants: "Provided nevertheless, that if my said son J. Drayton should die during his minority, or without lawful issue, I do then in *that case give, &c. &c. the five last mentioned tracts as above described under the name of Mount Pleasant, or Drayton's Cowpen, I hereby order and provide that the same shall be sold, and the money arising from the sales thereof shall be equally divided in equal shares among my four surviving sons, William Henry, Charles, Glen, and Thomas, or the survivors of them; as also the house in Broad-street, in Charleston aforesaid, in the event of my son John Drayton's death, under age or without lawful issue; and on the death or marriage of my wife, I hereby provide, order and direct, that the same shall be sold, and the money arising from the sale to be paid in equal proportions to my four surviving sons abovementioned, or the survivors of them." In the subsequent clause are these words: "But in case my said son John should die without lawful issue, or during his minority, I hereby order, will and direct, that all his estate real and personal, shall be divided equally in just and equal shares, amongst his surviving brothers, that is to say, such part of his estate as is not otherwise appropriated and disposed of according to the tenor of this will." The testator died soon after making his will, and all his sons were then living. William Henry died some months afterwards, and the youngest son John is since dead under age, and without issue. The law is now so settled as not to be disputed, that the words equally to be divided in equal shares in a will, make a tenancy in common, though they may be controlled by subsequent restrictive words, more plainly indicative of testator's intention. The only question then in this case is, what construction is to be given to the restrictive words, or the survivors of them, in the first clause, and the words surviving brothers in the second; that is, to what time the survivorship shall be limited, whether the testator's death, or the death of his son John. In the case of wills, the governing rule of construction is the intent of testator, and that intent must be collected from the whole complexion of the will, ex visceribus testamenti, so as to leave the mind quite satisfied about what the testator meant, and to construe conformably thereto, so far as it is possible, consistent with the rules of law; and where *sentences are doubtful or ambiguous, the exposition ought to be made according to the testator's intent, which lord Coke calls the pole star to guide judges in their determination. In some cases equity will construe a will against express words, to make it take effect according to testator's intent, and reject inconsistent or contradictory words. On these principles then we shall proceed to consider the will of testator. We must previously observe, however, that on the careful reading of it, it appears to be very unskilfully drawn, by one no way accustomed to technical expressions. Some of the bequests are so awkwardly introduced and blended with others, as leave no room to doubt of his want of professional assistance, and that it was done when he was in extremis, inops concilii; for in the devise to his son John, after enumerating the lands given to his wife, which he thereby gave to his son on a certain contingency, he introduces a bequest to his wife of the house in Broad-street for life, provided she continue his widow so long. That the testator did not intend to make an equal distribution of his estate, cannot be denied, because it is evident on a perusal of his will, that he gave more to his youngest son than to any of his other children; and to the youngest sons of his first and second marriages, more than the eldest sons of those marriages respectively; and there can be no doubt that a testator may make such a capricious disposition of his estate as he shall think proper—there is no law to control him. In this will it is to be remarked that the testator in his bequests to the four eldest sons, has given them the absolute property in the estate without any limitation over; but in the devises to John, he has limited over the whole property, particular parts of it to his sons Charles and Thomas, and the rest of his four surviving sons by name, or the survivors; and in the second clause to his surviving brothers; which evidently shews that the testator had an idea it was probable they would survive his son John. It was certainly his intention that his four sons should have equally the money to arise from the sale of Mount Pleasant plantation, or the house in town, or why be so particular as to name them? and though testator has made use of the words his surviving *brothers in the last bequest, we think that ought not to vary the construction, but that it should be the same, the intention appearing to be precisely the same. As the testator has fixed no time when the survivorship is to take place, we are of opinion from the authority of former adjudications, that it must be confined to the time of his death; for, supposing it had so happened that three of the four sons had died before John, what would have become of the estate? The survivor could not have taken, because it is limited to the survivors: One only then having survived, he could not be entitled within the words; and certainly not the intention of the testator. It must then have been considered as a lapsed legacy, and been distributed as a part of his estate, undisposed of by his will, which he never intended. The case of Stones and Heurtly, 1 Vesey, 165, comes nearest to this. That indeed respected lands; this is to be considered only as personal estate, as the testator leaves orders, that to be converted into money: In that case however, the court determined that it was a tenancy in common, and the three children having survived the testator, the representatives of the one who died afterwards should take the share of the mother, and restrained the words survivors or survivor to the death of testator. Rose on demise of Vere v. Hill, 3 Burr, 1841, is grounded on the above case, and that of Stranger v. Phillips. So in the case of executors of Elliott v. executors of Smith, determined in this court, the grand children were let in for a share of the residuary estate, although the will expressly directed that if any or either of the children died before the time appointed for the delivery of the portions, it should go to the surviving children, share and share alike; thereby confining the survivorship to the testator's death. And the case of Sealy v. Laurens [1 Desaus. 137] was afterwards determined on the same principles. With regard to the house in Broad-street, the construction must be the same as on the other parts of the estate bequeathed to John; but testator's wife not having married, and being still living, the decree cannot have any effect till that event. Overrule the demurrer, and defendants ordered to answer.

*329

*330

*331

---

1 Desaus. *332

*Case LXXXV.

Present—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

JOHN MURRELL, Administrator of George Simmons, Jun., Deceased, v. G. GREENLAND and JOHN and GEORGE PARKER.

(June, 1793.)

[Bonds ⇐27.]

Bond given by a son for his father's debt, voluntarily, and without any fraud practised on him, is good.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bonds, Cent. Dig. § 30; Dec. Dig. ⇐27.]

[Account ⇐25.]

Court corrected one error in the account, but refused to open the account generally.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account, Cent. Dig. § 148; Dec. Dig. ⇐25.]

The bill was filed to obtain a perpetual injunction on a bond alleged to have been obtained by the fraud and importunity of Greenland from a young man, on his coming of age, for a debt said to be due by his father's estate on account, but which was not justly due to Greenland. The defendant Greenland swore that the bond was obtained from G. Simmons the younger, fairly and without importunity, for a debt due by his father (whose estate he inherited) on an account which he knew and admitted to be justly due to him.

The defendant G. Parker swore that the bond was assigned to him for a valuable consideration: and that on applying to Mr. G.

Simmons the obligor, for payment, he promised payment, and made no objection to the justice of the debt, though he complained of the indelicacy of Mr. Greenland in assigning the bond without his knowledge.

The court said that the only question was whether the bond should be set aside as obtained by fraud or imposition, and the account of Greenland opened and unravelled. The court said that this ought not to be done in the present case, because it appeared from the testimony that the bond had been given voluntarily, and without imposition. That (though the son had given his own bond for his father's debt) there was no law which declares that a bond given voluntarily, and under no restraint, should be void. To be sure, if it were merely voluntary, it would be postponed to real debts, even simple contract debts. As, however, there was an ascertained error of £45 in the account on which the bond had been given, the court ordered that sum to be deducted from the principal of the bond, but refused to open the account generally, there being no proof of fraud or surprise in obtaining it. The balance of the bond and interest was ordered to be paid. Read for complainant—Ward for defendants.

---

1 Desaus. *333

*Case LXXXVI.

Present—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

LLOYD and MOTTE, Trustees of Inglis, for the Children of Mrs. Inglis, v. Executors of ALEXANDER INGLIS.

(June, 1793.)

[Trusts ⇐43.]

A wife joins her husband in conveying her real estate in fee to a third person; and he conveys it back to the husband: the husband afterwards conveyed certain lands and slaves to trustees, for his children and then dies insolvent; his creditors insist on being paid out of the lands. The trustees insisted that the husband and wife intended to convey the land originally in trust for their children, but the trusts were omitted by mistake. Parol evidence was offered to prove this, which was ultimately rejected, as contrary to the statute of frauds. The land was decreed to be liable to the husband's debts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 65; Dec. Dig. ⇐43.]

The bill states that Alexander Inglis, by intermarrying with Mary Deas, became entitled to a considerable personal estate, and also seized in right of said wife of a considerable real estate. That said Alexander Inglis being desirous of having said real estate of said wife vested in himself, in order that he might thereby divide the same, or an equivalent thereto, amongst the children of the said Inglis and wife in such manner as he might think proper, (some of their children being already partially provided for) said Inglis applied to his wife, requesting her to execute conveyances to vest said estate in himself, for the purpose aforesaid. That said Mary Inglis assenting, did accordingly send to Lambert Lance, attorney at law, to draw the aforesaid conveyances, and in giving instructions for the same, informed him that she intended vesting said real estate so far only in her said husband as to enable him to dispose thereof in such manner and to such children as he should think proper; but not to enable him to convey the same to a stranger, nor to be liable to his debts, unless he would settle an equivalent thereto upon said children; to which said Inglis, present, assented. That the said Lance did accordingly draw certain conveyances from the said Inglis and wife to John Lloyd of said state, and from him back again to said Inglis, for vesting said real estate of said wife in him; but by some mistake, owing to the great haste with which said conveyances were drawn, in consequence of Mrs. Inglis' situation, omitted inserting the necessary trusts, whereby said real estate became absolutely vested in said Inglis at law. That some very short time after the execution of the said conveyances, said Mary Inglis died; and Alexander Inglis some time after mindful of the trust on which said real estate was conveyed to him, did, by lease and release, dated 22d and 23d, day of August, 1785, convey to John Lloyd and Isaac Motte, and George Inglis, their heirs

*334

&c. certain lands *and slaves in said indenture specified, in trust for the children of the said Alexander Inglis, and Mary his wife, and their heirs forever, in such manner, upon such conditions, and in such shares and proportions, as the said Alexander Inglis should afterwards by will or otherwise direct, limit and appoint. That some time after the execution of said conveyances, the said Alexander Inglis died, having first made a will, and appointed sundry executors thereof, of whom only William Marshall and Alexander Inglis, jun. have qualified; in which said will he devised and bequeathed all the real and personal estate so conveyed to the complainants in trust as aforesaid, to and amongst the children of the said Alexander Inglis, on the said Mary Inglis begotten. That after the death of said Inglis, the said William Marshall and Alexander Inglis, jun. executors as aforesaid, possessed themselves of the aforesaid real and personal estate so conveyed to complainants in trust, and have received the profits thereof. That complainants have since the death of said Inglis, applied to William Marshall and Alexander Inglis, jun. for possession of said real and personal estate, and for an account of the profits thereof received by them since the death of said Alexander Inglis. But that they conceiving that the said conveyance of real and personal estate by the said Alexander Inglis to complainants, is void against the creditors of the said Inglis, and that the estate of said Inglis, exclusive of the estate so conveyed, is insufficient to discharge his debts, refuse to deliver to your orators possession of the estate so conveyed to them as aforesaid, and to account for the profits thereof received by them since the death of the said Alexander Inglis.—The bill therefore prays that possession of the aforesaid real and personal estate may be delivered to the complainants, and that the defendants may be compelled to account for the profits thereof which have been received by them since the death of the said Alexander Inglis; and that such further and other relief may be given to complainants as the court shall think fit.

Answer admits that testator Alexander Inglis intermarried with Mary Deas, whereby he became entitled to *a considerable personal estate; and also to a qualified right of a real estate. That his wife joined with him in conveying to John Lloyd, one of the complainants, her real estate; and that said John Lloyd re-conveyed the same to the testator of defendants; but defendants were not privy to any agreement or conversation between said Mary and their testator relative to the objects of said complainants, or the conditions on which the same was made; nor do they know that the consideration and condition in bill mentioned were terms stipulated by the parties, or the motives which gave rise to the conveyance, being ignorant of said business, otherwise than as they heard from Mrs. Inglis herself. That said Alexander Inglis did make conveyance in bill mentioned, dated in August 1785, whereby he conveyed the property mentioned in complainants' bill, to complainants and Mr. George Inglis; and that defendants have possessed themselves of said property, conceiving the same liable to their testator's debts, which they believe will not be satisfied out of the remainder of his estate, if the property claimed by complainants in behalf of the children should be adjudged them. The answer then concludes praying dismission with costs, &c. &c.

*335

Mr. Lance was examined as a witness without prejudice to any objection which might be made to the admissibility of such parol evidence. He stated that it was intended the land should be held in trust for the children of Mrs. Inglis. He understood from Mrs. Inglis that she wished the estate to be placed in the hands of her husband in such manner as would enable him to divide it among such of her children as were most deserving of it, and that one child should not take the whole. That considering Mr. Inglis a rich man, he (the witness) drew the titles in such a manner as merely to divest Mrs. Inglis of the estate, and put it in Mr. Inglis's power to fulfill her intentions. Mrs. Inglis was then in a very bad state of health, and she died before the execution of the trust deed from Inglis to Lloyd and Motte. It was objected at the hearing that this parol evidence was inadmissible, being to vary a deed which would be contrary to the statute of frauds.

*336

*Mr. Parker for complainants contended that the doctrine of trusts is entirely with this court, and the common law has no cognizance of it. The statute of frauds would apply at common law, but not here. Trusts respecting personal estates are not included in the statute of frauds; and parol evidence is admitted respecting personalty, even in contradiction to a deed. Mr. Parker produced the deed executed by Inglis, after the death of his wife, as evidence of the parol trust, to which it was to give effect and operation. As this court would have compelled Mr. Inglis to do what had been agreed to be done, a fortiori, it will support the execution of the trust which has been made by Inglis. 3 P. Wms. 337. If Lance's evidence is admitted, it establishes the parol trust. The statute of frauds relates only to transactions between the parties themselves, and not to creditors; and an executor is not obliged to plead the statute in favor of creditors. 2 Atk. 155, 417. Burr. 2628. If defendant waives the statute of frauds, no one else has a right to set it up for him, not even the court. 1 Atk. 526. 2 Vesey, 631, 3. The creditor can have no more equity than his debtor. Inglis did not record the deed of trust; if he had, he would have brought all his creditors upon him. 3 Co. Rep. 80, 89. The deed is bona fide, and for valuable consideration. Parol evidence may be produced to prove a parol trust. See 3 Wilson, 275.

General Pinckney for complainants insisted that the creditors of Inglis could never have trusted him on this property, because all his debts were contracted previous to the execution of the deed, which divested the property out of Mrs. Inglis. The deed from Mr. and Mrs. Inglis to Lloyd, was dated the 23d July, 1785. The deed of trust from Inglis to Motte and Lloyd for the benefit of his children, as he might direct by will or otherwise, was dated 23d August, 1785. Cited 2 Ves. 377. 2 Vern. 380. 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 19. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 749, 310, 260.

Mr. Smith for defendants said, the court is obliged to take notice of the statute of frauds, though not pleaded; and that statute prevents the admission of parol evidence in such a case; and without the parol evidence, the com*plainant has not made out any case for the court to decree upon. Cited 2 Vern. 98, 621. Cases Temp. Talbot, 240. 2 Atk. 372, 172, 383.

*337

Mr. Lee for defendants said, the doctrine is settled, that even in cases between the parties, and no third persons or creditors interested, the court will not admit parol evidence to shew what was the intention of the parties by the deed, and that there was something omitted. See Comyn's, title chancery, 171, 175. 1 P. Wms. 618, 620; and if the parol evidence be rejected, the complainants have no ground to stand upon.

Mr. Pringle for defendant said, where a statute declares a debt to be void ab initio, an executor is bound to plead it, or he is liable to be charged with a devastavit. Powel, 430. 276, 294, 5. The statute of frauds is a remedial law, and the court will give it that construction which will advance the remedy, and prevent the mischief.

Mr. Rutledge for defendants said, the statute of frauds forbids the admission of parol evidence to establish a declaration of trust. If a deed is not executed agreeably to the statute, you cannot bring a third person, who was standing by and saw the execution, as a supplementary evidence; for, as he did not sign his name as a witness, he cannot be admitted as such by parol. Cited 2 Ves. Lord Townsend v. Windham. 3 Atk. 8. 2 Bla. Rep. 1249.

This case was, on motion for a re-hearing, argued a second time. Afterwards, Chancellor MATHEWS (in whose handwriting the decree is extant, corrected by Chancellor HUTSON) delivered the decree of the court:

This is a demand made by trustees under a deed, which it is contended, if admitted to operate according to the intention of the grantor, will materially affect the claim of the creditors; in whose behalf it is contended, that Mr. Inglis had no right to make such a deed, because there is no legal evidence that the deed from Mr. and Mrs. Inglis to Mr. Lloyd, was intended as a trust for the benefit of their children; but that on the contrary, it is a plain and absolute conveyance in fee simple from Inglis and wife to Lloyd, and so of Lloyd back to Mr. Inglis. That the parol evidence offered and admitted in this cause, *ought to be disregarded, and judgment to be given on the deed alone. Although the arguments were very long, and placed the case in every point in which it could possibly be viewed, we think there is but one to which our attention is to be confined, and on which it will be necessary for us to decide, viz. the deeds from Inglis and wife to Lloyd, and from him to Inglis. As to the parol evidence of Mr. Lance, although it was refused at the first hearing, but admitted at the second, yet we are of opinion that no kind of notice should be judicially taken of it, as such cognizance would be attended with dangerous consequences, and would be in direct violation of the true intent and meaning, and of the objects contemplated by the statute of frauds. A distinction has been taken at the bar between the admission of parol evidence to prove a trust of personal and of real estate: That in the first case it is admissible, though not perhaps in the second; in the latter, it clearly is not; and that is the nature of the case now before us. And we are firmly supported in this opinion by the authorities of Brown v. Selwyn, reported in Talbot's cases, and which was affirmed in the house of lords, by the case of Ulrick v. Litchfield, 2 Atk. which respected personal estate; but still, the parol evidence was not admitted, though the chancellor said he wished to do so, yet he was not authorised to follow his inclinations: also, by the case of Parteriche v. Powlett, in the same book, even when the parol evidence had been heard, yet the chancellor in giving his decree said, "he should pay no regard to it, for to add any thing to an agreement in writing, by admitting parol evidence, which would affect land, would not only be contrary to the statute of frauds and perjuries, but also to the rule of common law before that statute was in being." By the case of Montacute v. Maxwell, in 1 P. Wms. where the chancellor said, "that one who relies on the honor, word, or promise of another, the statute making those promises void, equity will not interfere." This is similar to the case before us, for much stress has been laid on Mrs. Inglis' intention of creating a trust for the benefit of her children, at the time she executed the deed which deprived her of *her inheritance in the lands in question: But as it was no more than an intention on her part, it is from hence to be presumed that she placed an implicit confidence in her husband to have the same carried into effect; and there can be no doubt but that the trust deed from Inglis to Lloyd and Motte, and his will in consequence thereof, would have fulfilled such intentions, had there been no creditors in the case: But as there are, and they have put in their claims, we are bound to notice them accordingly. The case of Dalzell and wife v. Timrod, determined in this court, where parol evidence was read to prove that there was a mistake in the deed, owing entirely to the drawer of the deed being ignorant of the technical meaning of the word spinster; the intention of the grantor in that case being to convey to Catharine M'Infuss, the wife of Michael M'Infuss, and not to Catharine the daughter. But the court overruled the evidence, declaring that they would not admit parol evidence to explain away the words of a plain and solemn deed. In the case of Todd and wife v. the executors of Rivers [1 Desaus. 155,] also determined in this court, parol evidence was admitted to prove that a bond and mortgage was given merely as a counter security; but in that case the evidence of several persons was full and clear to this point; therefore, the court allowed the evidence to stand, and granted relief accordingly. For, it not being a bona fide debt, but merely a cautionary engagement by one party, to save the other harmless, as his security, these facts being so clearly proved, under the particular circumstances of the case, the court did allow the parol evidence; and this is the only instance which we can recollect of its ever having been admitted in this court. But in the same cause it appeared, that another bond and mortgage was given for the same purpose, on another account, but for want of sufficient proofs, the court refused to interfere. In the case also of Olyphant v. the executors of Singleton, determined here, the court would not admit the parol evidence that had been offered as sufficient to set aside the bond. From the train of adjudications here referred to, and for the reasons we have offered, we think we are well *warranted in rejecting the evidence of Mr. Lance. And as the case then stands simply on the deed from Lloyd to Inglis, we cannot hesitate a moment to say it is a case in which this court cannot interfere: And whatever might be our private opinions, and however hard we may think the case is with regard to minors, yet we cannot, consistent with the rules of law, pursue any other line of conduct, but such as they prescribe. The bill must therefore be dismissed with costs.

*338

*339

*340

[The court said, that notwithstanding the decree, it would be open for the defendant to file a bill against Mr. Lloyd, to discover whether the deeds from Mr. Alexander Inglis and his wife, were upon any and what trusts; and when the deed was executed; and at what time delivered to his possession. This was accordingly done; but Mr. Lloyd in his answer stated, "that neither Mrs. nor Mr. Inglis at the time of the execution of the deeds of conveyance from them to him, ever signified to him that it was their intention to create a trust estate." That with respect to the settlement made by Mr. Inglis, after his wife's death, he (Mr. Lloyd) was not consulted about it; but Mr. Inglis delivered him as trustee a deed under a sealed cover, which he said was a settlement of the property he had acquired by marriage on his wife's children; and the deed remained unopened till some years afterwards, when Mr. Inglis' property was advertised for sale by his creditors; upon which, he advised him to take the advice of counsel as to its validity, and he re-delivered the deed for that purpose. This answer not establishing any trust in the first deed, the decree was acquiesced in.]

1 Desaus. 340

Case LXXXVII.

Present.—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

ANN FITZPATRICK and MARY GALLAGHER v. O'BRIEN SMITH, Administrator of John Fitzpatrick, and Kyrian Fitzpatrick.

(June, 1793.)

[Shipping ⇐68.]

The court will not admit parol evidence to shew that an absolute bill of sale is merely conditional and a security. It might be another question as to creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Shipping, Cent. Dig. § 290; Dec. Dig. ⇐68.]

[Arbitration and Award ⇐82.]

Award of arbitrators supported. Captain of ship not entitled to the freight of money. Sale of vessel fairly made is valid, though sold very low.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Shinnie v. Coil, 1 McCord Eq. 482.

For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. §§ 440–450; Dec. Dig. ⇐82.]

This was a bill filed by the mother and sister of John Fitzpatrick, deceased, for an account of his estate, and *other purposes. The bill charged that the deceased left a considerable property in bonds, negroes, and a brig called the Mary. That O'Brien Smith administered, and took possession of the estate; and complainants have applied for an account and settlement without success. That O'Brien Smith had employed the negroes of the estate in planting his own lands, and refused to account for the proceeds of their labor, under pretence that the negroes and other property were conveyed or assigned to him, though it alleged that such assignment was a mere security for an inconsiderable debt. The bill charges that Kyrian Fitzpatrick received £500 sterling for the charterage of the brig Mary (of which he was merely captain) from Charleston to Amsterdam, and the freightage of said brig back to Charleston, which is unaccounted for. And that the administrator and Kyrian Fitzpatrick confederating together, the brig was put up to sale, and bought in by the latter at a very low price. The bill prays for an account and settlement, and a subpœna duces tecum, for the production of the books and papers of John Fitzpatrick's estate. The answer of O'Brien Smith admitted that John Fitzpatrick died possessed of several bonds and notes for money due him, but he was more largely indebted to others. That defendant administered on the estate, out of which he has furnished complainants for their relief £20 and sundry articles. Defendant denied that the complainants have any right to the negroes formerly belonging to the deceased John Fitzpatrick, because the latter had in his life time made an absolute bill of sale for them, in consideration of £420 which he had advanced him. Defend ant admits that John Fitzpatrick died possessed of a brig called Mary, and that defendant caused her to be sold; but he denies that he confederated with Kyrian Fitzpatrick to have her sold at a low price; on the contrary, the defendant bid against him, and thereby made him give a higher price than he would otherwise have done. Defendant is ignorant of the transactions between John and Kyrian Fitzpatrick, except as far as an account was rendered by the latter, by which it appears he was indebted to the deceased in £101 3s. 2d. The defendant denies *that he had refused to account, but was always, and is now ready to account with the complainants. The defendant Kyrian Fitzpatrick states, that he knew nothing of the property of John Fitzpatrick, except that he had purchased the brig Mary for £800 in bonds of small value. That he himself purchased the brig fairly at public auction after the death of John Fitzpatrick for £140 and that she was very rotten and worthless, cost him great sums in repairing, and after one or two hazardous voyages, he sold her for £180. That after he purchased her, he left more than was due by him, on her account, in the hands of Thomas Martin, the agent of the administrator. The defendant has advanced some money to the complainants, and is ready to account and settle with the estate.

*341

*342

Mr. Harper for the complainants stated, that the principal questions were, whether the bill of sale from John Fitzpatrick to O'Brien Smith was not merely a security for payment of a debt; and whether the property was not really the estate's, and O'Brien Smith a trustee for it. Whether the purchase of the brig made at the sale by Kyrian Fitzpatrick, was not made for the benefit of the estate of John, and Kyrian merely a trustee. And whether the cargo brought by captain Kyrian Fitzpatrick to Philadelphia, was not the property of John Fitzpatrick; and the cargo brought from Philadelphia to Charleston, purchased with the proceeds of the former, and therefore to be accounted for as the property of the estate of John Fitzpatrick. At the hearing, the following evidence was given:

Mr. O'Hara swore, that when captain Kyrian Fitzpatrick was going his last voyage, he told him the vessel owed him about £150 and on his return, he told witness the vessel owed him about £700 but that the cargo was worth £800 or £900.

Mr. Manson swore, that the tackle and apparel of the said vessel, were worth almost £250. Port money is usually allowed in foreign ports.

Graham stated that the sale was a fair one, though she brought only £140.

*343

*Captain Thompson stated, that the vessel might have been worth about £400. Port money is not usually allowed here. If a small sum of money is put on board, the captain usually has the freight of it; if a large sum, the owners have it.

Mr. Hazlehurst stated, that captain Kyrian Fitzpatrick was a respectable sea captain. He did all the business of the vessel. John Fitzpatrick was a necessitous man. Primage from Charleston to Amsterdam is 5 per cent. and more from there back. The captain receives his primage from the owner of the goods, not of the vessel. Port money is allowed at Philadelphia. Captain not entitled to all the freight on large sums of money shipped; but he should have half, on account of his responsibility.

Mr. Stewart stated, that if the captain does the business of the vessel, and charges no brokerage, he is entitled to port money.

Mr. Williamson said, that from hence to Philadelphia, the captain always received the freight of money, be the sum what it may. This vessel was a very bad one; he would not have accepted her as a gift.

Mr. Peppin states, that it is the general custom to allow the captain the freight of money. The primage to London is 5 per cent.

Mr. Geoghegan states, that he was at the sale of the vessel. It was a very fair one. Mr. Smith bid repeatedly on captain Kyrian Fitzpatrick, who was offended at it. He heard Pritchard the ship carpenter tell captain Fitzpatrick not to give more than £150 for her.

Mr. Mey stated, that the primage from Holland is 10 per cent. to America. He sold the vessel to John Fitzpatrick. He parted with her because he thought her a bad vessel. He got £800 in old bonds.

Mr. Martin stated, that after captain Fitzpatrick had bought the vessel and repaired her, he heard a report that he had bought her for the estate; whereupon, he offered to deliver her up for the price of the cost of repairs, but it was refused.

*344

*Mr. Corbett stated, that Mr. Smith told him in the beginning of 1791, that he would send Fitzpatrick's rice to town.

Mr. Harper for complainants contended, that the vessel had been sold greatly below her value, and ought to be accounted for at her value. That the primage on the passengers ought to be struck out of the account, as it was improperly made a charge against the vessel. That Mr. Smith's declaration to Corbett, that he would send Fitzpatrick's rice to town, shews that he did not look upon the sale of the negroes as absolute. It was a mere security to cover a small debt; otherwise the rice made by these slaves could not have been called Fitzpatrick's. After the date of the bill of sale, it appears that John Fitzpatrick bought cloth for the negroes, and left it to be made up for them. His estate ought to have the benefit of them, after paying the money advanced by Smith.

Mr. Dom. A. Hall, and General Pinckney for defendants, argued, that the complainants claiming as the representatives of John Fitzpatrick, can be entitled to no more equity than he would have been; and he would not have been permitted to deny his own deed, and say it did not mean what it expresses on its face. The rice mentioned by Smith to Corbett to be Fitzpatrick's, was the rice that had been planted by Fitzpatrick's negroes before he sold them to Smith. The creditors of John Fitzpatrick are not before the court; so that this deed, if it were really voluntary, cannot be shaken in this cause; for though by the statute of 13 Elizabeth, gifts to protect property from creditors are void as to them, they are good between the parties.

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the judgment of the court. There are five points for determination in this case. 1st. Whether the bill of sale made by John Fitzpatrick to O'Brien Smith was bona fide, and for valuable consideration, and absolute; or only a security for an unliquidated debt due by John Fitzpatrick to O'Brien Smith? 2d. Whether an award made between the parties by arbitrators, should be set aside? 3d. Whether the cargo is the property of Kyrian

*345

Fitzpatrick or John Fitzpatrick? *4th. Whether Kyrian Fitzpatrick should be allowed to retain freight for money carried? 5th. Whether the sale of the brig was fair and open? As to the first, the defendant O'Brien Smith swears, that the bill of sale was for valuable consideration, for a debt of £420 justly due him, and without condition; and in order to avoid the imputation of fraud, he also files an account, the items of which make up the amount. He needed not have done this.—The complainant now insists that he should go into proofs of the account. But as the greatest part is for money lent, it is presumable when John Fitzpatrick gave the bill of sale, the vouchers were given up. It would be unreasonable to order the account to be unravelled now. There might be a difference if the creditors of John Fitzpatrick were complainants. Parol evidence was offered to shew the bill of sale was a mere security, and the conversations of defendant Smith with two of the witnesses, were adduced to shew the nature and effect of the bill of sale. The court has frequently decided not to admit parol evidence to contradict or explain a deed, contrary to what appears on its face, unless there is a charge of fraud in obtaining it. But here the deed itself is confirmed by the positive oath of defendant Smith, which stands wholly unimpeached, except as to the loose conversations stated to have taken place several years ago. The court is of opinion that the bill of sale must be considered absolute, and not conditional, or merely as a security. The account cannot now be investigated. 2d. The award was made by persons chosen by the parties, and made up with great care and labor, and there is no charge of fraud or partiality on the part of the arbitrators; the award therefore is conclusive: let it be confirmed. 3d. The cargo from the evidence, appears clearly to be the property of Kyrian Fitzpatrick, and not of his owner. 4th. As to the freight for the money from Amsterdam to Philadelphia, there appears to be no fixed custom that the captain of the vessel should have it. There is a difference of opinion among the witnesses. It seems to be the custom between this port and Philadelphia; but it is not established by testimony as to other trades. The defendant

*346

Kyrian *Fitzpatrick, the captain, must account for this freight to his owner. 5th. The evidence shews clearly, that the sale of the brig was fair and open, without fraud or collusion, and the defendant Kyrian Fitzpatrick, was the highest bidder, and really gave the full value. The court therefore decreed that Kyrian Fitzpatrick should pay to the administrators of John Fitzpatrick, the sum (£123.) awarded by the arbitrators, to be due by him to the estate of John Fitzpatrick; and also the freight of the money from Amsterdam to Philadelphia, deducting primage; and that he do pay all the costs of this suit, except those of defendant Smith, which must be paid by the complainants.

---

1 Desaus. 346

Case LXXXVIII.

Present.—Chancellors Hutson, Mathews and Rutledge.

DE BARDELEBEN v. BARNARD BEEKMAN and SAMUEL BEEKMAN.

(June, 1793.)

[Fraudulent Conveyances. ⟸154.]

If possession does not accompany bill of sale, and the same be not recorded, it shall be void as to the creditors, though no doubt of the fairness of the transaction.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Nelson & Co. v. Good, 20 S. C. 234.

For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 485–492; Dec. Dig. ⟸154.]

[Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸132.]

[Possession of personal property by the grantor is not fraudulent, where the conveyance has been duly recorded.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 414; Dec. Dig. ⟸132.]

This was a bill filed by complainant to discover if the defendant Barnard Beekman had not made certain bills of sale of a number of slaves to his nephew Samuel Beekman, in order to cover them from his creditors, and particularly from the complainant, who had recovered judgment against Barnard Beekman, on bonds in which he was security. The defendants in their answer stated that Barnard Beekman was justly indebted to his nephew Samuel Beekman, and had executed several bills of sale, conveying to him a number of negro slaves, whom he accepted in payment. That several of them were delivered to, and actually in the possession of Samuel Beekman. But that there were others who were necessary to the immediate service, attendance upon and comfort of his aged and venerable relation; and whom therefore he permitted to remain with him, and in his service. The bills of sale were proved, and shewn to have been executed to satisfy debts bona fide due to Samuel Beekman; and they were all, except one, recorded in the proper offices, in proper time. The two defendants were men of great probi*ty, and their answers were corroborated by proofs which were satisfactory. But it was contended by the complainant's counsel, that the personal property which remained in the possession of Barnard Beekman must, notwithstanding the bill of sale to Samuel Beekman, be subject to his debts. The securityship was in 1784; the bills of sale were in 1787, and were recorded before complainants got judgment at law, except one, which has never been recorded. Some of the negroes which were left in the possession of Barnard Beekman, were included in the bill of sale recorded, and some in the bill of sale unrecorded. All that remained in the vendor's possession must be subjected to his debts, according to Twine's case, reported in 3 Coke's reports. See too 2 Durnford and East, 537, which was decided by twelve judges of England in the exchequer chamber. For the defendant it was contended, that though these were bills of sale, made bona fide to pay, or rather to secure a debt, yet it was intended to make it executory, so as to cover the just debt due to the defendant Samuel Beekman; and that being executory, the property might remain with the vendor, without being liable to his debts. The court delivered the following decree:

*347

The court said, that the only question in this case is, whether certain negroes in the possession of Barnard Beekman are his property, and liable to his debts, or the property of Samuel Beekman. The latter produced bills of sale for them as far back as 1787, previous to complainant's obtaining judgment and execution against Barnard Beekman. There are two bills of sale, one of which is recorded, and the other not. The transaction between Barnard Beekman and Samuel Beekman appears to be quite fair. The debts for which the bills of sale were given, were justly due; satisfactory vouchers were produced; all the negroes therefore, the possession of whom went with the bills of sale (and there were some under both) are clearly Samuel Beekman's property. But it is contended that Barnard Beekman's remaining in possession of the other negroes, and exercising all acts of ownership over them, he is to be considered the real *owner of them, and that they are liable to his debts. Possession certainly is the criterion of personal property, and the vendee's permitting the vendor to continue in possession, is prima facie, to countenance fraud by giving the vendor a false credit. The court has no doubt of the fairness of the transactions in this case: and that the conduct of Samuel Beekman was even laudable to his aged relative; but the law must prevail. There is, however, a distinction between the negroes which are yet in Barnard Beekman's possession; because some of them are named in the recorded bill of sale, and some in the unrecorded. As to those in the recorded bill, the court has no difficulty in declaring them to be the property of the defendant, Samuel Beekman, though they remained in Barnard Beekman's possession; because every one could have access to the public records, and obtain correct information, and no false credit is held out. But as to those in the unrecorded bill of sale, and in possession of Barnard Beekman, the bill of sale must be considered void on the principle that possession is the criterion of personal property. It was therefore ordered and decreed, that the negroes in the possession of Barnard Beekman, named in the unrecorded bill of sale, be considered as his property, and as to those the bill of sale is considered void —Costs to be paid by defendant, Barnard Beekman.

*348

Calhoun, E. Rutledge, and Desaussure, solicitors for complainants—Pringle and general Pinckney, solicitors in the cause for defendants.

---

1 Desaus. 348

Case LXXXIX.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

MARY HAIG, Widow of Dr. George Haig, v. The Executors of Dr. GEORGE HAIG.

(March, 1794.)

[Husband and Wife ⊜116.]

Deed by a father by which he gives directly to his married daughter, without trustees, several slaves, to her only use and behoof: The marital rights attach, and the property is liable to the husband's debts: Though the deed was in the husband's handwriting, yet he afterwards bequeathed them to her, which shewed his view of his rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 414; Dec. Dig. ⊜116.]

The bill was brought to establish a deed of gift of sundry negroes made by the complainant's father, some years after her marriage, directly to her, without the intervention of trustees. The deed declared that the slaves *should be "to the only use and behoof of my said daughter, her heirs and assigns." It was contended for the complainant that the marital rights of the husband could not attach in this case. That the words of the deed shewed that the father meant to give a separate estate. After hearing the arguments of council, the court delivered its opinion that this being a direct gift of personal property to the wife, the legal estate immediately vested in her husband, and the marital rights attached absolutely. It was argued that the words "to the only use" of Mrs. Haig, shewed the intention to make it a separate estate; and that to give effect to that intention, the husband should be decreed a trustee for his wife.† But the court said that if the husband had manifested by any act that he so considered and understood it, or had been guilty of any fraud with respect to the negroes, something might have been said for complainant; but Dr. Haig, by disposing of these negroes by his will as he has done, shews he did not consider it, nor understand it in that manner. The cases cited are generally of wills; and it was insisted that the modern doctrine is, that the rule is the same as to deeds and wills, where the intention discernible; but the marital rights are not to be so easily overthrown. See 2 Fonbl. 321. 3 Atk. 399. Darly and Darly. The case of Ralfe v. Hudde, stated in 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 153, was relied upon for the complainant, but it is not like this case; and besides, it is the case of a will. The wife had been ill used by her husband, and lived separate from him. It was properly decided that in such a case, a direct gift to the wife should be protected. There is nothing of those circumstances in the case under consideration. See also 2 Atk. 558, Tyrrell v. Hope, which was relied on. That was like the present, the case of a deed: but it was a marriage settlement, and the husband's assent was ascertained from the fact, that he corrected the error in the deed in his own hand writing. It is true that the deed in question executed by Mrs. Haig's father, was in Dr. Haig's hand *writing; and it was insisted that furnished the evidence of his consent to the property being held as a separate estate under the deed; else it was asked, why make the deed of the slaves to her, to her only use and behoof, and to her heirs, if Dr. Haig was immediately after to become the absolute owner by virtue of the marital rights? It certainly was presumptive evidence of such assent; but Dr. Haig afterwards bequeathing these very slaves by his will, shews he did not consider them his wife's separate estate, or that he supposed her father meant them to be so. The circumstance of the negroes being liable to be taken by Dr. Haig's creditors, unless protected by the court under the deed, does not alter the case. The court is bound to regard the rights of creditors, as well as of married women. Neither the deed nor the circumstances justify the court in decreeing Dr. Haig to have been a trustee for his wife. If Mrs. Haig takes the slaves under her husband's will, (as they are bequeathed to her) she will be entitled to an account from the defendants for hire and labor of the slaves; but subject to the debts of the estate of Dr. Haig, like his other property. Bill dismissed—costs to be paid by defendants out of the estate.

*349

*350

†See 9 Vesey, 583, where a husband was decreed to be a trustee for his wife, though no trustee was mentioned in the will.

---

1 Desaus. 350

Case XC.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

WILLIAM SMITH v. WILLIAM BRAILSFORD.

(March, 1794.)

[Specific Performance ⟸41.]

Bill for specific performance of a parol agreement respecting lands. The defendant pleaded the statute of frauds, and also answered. In his answer he admitted the parol agreement as stated in the bill: and that he had taken possession of and held the land under the agreement. The court was of opinion, that the admission in the answer of the agreement, takes the case out of the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 120; Dec. Dig. ⟸41.]

Bill states that complainant and defendant became joint purchasers in 1785, of a lot of land in Meeting-street, from Mrs. Taggart, for £30. cash, and £3200. payable in indents. That it was agreed one of them should settle for the purchase, and give bond. That the titles were made to the complainant, and he gave his bond. He paid taxes and all other expenses, and charged defendant with half as per agreement. In 1788, defendant afterwards proposed, that one of them should take the whole purchase, and give the other 20 guineas for his bargain. This was agreed to, and defendant was to be the purchaser, and *was to pay the whole debt to the commissioners of the treasury, and cancel complainant's bond to Mrs. Taggart. Complainant made and executed the title deeds, and he and defendant settled their accounts, and complainant charged defendant with the 20 guineas and taxes, and delivered the deeds; and defendant repeated his promises to pay the debt, and cancel complainant's bond. Mrs. Taggart demanded payment of defendant to no effect, though he made promises of payment to her, particularly by letter, of the month of January, in the year 1789 or 1790. That defendant afterwards set up a pretence of a deficiency in the lot of 8 or 10 feet in depth; and refusing taking up the bond, the complainant was exposed to the demand. The bill prays relief, &c. &c. The defendant answering, admits he was jointly concerned in the purchase, and the arrangements were made as stated in the bill. He admits he agreed to take the bargain off complainant's hands, understanding that the quantity of land was as described in the deed and plat; but that on a resurvey, there was a deficiency of 12 feet in depth, and as there was no agreement in writing, he pleads the statute of frauds; but he says, if the land had been found equal in quantity to the description in the deeds, he should have held himself bound in honor, though no writings had passed, and though in fact the lots had fallen in value.

*351

At the hearing of the case Mr. Waring gave evidence, that the lot was sold by plat, 36¼ feet front, and 188 feet in depth; that the defendant Brailsford, called on him some years after the sale, and requested a sight of the plat, as he imagined there was a deficiency in the land.

Mrs. Taggart testified, that Brailsford never mentioned any thing of a deficiency till three years after he had possession of the lot. Defendant said he had the indents, and would settle the debt.

Mr. Campbell testified, that he was present at the settlement between complainant and defendant, when the latter seemed perfectly satisfied. In July 1790, the defendant told witness (acting as the attorney of Mr. Smith) that he had indents, and would settle the matter.

*352

*Mr. T. R. Smith, and Mr. E. Rutledge contended, that the plea of the statute of frauds could be of no avail to the defendant, because he had taken and kept possession of the land in pursuance of the agreement, and because his answer acknowledged the agreement. Powell, 148, 292, 9, 308. 2 Vern. 412. As joint tenant the defendant could have known whether there was a deficiency; but he did not set up the pretence of a deficiency for several years after he had possession, and only when the value of the property had fallen materially.

C. C. Pinckney agreed, that if the defendant admits in his answer the parol agreement, as stated in the bill, then it is binding, for he thus renders it an agreement in writing. 1 P. Wms. 770, Hawkins v. Holmes, which is a leading case. Ambler's Rep. 586, Gunter v. O'Halsey. But the terms of the agreement must be proved, even when part executed. 6 Bro. P. C. 45. Powell 231, 291. As a joint tenant, Brailsford had a right to let Stevens make use of the land. 2. Bro. C. C. 559.

The court directed an issue to ascertain, if there was any and what deficiency in the lot. That issue has been tried, and the common law judge who tried it, has certified that the jury have found that there is no deficiency. There being therefore no deficiency, and defendant having admitted in his answer that he was bound in honor, if there was no deficiency, "the court has no difficulty in decreeing the agreement to be specifically executed for the defendant, by his answer which he signed; having acknowledged the agreement, the court considers it such an assent in writing, as overrules his plea of the statute of frauds." Decree that the defendant should accept complainant's titles to the property in question, and pay off the debt of complainant on his bond to Mrs. Taggart; and meanwhile give complainant his bond and security to indemnify him. The defendant to pay costs.

*353

*Chancellor Hutson having died in the winter of 1793, James Green Hunt was elected in his room, at the session of the legislature in May, 1794.

---

1 Desaus. 353

Case XCI.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

Mrs. KEITH v. EDWARD PERRY.

(March, 1794.)

[Perpetuities ⟸7.]

Bequest of the use of certain property to a lady during her life, and at her death to the heirs of her body, and to her heirs and assigns, is a good bequest, and gives her a life estate, and upon her death the property will go to her children, not subject to her husband's debts. (He was dead before any division.)

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perpetuities, Cent. Dig. §§ 48, 54, 55; Dec. Dig. ⟸7.]

[Wills ⟸617.]

The court construed her into their, to give effect of the intent of testator.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Sease v. Sease, 64 S. C. 221, 41 S. E. 898.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1431; Dec. Dig. ⟸617.]

The testator John Bullein, by will, after devising his real estate to his two daughters, Mary and Susanna, and their heirs forever, to be divided equally in value, directed his personal estate to be appraised and divided into four equal parts, which he particularly disposes of. The question in this case is upon the following clause: "and the remaining other fourth part, with the increase, I give, devise and bequeath to my second daughter Susanna, the use of, during her life; and at her death, I give, devise and bequeath the same to the heirs of her body, and to her heirs and assigns forever." It has been contended for defendant that the limitation over was void, as being too remote, for the use of the property being given for life, and at her death to the heirs of her body, and to her heirs and assigns forever, the absolute estate vested in her; the last words to her heirs and assigns enlarging the estate for life given to her, and extending the limitation over to a dying without issue generally, which the law will not allow in the bequest of personal estate, as being too remote and tending to a perpetuity. The question respecting the limitation over of personal property after the death of the first taker, where it is confined to a life or lives in being, or twenty-one years after, has been so repeatedly determined to be good, that one would suppose it would hardly be again agitated; and the only possibility of a doubt that could arise in this case is, what construction should be given to the words "and to her heirs and assigns." In order to form a right judgment, and make the true construction, we must resort to the intention of testator, as expressed in all the parts of his will: his *meaning must be collected from the will itself, by attending to the several parts of it, by considering and comparing them together; not by an arbitrary construction, but a violent and strong presumption arising from the several parts. Now it is manifest that the testator intended an equal distribution of his whole estate real and personal (after some few legacies) between his two daughters; for in the first part of his will, where he disposes of his lands, he directs an equal distribution in value to be made between his two daughters; and when he comes to bequeath his personal estate, the same disposition is equally apparent. One fourth part he gives to each of his daughters absolutely, and in the fourth that he gives for life, he appears to be equally solicitous to make provision for their children. In the bequest to his daughter Mary, he has given it to her for life, and at her death to the heirs of her body and to their heirs forever. In the bequest to his daughter Susanna, immediately subsequent, he has used the same words, with this difference only, that the word her is put instead of the word their, which is a palpable mistake; for if it should be construed her, the provision which he intended for her children would be totally defeated, by enlarging the estate in Susanna, and vesting the same absolutely in her. And that he could not intend to do so is also further evident, by another clause in the will, where he disposes of that fourth part bequeathed to the heirs of the body, to the survivor of his two daughters (in case either of them died under age or unmarried) for life, and at her death to the heirs of her body, and their heirs and assigns forever. That courts of equity have the power of correcting mistakes which are plain and manifest, in order to give effect to the testator's intentions, where such intentions are not inconsistent with the rules of law, cannot be doubted. They frequently transpose words in a will, and sometimes have construed the word or into and, and vice versa, where it is evident that such was the testator's meaning, and that without such construction his intention would be frustrated—and in the case of Guerard v. Guerard, where the testator made a double provision for Isaac and none at all for Jacob, the *mistake was so grossly apparent that the point was given up.

*354

*355

Upon a review of the whole will, and comparing the several devises and bequests to the daughters with each other, it is obviously the meaning and intention of the testator to place them on an equal footing, and likewise to make some provision for their children after their deaths. We are therefore of opinion that to give effect to his intentions the word "her" should be construed "their." In so doing every clause of the will will have its due operation, and a contrary construction would totally defeat the intention of the testator.

As that part of the personal estate which came to the possession of complainant's husband has never been subdivided agreeable to the will, in order to ascertain the fourth that Mr. Keith became entitled to on marriage, decreed that ——— be appointed commissioners to divide the same into two equal parts or shares; one of which shares to be retained by complainant for her use during life, and at her death to go to the heirs of her body, agreeable to the will of testator: and the other part is to be considered as belonging to the estate of her deceased husband, and be disposed of accordingly, being liable to his debts; and that defendant do pay the costs of this suit.

---

1 Desaus. 355

Case XCII.

Present—Chancellors Mathews, Rutledge and Hunt.

WILLIAM REYNOLDS v. The Executors of A. CALDER, Executor of H. Bailey.

(June, 1794.)

[Husband and Wife ⇐11.]

A bequest to daughters payable to them at sixteen years, or day of marriage: one of them marries, and the legacy is paid to her husband, he giving bond to refund if she died without issue. She had issue which died, and then she died. This was a vested legacy, and being reduced to possession by the husband, he is entitled to keep it, and not bound to refund.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 53; Dec. Dig. ⇐11.]

[Wills ⇐593.]

A devise of real estate to daughters, but if all his children should die leaving no lawful issue, then limited over to others. The limitation is good.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1307; Dec. Dig. ⇐593.]

The bill states that Henry Bailey, the complainant's testator, executed his last will on the 7th day of November, 1784, wherein he desired that his personal estate might be sold at public vendue, and divided amongst his family, consisting of his wife and three daughters, share and share alike; his wife to receive her part immediately on his decease, and his daughters their parts at the *age of 16 years, or the day of marriage, which should first happen; but in case any of his children should die before they attained the age of 16 years, or the day of marriage, then their parts or portions should go to his surviving children or child: and further, that when his youngest daughter should attain the age of 16 years or the day of marriage, then his real estate should be sold at public vendue, and the monies arising from such sale, to be equally divided share and share alike amongst his three daughters, to them and each of them and their heirs forever. "But if it should so happen that all his children should die, leaving no lawful issue of their body, then one half of their estates and portions he gave and bequeathed to his loving wife Mary Bailey and her heirs forever; and the other half to his loving nephew Archibald Calder, and to his heirs forever. That the said Henry Bailey constituted the said Archibald Calder, Andrew Townsend, and James Clarke, executors. That the said Henry Bailey soon after died, leaving his will in full force and virtue. That the said Archibald Calder was the only qualified executor of said will. That after the decease of the said Henry Bailey, two of his daughters, Mary and Elizabeth, departed this life under the age of 16 years, unmarried, and without issue; whereby their shares of the said estates became vested in the surviving daughter. That the said surviving daughter Sarah Bailey, intermarried with the complainant, who became thereby entitled to the legacies bequeathed to his said wife. That some time in the month of July, 1774, the said Archibald having previously sold and disposed of the real and personal estate of the said Henry Bailey, came to a settlement with the complainant William Reynolds, and they agreed that the said William Reynolds was entitled to receive the sum of £6339 5s. 4d. current money of the (then) province: that upon application made to said Archibald Calder to make payment of said legacy, he refused, unless the complainant William Reynolds would execute proper deeds and bonds obliging the complainant to return the amount of said legacy in case his wife died without leaving lawful issue. That the complainant not knowing the said Archibald to *be a residuary legatee to one half of said estate, and reposing confidence in his integrity, executed a certain deed, demanded by said Archibald, bearing date 26th July, 1774, whereby he bound himself to said Archibald to return and repay the said sum of money in case the said Sarah his wife died leaving no lawful issue; and also entered into a bond in the penal sum of £6339 5s. 4d. on the said 26th July, 1774, for the performance of the above condition; that thereupon the complainant received payment of his legacy; and that he had issue born alive by his said wife Sarah, some time in the month of , A. D. 1784, which lived about six months and departed this life. That the complainant's wife departed this life in the year 1789, without leaving any issue alive. That Mary Bailey, the wife of Henry Bailey, hath departed this life after the death of her said daughter Sarah, and leaving three children by her second husband, Mr. Eddings; and that the said Archibald Calder hath also departed this life A. D. 1777, leaving a son a minor, and a daughter, and appointed Ephraim Mikell, Thomas Whally, Ralph Bailey, and Joseph Seabrook, executors of his last will and testament. That since the death of the said Archibald Calder and Mary Bailey, widow of Henry Bailey, and of Sarah, the complainant's wife, a suit has been commenced by the executors of said Archibald, against the complainant William Reynolds, on the aforesaid bond, in the court of common pleas, in Beaufort district, which suit is now at issue depending for trial in said court and district. The bill therefore prays a perpetual injunction, as the complainant contends the limitation over is too remote to take effect; and that he ought not to have been required to give the said bond.

*356

*357

The executors of Archibald Calder, executor of Henry Bailey, admitted all the facts stated in the bill of complainant; but they contended that as Sarah, the daughter of Henry Bailey, and wife of complainant William Reynolds, died without leaving any issue alive, the limitation over took effect; and the defendant's testator, Archibald Calder, being a residuary legatee, they hope they may be permitted to continue to prosecute this suit at law, and *that the bill may be dismissed with costs. The case came to a hearing, and was argued by Mr. Ford for complainant—and General Pinckney and Mr. Rutledge for defendant.

*358

Mr. Ford. The testator meant to make a distinction between his real and personal estate. The first clause makes a complete bequest, and ought not to be affected by the subsequent restrictive clause, which relates to the real estate. The time of vesting of the real estate is different from that of the personal estate. The personal was to vest when his children reached 16 years of age or day of marriage. The real, not till all his children should die without issue. This is such an indefinite failure of issue, as is too remote and void.

Mr. E. Rutledge and General Pinckney for defendant. The limitation over is not too remote: it is within the rule of a life or lives, in being, and 21 years of age. See Fearne, 353. 1 P. Wms. 663, Forth v. Chapman. And many cases decided in this court—Sams and Mathews—Elliott and Elliott—Logan and Ladson, and Keating and Reynolds in the common pleas.

The question arises on the will of H. Bailey, father of complainant's late wife. It is, whether the words of limitation contained in the 2d clause, pervaded the 1st clause, so as to render bequests contained in the 1st clause, subject to the limitations in the 2d, notwithstanding they are very different from the limitations of the 1st clause, or whether the 2d clause was not so totally distinct, both as to the property conveyed, and the limitations, as to make them totally different. By the 1st clause, the testator directed his personal estate to be equally divided between his wife and three daughters, M. S. and E. to them, and each of them, and their heirs forever. The wife to receive her portion immediately after his decease, and the daughters theirs at the age of 16 years, or day of marriage; and if any of them should die before the age of 16, or day of marriage, their portion to go to the survivors. The 2d clause begins with an "item," and goes on to provide, that when testator's youngest daughter should attain 16 years of age, or day of mar*riage, "then all my real estate shall be sold, and the money equally divided between my daughters M. S. and E. to them and their heirs forever." "But if all my children die, leaving no lawful issue of their body, then one half of their estates and portions I give to my wife and her heirs forever; and the other half to my nephew Archibald Calder and his heirs forever." Two of the daughters died under 16 years of age and unmarried; one of them attained 16 years of age, and married the complainant W. Reynolds, and then died without issue. The husband filed this bill to recover the personal estate bequeathed under the 1st clause to the three daughters. The 1st clause is a complete disposition by the testator of so much of his estate, as was comprehended in the clause to his daughters, who, in certain contingencies, were to have benefit of survivorship. The question is, do the limitations in the 2d clause which spoke of different property, defeat the 1st estate under the 1st clause, by converting the estate bequeathed to the daughters in the 1st clause, into a mere life estate, with limitations to the wife and nephew. The use of the word item, in a will, is construed a conjunctive, as and, or also, to connect sentences together. It has never been construed a disjunctive, but is only made use of to distinguish the clauses of the will. See 1 Atkins, 438. The 1st clause not only designates a distinct estate and property from the 2d, but all the parties are not the same. The court cannot think then they are bound by any rule of law to connect these clauses, so as to attach the limitations of the 2d clause, which are very different from those of the 1st, to the property contained in the 1st; nor does it appear that testator meant to do so—but rather the contrary. And as one of the daughters did attain 16 and day of marriage, and also survived her sisters, the court is of opinion that she took all the property contained in the 1st clause, not controlled by the words of 2d clause, and on her death without issue, it goes to her husband. The other clause takes effect, and the property goes over to the wife and the nephew. Decreed accordingly, and costs divided.

*359

---

1 Desaus. *360

*Case XCII.

Present—Chancellors Mathews, Rutledge and Hunt.

WILLIAM WASHINGTON and Wife, and R. BERESFORD, v. BENJAMIN HUGER.

(June, 1794.)

[Descent and Distribution ⟸84.]

A father who was tenant by courtesy sold his son's land in fee simple and received the price. To secure the purchaser he gave him a bond of indemnity and a mortgage of other land of his own. The son claims his land: the heirs of the purchaser file a bill to have the benefit of the indemnity bond and security. The father's estate being insolvent, a judgment creditor sold the land, but subject to the said mortgage, and bought it in. The son being willing to accept an indemnity for his land, and make titles to the purchaser, the court decreed that he should be paid out of the sales of the mortgaged land the amount of the price received by his father, and interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. § 324; Dec. Dig. ⟸ 84.]

[Certiorari ⟸35.]

[Certiorari does not lie to remove a cause commenced in the court of a state against an inhabitant of such state, by a foreign citizen, to the circuit court of the United States.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Certiorari, Cent. Dig. § 47; Dec. Dig. ⟸35.]

[Damages ⟸67.]

[The court of equity has power to allow interest by way of damages, although it cannot assess damages eo nomine.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 135; Dec. Dig. ⟸67.]

[Infants ⟸30.]

[An infant, who brings a suit for the recovery of land within the time allowed to infants, cannot be deemed guilty of laches in the prosecution of his claim.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. ⟸30.]

On the marriage of the defendant's father, major Benjamin Huger, to defendant's mother, he became possessed in her right of a plantation on the Horse Shoe, and at her death he held the same as tenant by courtesy, and for her children in fee. In 1772 he sold said land in fee simple to Charles Elliott: and to secure him an indemnity, in case his title should be questioned and destroyed by his (Huger's) son, (on whom the land descended) he gave bond, in penalty of £52,000 currency, with condition to pay £26,000 on such event, and gave a mortgage of a plantation called Richmond, on Pedee. Major B. Huger died in 1779, (killed in front of the lines of Charleston, opposing the enemy then besieging Charleston,) and left his son Benjamin a minor, who attained his age of twenty-one years in 1789. C. Elliott died in 1781, and devised his said plantation at Horse Shoe to his wife (now Mrs. Beresford) and to his daughter (now Mrs. Washington.) Young Benjamin Huger returned to Carolina from abroad in 1791, and brought his action to recover his land (so sold by his father) in 1792. Whereupon this bill was filed by the complainants, to foreclose the equity of redemption on the mortgage of the Richmond plantation, and that out of the sales of that place so much as the Horse Shoe land had been sold for, to Elliott, should be paid to defendant, with an allowance for the use of the plantation; and that thereupon defendant should execute good titles for the Horse Shoe land to complainants. Major Huger died insolvent, and Hamilton, a creditor of major Huger, (the youngest judgment creditor) had seized and sold the Richmond place at Pedee, subject, however, expressly, to the claims of the complainants and of defendant—and Hamilton has endeavored to remove the cause by certiorari to the courts of the United States; having been first let in to this court, on petition, *to protect his rights as a creditor. This court positively refused to obey the certiorari on reasons fully given.†

*361

Mr. B. Huger, the son, having established his right at law to the land sold by his father, (under an issue directed by the court) the cause came to a hearing.

Mr. E. Rutledge and General Pinckney, for Mr. B. Huger, the defendant, contended that there could not be any question about the reimbursement of the principal sum, or price of the land sold by the father of the defendant. The father, conscious that he had no legal title to the fee simple, (being only a tenant by the curtesy) gave a mortgage of another tract of land, his own absolute *property, to indemnify the purchaser, if ever the son should question the title. Young Mr. Huger finding his father's estate ruined by the war, and he himself charged with the money spent on his education, does question the title, and shews his clear right of inheritance under his mother. He must recover. The heirs of the purchaser then file a bill to enforce their mortgage and indemnify themselves. It is of no consequence to the creditors of Major B. Huger, whether the son takes his land, and the mortgagee is indemnified by the sale of Richmond, or that

*362

†This case of Washington and Beresford v. B. Huger, being dependent in the court of chancery, Mr. Hamilton, British consul at Norfolk, and a creditor of the late Major Benj. Huger, who had forced the sale of the Richmond land, pending this suit, and had become the purchaser, petitioned the court to be let in to protect his rights; and he was allowed to come in as a party to the proceedings. Afterwards, and before the trial of the case, he obtained a certiorari from the circuit court of the United States to remove the cause from this court to the circuit court of the United States. This writ was served on the court, and after time taken to deliberate, the court refused to obey the certiorari, and gave the following reasons for its determination.—By the court. The suit pending in the court is between citizens. An alien applies by petition to be allowed to come in and defend his interests. This was granted. Since which he has obtained a certiorari to remove the cause up to the circuit court of the United States. A writ of certiorari is a writ issued by a superior to an inferior jurisdiction, commanding the removal of a cause from the latter to the former court. But this is not an inferior court to that whence the mandate issues. No law of the United States declares it inferior, or impeaches its equality. All that the judiciary act of congress provides for, is, to give a party defendant, who is not a citizen of the state where the suit is instituted, a right to apply by petition to this court to have the cause removed into the court of the United States. That is the form prescribed, and that excludes other forms not provided by the act. This does not warrant the use of the mandatory form of a certiorari. But it is said that the power given to the courts of the United States to issue "all other necessary writs" includes the use of this writ and warrants it. This is denied. The act of congress has previously pointed out the mode of proceeding for the removal of a cause from this court to the court of the United States, which has jurisdiction, viz. by filing a petition on entering the application for the removal of the cause. It could not be intended that the same purpose might be effected by a totally different process, under a few general and loose words in another *part of the act. The court acts under the sanction of an oath to obey the laws of the United States as well as those of the state under whose authority the court sits and acts. Looking to those laws, the court is of opinion, that the writ of certiorari, now presented, is not warranted by the words of the acts of congress, or by any reasonable construction of them. The court is therefore not bound to pay any regard to it—Nor would the court have obeyed a writ of certiorari, if it had been issued by the supreme court of the United States, to remove the cause thither, because that court has only appellate jurisdiction (see 22d section of the judiciary act) after final decrees and judgments, in cases determined in the circuit courts, brought there by original process, or removed there from the courts of the several states, or by appeal from the district courts. And the supreme court has no appellate jurisdiction in cases determinable in the state courts, between citizens of the same state, except in the case of a title to land, where the parties, though citizens of the same state, derive title under grants from different states.

*362

The act of congress directs, that where a suit is commenced in a state court, by a citizen of

Mr. Huger, the son, consents to give up his land on his being paid the amount for which it sold. He and the *mortgagee must be first satisfied. But the interest is disputed: not however on any good ground. His right to the land accrued the moment his father died, and the tenancy by curtesy was ended. But he has been kept out of his right by the purchaser, who would not and could not safely deliver him the possession till his right was legally established. Having the right, those who kept him from the enjoyment of it are bound to account to him for the rents and profits. Whoever enters on the estate of a minor must account, as a guardian, for the rents and profits. 1 Atk. 484,/ Morgan v. Morgan; decided by Lord Hardwicke in 1737. Major B. Huger's creditors stand only in his shoes. He sold his son's estate without a title in himself. He, or his estate, would be bound to account, for such sale was a forfeiture of the tenancy by the curtesy. See Co. Litt. 251. 2 Bacon. 259. The counsel also quoted Comyn, 244. 2 Vern. 608. 1 Vern. 252. 2 Vesey, 590. 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 280, as to infancy. 2 Vern. 368, as to laches. 3 Atk. 130, as to rents and profits. In cases of account both parties are actors. Eq. Cas. abr. 93, as to surety.

*363

Young Mr. Huger having been obliged to repay all the advances made from his father's estate for his education, has a most perfect right to insist on all his rights, and to require an account for the rents and profits of his plantation whilst it was held by the purchasers: and they have a right to be indemnified out of the mortgaged premises, given expressly to protect them against these claims. Hamilton, the creditor, has no title to favor. He forced the sale of Richmond pending this suit, though the youngest judgment creditor, and he bought in on speculation: he is therefore in the light of a purchaser with knowledge of the incumbrance, and must submit to all its effects. There has been no laches in Mr. Huger. He attained twenty-one in 1789, returned from Europe in 1791, and has made his claims in less time than is allowed to minors to institute suits. He might have been obliged to have gone to the court of law to recover mesne profits; but the complainants have a right to come here *to foreclose their mortgage and his rights come in incidentally.

*364

For Mr. Hamilton it was contended, by Mr. Read and Mr. Ford, that Elliott knew he was buying a bad title; therefore he and his representatives are entitled to less damages; and Huger, the son, coming in on their ground, is entitled to no more. Huger's claims are for rents and profits, and he should seek his remedy at law; this court cannot give damages. If he had sued Elliott's executors for mesne profits, he could only have recovered rents, and not interest, which is much greater. The executors had no right to charge him for his education. Huger was of age in 1789, and arrived at home in 1791. There has been laches in claiming his rights. Major Huger, the father, had a life estate in the land; therefore an allowance should be made for it.

The court afterwards delivered its judgment as follows:

It was contended that the defendant should not be allowed interest for the detention of his land, because he has been guilty of laches in not pursuing his claim earlier. To this the court answered, that having brought his suit within the time allowed to minors, he was not guilty of laches. The 2d objection is, that the defendant should not be allowed the sum for which his land sold, with interest thereon; but that he should be referred to the court of law to ascertain his damages for the detention and use of his land. To this objection (made by a creditor) the court answered, that there was no necessity nor propriety in driving Mr. Benj. Huger, the son, to his action at law for rents and profits, or damages. His father had given a mortgage of Richmond to indemnify complainants' testator, in case their title was ever questioned by his son. The son has claimed his inheritance, and the complainants have filed their bill to foreclose the mortgage to indemnify themselves. The defendant was willing to accept, out of the sales of the Richmond plantation, repayment of what his land at the Horse Shoe had been actually sold for by his father, with compensation for the use of the land, and then to make good titles to *complainants for the Horse Shoe land. This is a fair and reasonable arrangement. Creditors cannot interfere to prevent its completion. The creditors could stand on no better ground than Major Huger himself as to this land, and the court would have compelled him to pay his son the value of his land improperly sold. Under the bond of indemnity given in this case, with the mortgage of Richmond, the court can and that state, against an alien or a citizen of another state, on the defendant's entering his appeal, filing his petition, and offering security, on the first day of the term, the state court shall proceed no further in the cause. The present party has not pursued the course prescribed by the law; he has not applied by petition, nor offered security—the court therefore will pay no regard to the unauthorized course he has pursued, of obtaining a certiorari; but will proceed with the cause under consideration as the laws of the state authorize.

*365

It appears, by a note of Chancellor Mathews, on his brief, that in some shape this question was discussed before the federal court, and that "the federal court on the appeal to them determined that Hamilton, having appeared in this court, by his petition (to be heard) has made his election into what court he would go; and having acknowledged the jurisdiction of this court, that (the federal court) would not take cognizance of the cause."

will direct the allowance of legal interest, as the compensation for the use of the land. The bond of indemnity ascertains the sum for which the land was sold by Major Huger to Mr. Elliott; and this, with the interest, is the true compensation. The executors of Major Huger have obliged his son Benjamin to repay the money expended, out of his father's estate, on his education, with interest, because the estate of his father was insolvent: there is therefore no claim on him to yield any of his rights. Another objection is, that this court cannot assess damages. This is true—but it may allow interest as a compensation, if it be an adequate one.

The next point submitted was, that as Major Huger lived seven years after the sale to C. Elliott, an allowance should be made for his tenancy by the curtesy; but the court saw no ground for this. Major Huger sold the land for the full value, got all the money, and had the use of it during his whole life, which was the extent of his tenancy by curtesy. It was therefore decreed that the defendant should be paid out of the sales of the Richmond land £3714. being the amount of the sale of his Horse Shoe land, with interest from the death of Major Huger, until paid. That Benjamin Huger, the defendant, account for the rents of the Richmond place, or for so much as he used or cultivated. That Benjamin Huger the defendant, on being paid, as above directed, do make and execute good conveyances to complainants of the Horse Shoe land in fee simple. That the creditor Hamilton, who was let into this case (on his petition) do comply with the decree out of the sales of the Richmond place, of which he became the purchaser, or that the same be resold for the purpose of raising the money for the defendant.

---

1 Desaus. *366

*Case XCIV.

Present—Chancellors Mathews, Rutledge and Hunt.

JOHN F. GRIMKE v. the Executors of J. P. GRIMKE.

(June, 1794.)

[Wills ⇐86.]

A father promised by letter to his son to convey a particular house to him, but afterwards substituted and conveyed another of less value, which the son accepted and occupied. The court will not, after the father's death, enforce the original promise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 206-220; Dec. Dig. ⇐86.]

[Executors and Administrators ⇐202.]

The father's estate decreed to pay the son a legacy derived aliunde, and which had got into the father's hands.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 730, 738-745, 748, 754, 763; Dec. Dig. ⇐ 202.]

[Executors and Administrators ⇐267.]

Interest allowed on it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1032-1043; Dec. Dig. ⇐267.]

[Wills ⇐30, 482.]

A husband assenting to his wife's making a will of personal estate, manifested by its being in his handwriting, and disposing of her separate estates, is a sufficient authority to support such will, though not republished after his death; but such will does not pass the wife's proportion of her husband's estate, which she acquired on his death. Such proportion is distributable.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Ward v. Glenn, 9 Rich. 130.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 64, 1009; Dec. Dig. ⇐30, 482.]

[Wills ⇐734.]

The legacies to a wife, as a separate estate from her husband, and which she disposes of by her will, do not bear interest. The husband had got possession of them, and is not accountable for arrears.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1847-1872; Dec. Dig. ⇐734.]

[Executors and Administrators ⇐202.]

Father promises by letter to give his son £2000 on his marriage; his estate decreed to pay it with interest from the marriage, though he had alleged that his estate was deteriorated, and that his son had agreed to take less.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in McKeegan v. O'Neill, 22 S. C. 467.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 730, 738-745, 748, 754, 763; Dec. Dig. ⇐202.]

[Husband and Wife ⇐144.]

[The husband, who used a fund which was by will to be invested for his wife, who had power of appointment by will, is liable to the appointee for interest only from the wife's death.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 551; Dec. Dig. ⇐144.]

The bill states that Mary Faucheraud, the complainant's grand mother, was seized and possessed of a considerable estate, and made her last will on the 27th May, 1763, wherein, amongst other things, she bequeathed £600. of the then currency, to her son-in-law, J. P. Grimke, to be put to interest, and improved by him, and finally to be paid to her three grand children; £400. thereof, with the increase, to John F. Grimke the complainant, and the other £200. to her two grand daughters. She further bequeathed £7000. of the then currency to the said J. P. Grimke in trust, to improve the same, and to pay the interest to her daughter Mary Grimke; and ultimately to pay the said £7000. to and among such of the said Mary Grimke's children, and in such proportions, manner and way, with such limitations as she should direct, by virtue of any deed or will, attested by two witnesses, and executed by her whether covert or single; and for want of such appointment, to be equally divided among all the children of her body, and the issue of any who might be deceased. And the said Mary F. Grimke died, leaving the said will in full force, and her son-in-law J. P.

Grimke obtained possession of the sums aforesaid. That in the year 1788, after complainant had attained 21 years of age, his father, without solicitation, tendered to complainant an old debt due to him by Ch. and J. Wright, whose estates were confiscated, in satisfaction of the legacy of £400. and interest; and complainant being accustomed to pay implicit obedience to his father, and being very dependent on him, and supposing the debt good, accepted the same, and gave a receipt for the legacy. But learning afterwards that the estates of Ch. and J. Wright were insolvent, he returned all the papers to his father and stated his reason for doing so. That complainant's grand father Gideon Faucheraud, in and by his last will dated the 27th December, 1751, bequeathed £5000. cur*rency to be put out to interest by his executors, and the interest paid to his daughter Mary Grimke; and at her death to be paid to such persons as she should direct by her last will, or other writing, executed in the presence of two witnesses, whether covert or single; and for want of such appointment to and among the issue of her body, which said will he left in full force at his death. That complainant's father J. P. Grimke was seized and possessed of a considerable estate, and particularly of a dwelling house in Meeting-street, numbered 101, and being so seized, did, on the 12th July, 1785, make his last will and testament, wherein and whereby he, amongst other things, bequeathed to his wife three slaves, "which said slaves, with every thing else I gave to her, she may dispose of as she pleases." He also devised to her the house No. 101, in Meeting-street, with his plate and furniture, during her life; and after her death he devised the said house No. 101, to his daughter Mary Grimke, and her heirs. He also devised to his son, the complainant, the house No. 100, in Meeting-street, for which he had previously given titles to his son, at his own desire. And after several other devises and regulations, he bequeaths the rest of his estate to his wife and his two daughters; stating that he had already provided fully and sufficiently for his son, the complainant. The testator also states that it had been his intention to have given his son, the complainant, £2000. on his marriage, but as his fortune had suffered materially by the depreciation of indents and other losses, he hoped he would be satisfied with what he had done for him, and left him in addition a mourning ring. The bill charges that the testator died on the 9th January, 1791, leaving his will in full force; and the defendants have qualified as executors, and possessed themselves of the estate. That by the said will, the complainant's sister Mary, appears to have acquired a title to the house in Meeting-street, No. 101; but the complainant contends that he is equitably entitled to the same; and that it ought to be vested in him on his conveying to her the house and lot No. 100, in the same street, which he is willing to do, because complainant's father had often promised that *complainant should have the house No. 101, at his death and his wife's; and in a letter of the 26th October, 1782, he writes to complainant—"if you can contrive the deeds for my house I now live in (which was the No. 101) in such a manner as to come to you, and to be entirely your own property after my and your mother's death, then have them drawn, and I will execute them when you come to town." And in another letter, the next day he recognizes and confirms his promise. That complainant drew the deed and delivered it to his father for perusal and execution; and after some time he did execute a deed, but it was a conveyance of house and lot No. 100, to complainant, and not of No. 101, according to his promises; and complainant's father at that time required of him a defeasance, so that complainant might not be entitled to both houses. A copy of what he gave is as follows:—"I hereby promise to deliver up to Miss Mary Grimke, the house No. 100, in Meeting-street, for which I have received a deed of gift from Mr. J. P. Grimke, whenever I shall be put in possession of the No. 101, in which the said Mr. J. P. Grimke now lives, &c. the original of which must be among the papers of the late Mr. John P. Grimke." Complainant states that being about to marry with Miss Mary Smith, daughter of Mr. Thomas Smith, complainant's father to induce his consent thereto, promised the said Thomas Smith, in a letter he wrote to him, that he would give his son £2000. sterling. Whereupon, the said Thomas Smith consented to the marriage, which took effect. That complainant has never received any part of the said £2000. That his father soon after his marriage tendered him specialties and indents for the said £2000. but complainant conceiving it would be an imposition on his father-in-law, declined receiving them. That complainant's mother Mary did, on the 8th of February, 1786, in the life time of her husband, make and execute her last will and testament, by which she did, among other things, bequeath to complainant two guineas, and to her two daughters Mary and Ann, all her property, jewels, servants, &c. and also the legacies left her by her father and mother, with all the rest and resi*due of her estate, to be equally divided between her said daughters; and she died leaving said will in full force; and Mary Grimke, one of the legatees, and executrixes, has qualified on said will, and possessed herself of the estate; and she and the executors of complainant's father, refuse to do him justice in the premises, and to pay him what is justly due to him out of the estates of his said father and mother; and refuse to let him into the possession of the house and lot No. 101, which he is entitled to on his making titles to the lot No. 100. The bill prays for relief.

*367

*368

*369

To the complainant's bill, the defendant, Mary Grimke, pleaded the statute of frauds and perjuries, as to the claim of complainant, for the house and lot No. 101, in Meeting-street, which her father devised to her. The defendants also, for answer to the complainant's bill, admit that the grand father and grand mother, and father and mother of the complainant, made the several wills stated by him in his bill, and that J. P. Grimke got the monies of the several legacies bequeathed as stated. The defendants admit that J. P. Grimke may have offered and paid the legacy of £400. currency to complainant, by transferring his claim on the estates of Ch. and J. Wright, which was for a larger sum, and from which complainant doubtless expected an advantage; and they admit they found complainant's letter and conditional receipt, dated 16th December, 1784, for said debt, as, and towards satisfaction of said legacy. But they found a memorandum in the hand writing of Mr. J. P. Grimke, on said letter, bearing date the 16th of April, 1788, in these words—"My son let this money for the legacy be deducted out of Olyphant's bond (which he had given him some years before in advancement) as also of any other demands he might have." And they find among said papers complainant's receipt in full for said legacy, dated 28th July, 1785, which they rely on as an acquittance; though the demand on Wright's estate was lost. The defendants further insist, that the house No. 101, in Meeting-street, vested in the devisee Mary Grimke, under the will of her father, and cannot be shaken by the loose communi-

*370

ca*tions between a father and a son, never perfected or carried into execution. That the defendants know nothing of any defeasance, nor have they formed any such paper as stated by complainant; nor do they believe that after Mr. J. P. Grimke the testator, executed titles to his son for the house No. 100, that he ever intended to give him house No. 101, which he expressly devises to his daughter Mary. Defendant admits that J. P. Grimke may have written the letter to Mr. Thomas Smith, which is stated by complainant as an inducement to his consent to the marriage of complainant with his daughter, in which he promised to give his son a fortune of £2000. sterling. But the defendants contend "that their testator J. P. Grimke only intended to give him so much money on such securities as he then possessed; for to the knowledge of two of the defendants, had J. P. Grimke paid such sum in cash, (£2000.) he must, in order to raise the same, not only have sold the greater part of his securities, but also part of his real estate," from the difficulty of getting money at that time on old debts, and the low value of securities. That defendants were well informed, and believe the letter of J. P. Grimke to Thomas Smith was written, and the promise to give £2000. made under a special agreement between J. P. Grimke and complainant, to pay the same in specialties; and also by complainants offer in case he had no issue at his death, that the said £2000. was to be returned to J. P. Grimke's family. The defendants submit how far the complainant's not executing a bond to secure the return of the £2000. to the father, in case of complainant's death without issue, and how far his refusal to receive specialties and indents offered to him by his father, ought to bar the claim of the £2000. and interest thereon. The defendants insist that the testator made his will deliberately, and on a full knowledge of his affairs, and upon a conviction that he had done enough for his son, and that what remained of his fortune was properly due to his wife and daughters. The defendants insist that the will of Mrs. Mary Grimke, the mother of complainant, executed on the 8th February, 1786, by which she bequeathed all the property at her disposal (un*der the several wills of her father, mother, &c.) to her daughter, was made with the consent of her husband, (in whose hand writing the original draught was) and they submit that such consent gave her the power to make such will. And also that Mary Grimke having survived her husband, without revoking her will, the same amounted to a republication of the will made whilst she was under coverture. Defendants admit that they have not admitted complainant to the benefit of any distributive shares of the estates of his father or mother, because their wills bequeathed the same wholly to the two daughters, and complainant has no right to any part of said estates. And defendants state, that J. P. Grimke acknowledged himself in writing to be very largely indebted to his wife and daughter for the legacies he had received, and monies borrowed by him from them, which must be paid before complainant could claim any division of the estates, even if he had any rights therein. Defendants deny complainant's allegation, that he offered to convey the house No. 100, to his sister, but if it had been made, it would have been refused. Defendants set up various discounts against the demands of the complainant for supplies, and deny all combination, &c. This cause came to a hearing before the court, when the following evidence was produced, as taken from the minutes of Chancellor Mathews:

*371

Letters from J. P. Grimke to John F. Grimke, dated 26th and 27th October, 1782, relative to the house and lot No. 101; also, the titles for the house and lot No. 100.

J. P. Grimke's letter, promising £2000. sterling on his son's marriage (without date.)

A statement of what was assigned by J. P. Grimke, and what was actually received.

A copy of Mrs. Mary Grimke's will, in the handwriting of her husband.

Letters from J. P. Grimke, of 16th December, 1784; of the 16th July, 1785; 16th of April, 1786, and 7th of February, 1788.

A statement of account due by J. P. Grimke, to Mary Grimke.

*372

*Deeds drawn but not executed, from J. P. Grimke to J. F. Grimke, for the house and lot No. 101.

J. P. Grimke's account of what had been expended by him on his son.

Note of hand of J. P. Grimke, to his daughter Mrs. Coslett, for £2000, dated 1st of January, 1785; and note to his daughter Mary for £2000, same date.

An acknowledgment from J. P. Grimke, on the back of a bond to his wife, for £3700, for the legacies that had been left to his wife.

General C. C. Pinckney for complainant argued, that the letters from the father to the son, promising to convey the house and lot No. 101, formed a contract, which was voluntary indeed, but binding on a father making a provision for a child; and the court will even supply a defect in such voluntary conveyance. 1 Vern. 40, Thompson v. Attfield. See Cowper, 710. The release of J. F. Grimke, to his father J. P. Grimke, of the house and lot No. 101, for one of very inferior value, No. 100, was a mere submission to parental authority, and not the exercise of a perfect free will; and the court will lay hold of the circumstances stated, to replace the son in his rights. A release obtained unduly by a father, will be set aside in equity. 1 P. Wms. 641, 639. Courts of equity consider that done which was agreed to be done. 2 Powell, 56, 7, 9. The case of Clavering and Clavering, 2 Vern. 473, is much stronger than the present, where the first voluntary engagement was supported, notwithstanding subsequent arrangements by the father. This doctrine is supported by Lord Hardwicke, who is followed by the modern writers. Powell on Powers, 204, 5. It is the business of courts of equity to relieve against lapse of time. See 2 Powell on Contr. 272, 3. But complainant had no right to claim the fulfilment of the promise for the house No. 101, till the death of both his father and mother; for his father's letters expressly fix that time for the commencement of his rights. Such cases are out of the operation of the statute of frauds. See 1 Eq. Cas. abridged, 22. 1 Vernon, 110.

*373

*With respect to the legacies from the grand father and grand mother, to the mother, which came into Mr. J. P. Grimke's hands, interest ought not to be allowed on them out of his estate. It is quite settled that the wife cannot, after the death of the husband, recover the arrears of her separate estate for more than one year. See Powell v. Hankey and Cox, 2 P. Wms. 82. Thomas v. Bennett, 2 P. Wms. 341. Fowler v. Fowler, 3 P. Wms. 355. Lord Townsend v. Wyndham, 2 Vesey, sen. 7. Peacock v. Monk, 2 Vesey, sen. 190. Nor should the legacies put into the treasury and sunk, or greatly depreciated, be made good out of Mr. J. P. Grimke's estate. Brown v. Litton. 1 P. Wms. 141, 648. Mrs. Mary Grimke, the mother, could not make a will, and dispose of her separate estate, as she has done to her daughters to the exclusion of her son the complainant. As a feme covert she could not make a will by our laws. See public laws, 138, 149. If the wife outlives the husband, and does not actually confirm her will made in his life time, it will not be good. 4 Burn's Eccles. Law, 47, Clavering v. Clavering. 2 Vernon, 474 (though that relates to a will of real estate.) With respect to the promise of 2000*l.* on the marriage of the son, there can be no doubt of its being obligatory on the father. Marriage is the highest consideration in law. 2 Atk. 158, 9. 2 Powell on Contr. 26; and children are a party to it. A contract or agreement may be supported by blood or natural affection. 1 Powell on Contr. 361. A letter will, in equity amount to an agreement. 1 Powell on Contr. 288, Moor v. Hart. 2 Rep. Chanc. 147. 1 Vern. 201. 2 Ventr. 361. A mother agreed to give her daughter a portion, and only signed the marriage articles as a witness. This was held sufficient to bind her. 1 Wilson, 118, Wilford v. Buzely. Children are purchasers on good consideration; and equity will dispense with the form of the instrument. Powell on Powers, 163, 183, 4. Equity will decree any contract, which ought in foro conscientiœ, to be carried into specific execution. See 2 Powell on Contr. 10. Strange, 456. As to the time of payment, when a person promises and fixes no time, the money must be paid presently. 1 Powell on *Contr. 180, 260. Therefore, the 2000*l.* ought to bear interest from the day of complainant's marriage. A clandestine agreement, if such had been made, which is denied, to return a part of the portion, is void, as a fraud on the other party. 2 Powell, 165. 1 Eq. Cas. 88. 1 Vern. 348. 2 Eq. Cases, 187, 585. 1 P. Wms. 121, 496. 1 Vern. 475, Gale v. Lindo. Where a parent is of ability, he is not at liberty to charge his children for maintenance and education (even when they have separate estates.) See 1 Bro. C. C. 370, Hughes v. Hughes.

*374

Mr. Read and Mr. Pringle for defendants argued, that the complainant's acceptance of the conveyance of the house and lot No. 100, being subsequent to the letter of the father, promising to convey house and lot No. 101, is a bar to his present claim of the latter. Complainant was free to accept the exchange or substitution of the one for the other. He did in fact accept it, and recorded the deed for the house No. 100, as late as the 1st March, 1784, so that he acted with deliberation. And there is no proof of any undue means or influence used by the father to induce the son's acceptance of the one house for the other; and that will not be presumed. The proposition to settle the £2000 on the marriage, originally came from the father to the son. It is a voluntary agreement, which, though regarded by equity, is not put on so high a ground as agreements on valuable consideration. See 2 Powell, 221. 1 Powell, 340. 2 Stra. 138. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 52. 2 Comyn's digest, 571. The will of Mrs. Mary Grimke being in the hand writing of her husband, it is an assent by him to her exercising that power; and it is a good disposition to her daughter of all the property she had a right to bequeath. As to the interest on the 2000*l.* no time is specified, and no interest is allowable till demand made, which is from the filing this bill.

Mr. E. Rutledge for complainant. His claims are for the house No. 101; his grand mother's legacy of £400; the £2000 marriage portion, and interest from the marriage. Also, to his proportionate share of several legacies to his mother, which his father had reduced to possession, and the wife had no right to dispose of them by *her will. Complainant is also entitled to a third part, being a distributive share of Mrs. Mary Grimke's (his mother) estate. She was entitled to one third of J. P. Grimke's personal estate; that surely could not pass under a will made before her husband's death, and had no relation to it. As to the house, the ground of the claim has been fully stated. As to the legacy of £400 the father had no right to direct his son to pay himself out of the bond by Olyphant, which he had previously (nearly two years) before assigned as a gift, and an advancement to his son. Besides, that bond might never be productive; it was not so at that very time. With respect to the £2000 promised on the marriage, there is not a shadow of doubt about that. The right to interest follows of course from the time of the marriage; for the object of such provision is the means of immediate subsistence; at least as far as the interest. The law prohibits married women from making wills; and when they are permitted to do so, under a power given by a third person to dispose of something, she acts merely as the attorney or appointee of such person. See 2 Atk. 661. When there is a provision for a separate maintenance, and the husband supports her, she has no right after his death to demand arrears. †

*375

†No question seems to have been made in this case, of the right of the complainant's mother to bequeath to her two daughters, in exclusion of her son (except two guineas which she bequeathed him) the whole of the legacies, which had been given to her by her mother, with authority to dispose of them by deed or will, "to and among her children, in such proportion, manner, and way, and with such limitations as she might think fit." Doubtless the able counsel who argued this case considered the words of the will, giving the power of appointment to the mother, as vesting in her an uncontrollable power over the subject, too clearly to warrant an argument against its use, or even its abuse, by a very unequal distribution. Nevertheless, the authority of the court of chancery to control and regulate the exercise of this power of appointment when abused, has been long established. Lord Chancellor Nottingham, in the case of Gibson v. Kinder, 1 Vern. 66, decreed, that the appointment was illy exercised and void, because the division made under the power was extremely unequal; and that without any good reason shewn to warrant it, and he directed an equal distribution. The same was decided in Wall v. Thurbourne, 1 Vern. 355,

*376

414. *Powers are considered as trusts in this court. See Kemp v. Kemp, 5 Vesey, 856. And the chancellors have generally followed lord Nottingham's doctrine, that this trust must be exercised justly and impartially; but its application has been found to be extremely difficult and delicate; so much so, that several of the judges in equity have been very desirous to get rid of the rule altogether; but they felt themselves too strongly bound by the authorities. It seems now to be settled, not however without some exceptions, that where a power is given to a parent to divide any property among his children, in such proportions, as he may think fit, it is required in the exercise of the power, that some proportion of the property should be given to each child; unless another adequate provision be made for the child attempted to be excluded, either by the original donor, or by the person entrusted with the power of appointment; or unless some other good reason be shewn for the exclusion. But the proportion of the property which must be given to each child, is left at law wholly, and in equity a good deal, in the discretion of the person authorised to appoint. That proportion, however, must not be so small or nominal as to be entirely illusory. It must be something substantial, or the court will interfere, and declare it void. But what that proportion must be, is unavoidably left quite undefined, and this has frequent-

*376

*Chancellor MATHEWS delivered the decree of the court:

In this case there are several claims of a distinct and separate nature. It has been stated that these claims are original or derivative, direct or collateral; that is, such as immediate engagements with, or devises to, the complainant, or such as alight upon him by mere operation of law. Of the first class is the claim upon the house No. 101, in Meeting-street. Second, of four hundred pounds, old currency, bequeathed by the last will of his grandmother, Mary Faucheraud. Third, of two thousand pounds sterling, promised by his father as a marriage portion.

John Paul Grimke, by a letter dated the 26th October, 1782, writes to his son, the complainant, as follows: "If you can contrive the deeds for my house I now live in to come to you, and be entirely your own property after my and your mother's death, then have them drawn, and I will execute them when you come to town."

The complainant, on the 7th February,

1788, writes to his father, requesting to know "which of his houses he intended for him, as he wished to tile the one which *should be his;" and the father, by his answer, confirmed to him the right in the house No. 100, of which he has since been constantly possessed. And in several letters, of dates subsequent to the father's letter, he acknowledges himself perfectly satisfied with the provision made for him by his father, though No. 100 was not the one originally spoken of, and not so valuable as No. 101.

*377

It was considered then by the court, from the whole tenor of the evidence, that this indeterminate engagement of the father, entered into from mere good will, without any special consideration moving thereto, was acquiesced in by the son; and that in satisfaction thereof, independent of other provision, he held the house No. 100, without complaint till his father's death.

2d. A legacy of four hundred pounds was left to the complainant by Mary Faucheraud, his grandmother, which came to the hands of John Paul Grimke as natural guardian of the complainant, to be kept for his advantage, and to be paid him upon his arrival at full age. This legacy was discharged by payment of an old bond of German & Charles

*378

Wright, whose estate was afterwards *confiscated, and which has since proved insolvent. The complainant gave to his father a full discharge for this legacy; but since the date of his receipt to his father the demand against the confiscated estate has been returned to the father, and since his death has been found among his papers. A letter of John Paul Grimke to the complainant has the following paragraph: "Then return me again said assignment, provided it is not recorded, and I will find some other way to pay you said legacy." And in another letter, dated April, 1788, he says, "Let this money for the legacy be deducted out of Olyphant's bond." We then cannot but consider the efficacy of the discharge rendered abortive by these subsequent undertakings of the father; more especially where it appears that the consideration for which the receipt was given, had actually failed, without any improper delay in the complainant. But it has been contended, that by the same paragraph in which he re-assumes the payment of the legacy, he has also apointed the fund out of which it shall be paid. Yet by his letter to Mr. Smith, and also in a letter of anterior date to his son, he expressly enumerates this bond as one given to his son for his advancement. We will then receive this equitable reassumption of the debt, discharged from condition of payment out of a fund, over which the father then had no control.

The next direct claim of the complainant is the sum of £2000, promised by his father as his marriage portion. It was not disputed, but that this promise had been originally made; but three grounds of objection were made by defendant's counsel. 1st. That the promise was made on condition that the complainant should assure the defendant's testator, that on failure of issue in himself, the 2000*l.* should return to the family of John Paul Grimke, which condition he never complied with. 2d, That the 2000*l.* must have been intended to be paid out of such facilities or securities as he then held, there being little or no money at that time in circulation. 3d, That in payment or discharge of the marriage portion (if decreed by the court) an account of monies advanced, and of other things given by his father, should be admitted. The first objection *was obviated by the production of John Paul Grimke's letter without date, wherein he says, "As I do not desire the bond from you to refund according to your own promise," &c. And it was also urged by the complainant's counsel on the authority of several well adjudged cases, particularly 1 Wilson, 118, Powel on Powers, 163, and Powel on Contracts, 165, that any condition annexed secretly to an agreement of this nature, whereby a third person may be imposed on, shall be void. And in this case Mr. Smith having given to his daughter 2000*l.* absolutely and unconditionally, the complainant in reason should not have been bound down to such unfair terms; if therefore the condition had not been avoided by the subsequent declaration of John Paul ly produced the greatest embarrassment to the judges in equity. The cases are collected, and the difficulty of applying the rule is stated very fully by the master of the rolls, lord Alvan*ley, in the case of Spencer and Spencer, reported in 5 Vesey, 362, and more fully in the case of Kemp and Kemp, 5 Vesey, 849, 856; and subsequently by the master of the rolls, sir William Grant, in the case of Butcher v. Butcher, reported in 9 Vesey, 382. Since which the cases of Bax v. Whitebread, 10 Vesey, 33, Maundrel v. Maundrel, 10 Vesey, 255, Burgess v. Mawby, 10 Vesey, 319, Dyke v. Sylvester, 12 Vesey, 126, and Mocatta v. Lonsada, 12 Vesey, 123, have been decided; and especially Butcher v. Butcher, 1 Vesey and Beames, 79 and 99. These cases are distinguishable from another class of cases, where there is a trust, arising out of the words "I desire," "I wish," &c. used by the donor or testator: in which, the person entrusted, must follow strictly the directions given, or the wish expressed. See the case of Harding v. Glyn, 1 Atk. 469, Saunders' edition, where the authorities are collected. See also 1 Vesey, jun. 270. 2 Vesey, jun. 333, 529. 4 Vesey, 708. There is also another question of importance—it is as to the right of property going with the power of appointment. A gift to A. (indefinitely) and to such person as he shall appoint, is absolute property in A. without an appointment. But a gift to A. for life, and after his death, to such person as he shall appoint by deed or will, he must make such an appointment in order to entitle that person to any thing. See Bradley v. Westcott, 3 Vesey, 452. See the cases collected in Bridgman's Anal. Index, title, power.

*379

---

*377

Grimke himself, this event would have released the agreement from the imposing condition annexed to it. The second objection was not sustained by any evidence, but merely submitted to the court as the probable intention of the parties at that time, taking into view the situation of the country, and the nature of all the transactions of that day. Upon mature deliberation, we do not conceive ourselves authorised from mere suggestion, without any evidence to support us in so doing, to alter the reasonable and equal agreement of the parties; especially as it was in evidence that the complainant constantly refused to receive any thing but money, or the full value in good property in discharge of his marriage portion; in like manner as he had received from the father of the lady with whom he had married under the full permission and consent of his father, and with his written assurance of giving him £2000 for the express purpose of equalizing his fortune with her's. How then is this to be done? Not surely by receiving in payment securities, in which there was no security? A part, or the whole of which, from the fluctuation of the times, might eventually be of little or no value. This would be unequal and inequitable. Unequal, because Mr. Smith's inducement for advancing £2000 to his daughter, would thereby be lost; and inequitable, as imposing on his son a shadow for a promised substance. With respect to those claims which alight upon the party by the mere operation *of law, the complainant's counsel have stated as follows: "That Mary Grimke, mother of the complainant, was entitled under the will of Mary Faucheraud, her mother, to the sum of six thousand pounds old currency; and also by the same will to one other sum of £1000 like money: and that she was also entitled to a further sum of £5000 like money, under the will of Gideon Faucheraud. And that she was entitled to a further sum of £200 like current money, under the will of Susanna Villeponteaux; amounting in the whole to the sum of £12,200 old currency, which sum John P. Grimke in his life time reduced into possession, and thereof had the use and advantage; and at his death left incorporated with his other estate. That the mother, Mary Grimke, in the life time of John P. Grimke her husband, made her will in writing, with his express approbation and consent, he having written with his own hand a will for her, of which the one executed by her was a mere transcript. John P. Grimke by his last will bequeathed three negroes, and one third part of his residuary estate to his wife Mary Grimke, so that at the death of the said Mary Grimke, supposing her will to be valid as to all the interest contended for by the defendants, she had disposed of to her two daughters, Mary Grimke, and Anne Coslett, the sum of £12,200 old currency, with interest, and the three negroes, with one third part of the whole residuary estate of the said John P. Grimke. But the complainants object, 1st, That the will is altogether invalid, as having been made during the life time of John P. Grimke, and never republished since his death. 2d, That even if the court should overrule this objection, that nothing would pass by the will so far as relates to the legacies left by Mary Faucheraud, Gideon Faucheraud, and Susanna Villeponteaux, as these were made to her whilst covert, and not to trustee for her use; and therefore, in fact, was a bequest to the complainant's father, and shall be deemed a part of his residuary estate; to one third of which the mother was entitled, and which will be distributed among the complainant and his sisters according to law. 3d, The complainant contends that in the event of the £12,200 being decreed to be well *disposed of, that no interest should be allowed on it, being expressly given for the support and maintenance of Mary Grimke. 4th, That no part of the father's estate intended for the mother, can be conveyed by her will, it having been executed in the life time of the father before the legacy was vested, and never republished according to the act of the assembly of 1789. The first objection under common circumstances, we conceive would be fatal; but certainly an express and written consent of the husband will enable the wife to convey a property given for her separate use; and he by such declaration shall be considered as trustee to carry such will into effect. 1 Fonb. 98, which opinion is there supported by several respectable quotations. In this case the husband may, with propriety, be said to have made this will himself for so much of the estate, as he was the composer of the will, it being originally in his own diction and hand writing, and merely transcribed and executed by the wife. This then shall be deemed a sufficient assent by him to enable her at all events to bequeath those legacies, and the will pro tanto needed no republication, and shall not be void in toto. The second objection has been necessarily obviated in answering the first. The third objection this court will sustain, because it appears from the words of the wills, under which these bequests were made, as well as from the reason and nature of the case, that the interest arising on these several sums of money were to go for the support and maintenance of Mary Grimke the legatee; and were a contrary opinion to prevail, what husband of a moderate fortune would receive a legacy which would seduce his family into a more extravagant style of living than his circumstances would warrant; but which his estate must eventually, after the lapse of many years, make good with an immense accumulation of interest? We are of opinion that the fourth objection ought to prevail; a republication of the will being necessary to convey an interest which accrued to, and was vested in her after the execution of her said will: and the court decrees that the will can pass no part of the estate devised by John Paul Grimke to Mary Grimke his wife. To sum up the *whole of this case then, this court decrees, 1st, That they will refuse their aid to carry into effect the agreement respecting the house No. 101. 2d, That the legacy of 400*l.* old currency be paid with interest, to be computed from 12 months after the death of Mary Faucheraud. 3d, That the sum of £2000 sterling be paid with interest from the time of his intermarriage with Miss Smith. 4th, That the will of Mary Grimke does not convey a right to any estate derived by her from John P. Grimke, and that such estate shall be equally divided between the complainant and Mary Grimke, and Ann Cosslett. And lastly, that the legacies amounting to 12.000*l.* old currency, draw no interest until the death of Mary Grimke, and that from thence legal interest be allowed thereon. That it be referred to the master to ascertain the several sums due under this decree—And that the costs of suit be paid by defendants.

*380

*381

*382

---

1 Desaus. 382

Case XCV.

Present—Chancellors Mathews, Hutson and Hunt.

PEIRCE BUTLER v. JAMES O'HEAR.

(June, 1794.)

[Specific Performance ⟸95.]

The court will not compel the specific performance of an agreement, and oblige defendant to accept a title which the complainant cannot make out to be clearly good and free from incumbrances.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Fuller v. Missroon, 35 S. C. 326, 14 S. E. 714; McMichael v. McMichael, 51 S. C. 559, 29 S. E. 403.

For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 257; Dec. Dig. ⟸95.]

[Contracts ⟸212.]

[When no time is mentioned in a contract for the performance thereof, a reasonable time is intended.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 947; Dec. Dig. ⟸212.]

[Contracts ⟸10; Vendor and Purchaser ⟸23.]

[Where the owner of land transmitted to a proposed purchaser a memorandum of an agreement to purchase, with a request that he would sign it in case he wished to purchase, which was signed accordingly, it was held that it was binding upon both parties, though it contained no promise to sell, and was not signed by the vendor.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 24; Dec. Dig. ⟸10; Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. ⟸23.]

The bill was filed for the specific performance of an agreement for the sale of a house and lot in Charleston. The bill charged that Thomas Bourke executed deeds on the 11th and 12th of August, 1789, by which he conveyed a house and lot of land on East Bay-street to John Williamson, his heirs and assigns. That at the time of the execution of said deeds, there were several judgments subsisting against Thomas Bourke, which are stated in the bill; and he had also mortgaged the property to the commissioners of the loan office, to secure the payment of a sum borrowed from that office. That complainant having been bound as surety for John M'Queen in several debts, he applied to him for counter security or indemnity. And he stated that he had made arrangements by which he could apply the house and lot in question to that purpose; and that Mr. John Williamson would convey the premises to any person to whom the complainant *might dispose of the same: and complainant was apprised by Williamson of his consent to such arrangement. That the complainant understanding James O'Hear wished to become the purchaser of said house and lot, had some conversation with him about the terms, and then addressed him a letter, and requested him if he approved the same, to sign a memorandum of agreement, which he inclosed: of which the following is a copy: "I have this day agreed to purchase of P. Butler, a certain house on East-Bay, at present occupied by captain H. Grant, for which I promise to pay £3000. in fundable indents, exclusive of the interest that may be due on them, on receiving such titles as Mr. Ward may approve of." That James O'Hear returned the paper, signed in the presence of a subscribing witness; and the said O'Hear kept a copy of the said agreement. That complainant previous to the signing said agreement by James O'Hear, apprised him of the judgments and mortgage which encumbered the premises, but that the complainant having an assignment of the first judgment, he assured him that the same should never have any effect on the premises, and that he would release the premises from the same; and it was agreed between them, that with respect to the other judgments and mortgage, the defendant O'Hear should keep in his own hands as many of the indents as at the current rate of sale might satisfy the mortgage; and that the judgments should be paid out of the consideration money upon the payment thereof. By defendant it was also agreed, that John Williamson should convey the house and lot to said O'Hear in fee, but without warranting against the said judgments and mortgage, as he, O'Hear, was to retain in his hands the means of indemnity; and the said O'Hear was to sign some paper expressive of such restriction of the warranty. That defendant O'Hear soon after took possession of the premises, as purchaser thereof under the agreement, and the complainant's solicitor soon after drew sufficient deeds of conveyance in fee from the said John Williamson to said defendant O'Hear; and said deeds were sent to Georgia to be executed by said Williamson and his wife. In the *mean time the defendant O'Hear repenting his bargain, wrote a letter to complainant, dated 12th July, 1791, in which he declares "that as he had contracted with major Butler, and knew nothing of Mr. Wiliamson, he could not accept this title, but must have conveyance from major Butler." But complainant afterwards satisfied said O'Hear of the propriety of accepting the titles from Mr. Williamson, who executed the deeds, and transmitted them to his agent to be delivered to complainant or said O'Hear, on his being indemnified against the incumbrances. That said James O'Hear being satisfied that he would be safe, as he would have the application of so much of the purchase money as was requisite to pay off the said encumbrances, agreed to execute a deed to release Mr. Williamson from the operation of the covenants contained in the said deed in relation to said judgments and mortgage; and such a deed was prepared, and was approved by Mr. Ward the defendant's counsel. That the agent of said Williamson, in confidence that the said deed would be executed by the said James O'Hear, delivered to the complainant the deed of conveyance from said Williamson, in order to tender the same to defendant in performance of his agreement. That a day was appointed for the delivery of the deeds, and for the payment of the indents, and the application of part of the indents to satisfy the judgments and mortgage; but some difficulties arising about the dower not having been properly renounced, the defendant (although complainant made such offers to obtain the regular execution of the dower, and to indemnify him as satisfied the mind of his counsel) upon this and some disagreement about the indents to be reserved, refused to go on with the completion of the business, and shortly after wrote to complainant that unless he received an unencumbered title from complainant himself (and not Williamson) he should consider himself warranted in declining the business altogether. That a few months after the proper renunciation of dower was obtained, and complainant's counsel informed defendant that he was ready to deliver the deeds to the defendant, conveying a full and clear title from Mr. *Williamson; but defendant said, as the 1st of October had elapsed, (which he had limited for the delivery of the deeds) he considered the agreement void. That complainant's credit has suffered by his disappointment; that Mr. Williamson has withdrawn the deeds from the hands of his agent, because he was apprehensive they might be delivered to defendant before he was indemnified and released; but complainant was at all times ready to indemnify him, and doubts not he will be able in a short time to procure again the titles from said Williamson, so as to enable him to deliver them to defendant. Complainant's bill prays that defendant may be compelled to a specific execution of the contract upon complainant's delivering him good and sufficient titles from said Williamson, or such other good and sufficient titles as the court may direct.

*383

*384

*385

The defendant James O'Hear admits that Thomas Bourke was seized and possessed of the house and lot in question; and that he conveyed the same to John Williamson; but this defendant has reason to believe, not for valuable consideration, but to cover and protect the property from his creditors; and that Bourke continued to receive the rent of the house long after said conveyance to Mr. Williamson, who has conducted himself throughout the business as a mere stakeholder or trustee, without any interest. That defendant learnt those things after his agreement with the complainant, and they made him cautious in his conduct, as he understood the creditors of Bourke meant to look into that conveyance, and set it aside if they could. Defendant admits that there were divers judgments and a mortgage of record against said Bourke; but defendant denies that complainant apprised him of that circumstance; on the contrary, that he found them out himself, and mentioned it to complainant, and told him they must be removed out of the way before any contract could be carried fully into effect; and that he expected all the judgments against Bourke, and also the mortgage should be previously satisfied, which complainant promised should be done; and defendant avers that it was under this assurance that he signed the agreement *in bill stated; that he agreed to give £1800. sterling or £3000. in fundable indents, at twelve shillings in the pound; and complainant agreed to accept £3000. in indents, and the agreement was signed accordingly; but most expressly on the ground that all the incumbrances were to be removed, and defendant was to assume the loan office debt on himself, and retain indents at the then price (twelve shillings) sufficient to pay it off. Complainant directed defendant to take possession of the house, and told him to hold it rent free till titles were made, which he did. Defendant denies that it was agreed that the different judgments against Thomas Bourke were to be paid out of the purchase money. Defendant relied on the complainant's assurance that the incumbrances were to be removed. Defendant denies that it was mentioned to him at the time of the agreement that the titles were to be made by Mr. Williamson—he expected them from complainant, with whom he was contracting; and he learnt with surprise afterwards from his counsel, Mr. Ward, that the title was not in complainant, but in Mr. Williamson, and he thereupon expressly in a letter of 12th July, 1791, disclaimed having any thing to do with Mr. Williamson. Defendant denies that he took possession as purchaser, but under complainant's permission to occupy the house, rent free, till the titles were completely executed. Defendant says that he was desirous to learn what sort of titles complainant meant to bring forward; and he soon learnt from Mr. Ward that even if he (the defendant) should be willing to receive titles from Mr. Williamson, that gentleman was unwilling to make a full conveyance, with the usual clauses of warranty, but only to warrant against himself and those claiming under him, which defendant declared to Mr. Ward he would not receive; and on complainant wishing defendant to write a letter to Mr. Williamson, requesting the execution of titles, without any warranty, defendant again wrote to complainant that he had nothing to do with Mr. Williamson, but solely with complainant, with whom alone he had contracted; and that if he could be induced to accept of a conveyance from Williamson, nothing but a full and *complete warranty would satisfy him; and that if the matter was not satisfactorily closed by the 1st of October, 1791, he should consider the business at an end; and defendant avers that he was ready on that day to have complied with his contract, having kept his funds in his hands for that purpose. That complainant went to Georgia, where Mr. Williamson resided, as he said, to get a title, and on his return called on defendant and informed him that he had now arranged all matters, and requested a day might be fixed to settle. That accordingly a meeting took place, but defendant then found that even Mrs. Bourke's dower had not been renounced, nor the judgments taken up. Defendant admits that complainant offered to give his bond of indemnity to defendant, touching Mrs. Bourke's dower, and offered to assign him the judgment he held in interest till he could recover against Bourke; but as this was leaving open an incumbrance against the property, the agent of Mr. Williamson (to whom he had transmitted the deeds of conveyance) refused to part with the titles, unless defendant would subscribe a formal exoneration and release of said Williamson from all responsibility, and all general warranty, which he was instructed positively to require; upon which, and upon complainant's refusal to allow defendant to retain indents (at the then selling rate) to meet the debt on mortgage to the loan office, the parties separated; and defendant refused to go on with a contract so full of intricacy, and where such a doubtful title was offered him; and he wrote to complainant on the 4th of August, 1791, declining any further negotiation, or to accept of any other than direct conveyances from the complainant himself, and that all the incumbrances should be actually removed, except the mortgage which defendant was to assume. To this letter defendant got no answer; and though it was injurious to him to keep such a sum unemployed, he did so till October, when he wrote to Mr. E. Rutledge (whom he understood to be the complainant's counsel) that he considered the contract at an end, unless the proper titles were delivered on that day, and the business settled, and offering to deliver up the premises, or to rent them. *To this letter defendant got no answer. Defendant states, that though he meant to submit to Mr. Ward's judgment the legal questions which might arise, he never meant to submit to him whether defendant should receive titles from a person with whom he never contracted; and still less whether complainant's bond of indemnity should satisfy defendant instead of an actual renunciation of dower by Mrs. Bourke. That Mr. Williamson's agent did not deliver the conveyance to complainant to be tendered; but at the request of his counsel for perusal, with a promise of re-delivery, which was made; and the agent has since returned them to his principal. Defendant believing the business at an end after the 1st of October, 1791, did, in December, enter into a new purchase, and applied his funds to that purpose; and he trusts he will not now be compelled to specific execution of a contract so often varied by complainant, and since abandoned; nor does he now believe that complainant could obtain or give a complete, clear, and secure title to defendant. He prays to be dismissed.

*386

*387

*388

The cause came to a hearing, and the following evidence was given. The memorandum of agreement for the purchase of the house and lot by O'Hear, as stated in the bill of complaint; conveyances of the house and lot from Mrs. Ellis to Thomas Bourke; conveyances from Bourke to John Williamson, for the consideration expressed of £3000.; deeds recorded 23d September, 1789; deeds prepared from Williamson to O'Hear, and to be delivered on certain terms.

Mr. Gaillard testified that he held one of the judgments against Bourke, and complainant had agreed to pay him indents at par: he attended for that purpose the meeting at Mr. O'Hear's.

Mr. Lamotte testified that he knew Mr. O'Hear took possession of the house, when Mr. Grant left it. He considered him taking possession as a purchaser, as he knew of the agreement for the purchase. Witness acted as attorney for complainant, and received balance of rent from Grant.

*389

*Mr. Pringle testified that he knew the bond and judgment of Waters against Bourke to be now the property of complainant.

The titles were drawn by him, and sent to Mr. Williamson to be executed. He does not think they were ever shewn to Mr. Ward or Mr. O'Hear, before they were sent to Mr. Williamson. He knew that the Island of St. Catharine's was the consideration on the part of M'Queen for the house in town.

Mr. Ward testified that when the titles from Williamson to O'Hear were shewn to him at the meeting spoken of by the parties, O'Hear asked him if they conveyed a clear and an unencumbered estate; he told him no, explicitly.

Mr. Grant testified that Williamson sent him an order, dated 18th of April, 1791, whilst he was occupant of the house, to pay the rent to Butler. He never after that paid any rent to Bourke, but he had advanced Bourke eighteen month's rent before. He quitted the house sooner than he wished, as O'Hear was anxious to get in. He left it on the 10th of June, and O'Hear entered on the 12th of June. He entered as purchaser—O'Hear told him so.

Mr. Prince testified that the complainant told him he would go to Georgia, and get titles from Williamson, and then he would make titles to O'Hear, as he had objected to titles directly from Williamson to himself. Complainant told O'Hear he would take off every incumbrance on the house with the purchase money. He heard complainant say that he had never agreed to O'Hear's retaining any of the indents at all. Complainant told O'Hear immediately after signing the agreement, he might go into the house, and sit rent free till he delivered him good titles.

Mr. Morrison heard complainant say he had never agreed that O'Hear should retain any of the indents to take up the debt to the loan office; but that O'Hear wanted to be off the bargain.

Mr. Daniel Desaussure testified that Mr. Williamson had sent him the titles for the house which Bourke had conveyed to him, with instructions not to deliver them to

*390

*O'Hear, to complainant, or any other person, until he, Williamson, should be completely released from all responsibiity, on any account for incumbrances, title, or otherwise. That the witness did once, at the request of Mr. Pringle, loan him the titles, with a promise to return them, which was done. That finding the incumbrances were not effectually removed, and that O'Hear refused to release Williamson from the clause of warranty, and other obligatory clauses of the conveyance, which Williamson required (as he had no real interest, he would not be bound in any shape) he returned the title deeds to Mr. Williamson.

Mr. Williamson certified that he had instructed his friend Mr. Desaussure, to whom he sent the deed of conveyance of the house, not to deliver the deed until he was completely exonerated from all responsibility or liability for defect of title, or any incumbrances on the same; and that his agent acted as he directed; and finding that he, Williamson, was not effectually released, returned the titles.

Mr. Pringle for complainant. From the words of the agreement it is specified, that the money was to be paid on the delivery of good titles. Then it is not indispensible that the titles should be from the complainant; nor is any precise time fixed when the titles are to be delivered. That part of the agreement signed by Butler mentions that he was not acting for himself, therefore it could not have been intended that the titles were to come from him. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 689. 2 Powell, 37, 33, 268, 271. 1 Ves. 88, as to the retention of the money. 2 P. Wms. 630. 1 Atk. 12, 1 Bro. P. C. 218. 18 Viner, 188, Powell, 7. If the titles had been made directly by Williamson to Butler, the object of the conveyance to Williamson would have been defeated, because M'Queen intended the property put into Butler's hands to identify him for being M'Queen's security; whereas, had the titles been made to Butler, the house might have been subjected to his private debts, and left M'Queen liable to their joint debts.

Mr. E. Rutledge for complainant. O'Hear knew of every incumbrance on the land before he signed the con*tract. In searching the offices for incumbrances he must have found the titles from Bourke to Williamson, and that there were no titles to Butler; how then could he expect titles from Butler? O'Hear took possession of the house after he was informed that titles were drawn and sent to Williamson for execution. This shews that he understood Williamson was to give the titles and that he acquiesced. On 21st December, 1791, Mrs. Bourke's renunciation of dower was executed, and offered to be delivered to O'Hear. This completed the title. The declaration of trust must always be made by the person in possession of the legal estate. This was in Mr. Williamson, and he has done so. The estate must follow the terms on which it was conveyed. It was expressly conveyed to Williamson to hold in trust to indemnify Butler against his securityship for M'Queen. Quotes 1 Atk. 12. 1 Ves. 88. 2 Bro. 415. Powel, 231, 265.

*391

Holmes for defendant. This court will never decree the specific execution of contracts, unless mutual, and the circumstances such that the court could enforce its performance on both parties; but that could not be done in this case. The legal estate in the house was in Williamson. He resided out of the jurisdiction of the court. Neither Butler nor the court could compel him to execute the agreement made by Butler. He has tried to induce Williamson to do so; but he would not, unless clogged with such conditions of release to himself, as no prudent purchaser would give, and no court would direct. This ground alone is sufficient to prevent the court from interfering, and decreeing specific execution.

Mr Harper for defendant. O'Hear did not know any thing of Williamson in the first instance. As soon as he was informed that Williamson was to make the titles to him, he wrote (on the 12th July, 1791) stating that he expected titles from Butler. This was within a month after the agreement. The contract wants the great ingredients of mutuality and certainty. Butler could not perform his part of the contract in a reasonable time; nor is it certain that he could at any rate, on such clear unqualified terms as would be just and safe to the purchaser. *The dower of Mrs. Bourke was not renounced in due form till December, 1791, six months after the contract; and such titles as Mr. Ward would approve (which is the condition of the agreement) have not yet been produced. Mean time circumstances are materially altered. Contracts entered into to be performed on a day certain, are void, if not performed at the day. But the conveyance from Bourke to Williamson being in trust for M'Queen, it became liable to his debts; and the title from Williamson could not have got the land clear of that incumbrance; these were concealments on the part of the complainant. At the time of the purchase, the house was incumbered with judgments and a mortgage, which was not made known to O'Hear at that time. This is clearly a contract made under such circumstances as this court will not enforce. Quoted 2 Powell, 221. 3 Atk. 384. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 20, 58, as to the contract. 1 Vern. 227. 2 Vern. 415, as to the uncertainty. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 689, as to the alteration of circumstances. 1 Bro. 27, as to delay.

*392

Mr. Read for defendant. Mutuality of contract; and of the remedies upon them, are essential to their justice, and to induce this court to decree specific performance. If O'Hear had filed his bill v. the complainant for specific performance, he could not have obliged him to execute the agreement; for, as the complainant's counsel insist (for another purpose) Butler was not acting for himself, nor does he state for whom he is acting. Then by the statute of frauds, he is not the party to be charged with the fulfilment of the agreement. If he could not be enforced to the performance of the agreement, this court will not decree against the other party. The complainant's counsel contended that Williamson held in trust for M'Queen, and that by M'Queen's direction Williamson was to convey to whomsoever Butler should direct.—If so, the house is liable to the debts of the cestui que trust, M'Queen, and these incumbrances have never been removed; and the court will not decree a party to accept a title under such embarrassments and doubts.

Mr. Ford for defendant. The rule is most clearly established that contracts must be fair, reasonable, mutu*al, certain, made for valuable consideration, and free from concealment or surprise, or this court will not decree a specific execution. See 2 Powell on Contracts, 221. 2 Comyn's Digest, 129; but this contract was not reasonable, or mutual, or certain. Complainant was not tied down to any certain time. Defendant was obliged to hold his funds idle, to be always ready to meet the demand when it suited complainant to comply. There was no mutuality. The defendant alone signed the contract, which was drawn and presented by the other party, and he was the only party bound. Complainant was not under such an obligation to convey the house, that he could have been compelled to do so. There was also concealment on the part of complainant. He did not disclose at the time of making the contract that the title of this property was not in the contractor, but in another; and that he really had no power to convey the land. Why conceal this fact till O'Hear had signed the agreement? Because the knowledge of it might have prevented the purchaser agreeing to go on with the contract. He also concealed from defendant that M'Queen had any interest in the premises, and that the house might be subjected to his debts, and he concealed the fact in whom the legal title really was. The opening and conducting the negotiation was in complainant's own name; and this surely led defendant to believe that he was dealing with him a known person, in whom he supposed he could rely; but it turns out he is dealing for others; some of them unknown to defendant, and in none of whom he had any confidence. Thus he was misled into the contract. Such concealments are solid objections to a decree for specific performance. 2 Powell on Contracts, 222, 205. See Shirly and Gratton, 1 Bro. C. C. 440. The complainant who seeks a specific performance must shew that he himself was able and willing to have complied with the contract, and had taken all the steps incumbent on him to have done so; but complainant was not able at the time, of himself, to have made good titles. The legal title was not in him, but in Williamson; who, acting for another, would not be bound to do as complainant required, and actually re*fused to convey, but on terms which the purchaser was not bound to accept. He lived out of the jurisdiction and control of the court; besides, Williamson held in trust. In trust for whom? M'Queen says for him; and he authorises complainant to act. But where is the evidence of this? A letter from M'Queen.

*393

*394

Was this obligatory on Bourke? or even on Williamson? Surely not. Then complainant was not in a capacity to comply with the contract; and if so, is not entitled to enforce it on defendant. A deed of trust must express the trust on its face; or there must be a declaration of trust by some collateral deed made by the grantor. The statute of frauds declares trusts void which do not carry these marks of authenticity. If the trust was valid as to M'Queen, then the house was liable to his debts as cestui que trust, and complainant must remove those incumbrances, which has not even been offered or attempted. See 3 Atk. 186. 2 Vesey, senior, 52. 5 Bac. 590. 1 P. Wms. 323. O'Hear refused, as he had a right to do, to receive titles from Williamson, when he was informed that it was intended to get titles from him, and required them from complainant as the person with whom he had contracted. But complainant has never been ready; nor has he yet offered to make titles himself to defendant; and the titles he does offer from Williamson do not contain those full and distinct warranties and covenants on which purchasers rely for their security; but he warrants only against himself, and those claiming under him, and requires a release from all liability for incumbrances. This court can never be prevailed upon to decree a specific execution of a contract by one party, when so many difficulties exist to his getting a good, clear, indefeasible title. But it is alleged that O'Hear, though he refused at first to accept titles from Williamson, afterwards agreed to do so, and to release the covenants of Williamson, and to accept a bond of indemnity against the dower. If the contract was ever so varied, it must have been by parol; for there is not a tittle of written evidence produced to that effect. Everything written is to the contrary; and the answer denies these allegations. Now the rule of the court is clear. Where *the answer denies the allegations of the bill, the denial is conclusive, unless the answer is contradicted by two witnesses, or one witness supported by strong circumstances. 2 Comyns, 124. So far as the defendant admits in his answer that he had nearly been prevailed upon to accept of the second proposals, to accept the title from Williamson, he expressly declares that he reserved to himself the right of examining when complainant brought forward the titles, and judging if he should be safe; and also to have the consideration disposed of according to the proposal. But even these second proposals were not adhered to by the complainant. He denied the right of defendant to retain indents to satisfy the mortgage at the price of twelve shillings, which was the price at the time of contracting, and insisted they should be retained at the rate of eighteen shillings, the price on the day of the meeting. Upon this point, as well as others, the parties broke off, and this was the fault of complainant. These were imperfect negotiations, not binding on either party. Again Mr. Ward was referred to in the agreement as the counsel, who was to be satisfied with the conveyance to Mr. O'Hear; and he has given his decided opinion that the titles offered to O'Hear did not secure a good and sufficient title; and this difficulty is conclusive. Complainant must do every thing necessary to be done on his part. He has not done so. He never would take Williamson's title to himself, and then give a clear, full, indefeasible title to defendant. There is a great difference between the court refusing to decree specific performance and destroying the contract. See 3 Atk. 383. 1 Vesey, sen. 279. It was contended that O'Hear's taking possession of the house was conclusive as an execution of the contract. But defendant swears in his answer that he did not take possession with any intention to bind himself to the terms complainant should dictate, or to give up any just objections to the title. He took possession of the house because he supposed complainant would comply with his contract, and give him a good title; and because he was told he might take it rent free till good titles were made out to him. This his answer states, and is corroborated by the *testimony of one Prince. Mr. Grant's testimony does not destroy this evidence, for though he says Mr. O'Hear took possession under his purchase, he does not pretend to know or explain the terms of the contract. To make a possession taken under such circumstances, conclusive on defendant, would be to entrap him, and to produce an effect never contemplated by him. See 1 Powell, 306. 2 Powell, 153, 221. 1 Vern. 229. 1 Vesey, 279.

*395

*396

General Pinckney in reply for complainant. The conveyance by Bourke to Williamson in trust for M'Queen was good, though the trust was not expressed, if the proceeds were applied to pay his debts. 1 Bro. C. C. 81; and it is immaterial whether Williamson knew of the trust at the time it was created or not. The estate in M'Queen was a power of appointment coupled with a beneficial interest, and there can be no lien on it in equity; but he may dispose of it to such of his creditors as he prefers. He has done so, and preferred the complainant, who was his security; and the trustee is bound to carry his directions into effect; if he does not, the court would remove him, and appoint another. Complainant had such an interest in the house, under the trust, as the court would have compelled him to convey to O'Hear if he had sought a specific performance. O'Hear being a purchaser without notice, no incumbrance on the land since the contract would attach to it, only prior incumbrances. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 42. 2 P. Wms. 629. The statute of frauds applies to executed trusts, and not to executory trusts. 18 Viner. 118, 119. The agreement was general to take a title, and it is of no importance whether from Williamson or Butler.

Sometime after the argument, Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court:

This suit is instituted by complainant to compel a specific performance of an agreement entered into by defendant for the purchase of a house and lot, and to pay the purchase money on complainant's delivering him good and sufficient titles from J. G. Williamson. Defendant, by his answer, admits he signed that agreement, but without taking a counterpart, so as to bind the complainant to a compliance with his part of it; and he denies that *at the time of making the contract it was agreed that the titles were to be made by Williamson; his name was not even mentioned, and defendant believed the title was in complainant. There is a variety of other matter contained in both bill and answer, relative to parol agreements and conversations between the parties subsequent to the written agreement, and varying it in some measure; but as nothing was concluded upon finally, it is unnecessary to particularize it. Various grounds of objection were urged by defendant's counsel to the execution of this contract. 1st, That it wants certainty, for that it is not specified by whom the titles were to be made. 2d, That there is no time limited for the making or delivering of titles. 3d, That it wanted mutuality; for, that by the agreement, defendant was bound to pay the money, but complainant was not thereby obliged to convey. 4th, Concealment on the part of complainant, in not disclosing to defendant at the time of making agreement, the various incumbrances which the property was liable to satisfy. 5th, That circumstances had materially altered since the agreement for the purchase. 6th, That complainant is not now able to make or procure a good title; for, that the estate conveyed by Bourke to Williamson, although on the face of the deeds it appeared to be an absolute conveyance, yet it was merely confidentially and in trust for J. M'Queen, and liable to satisfy his debts. In support of these objections, a variety of cases were cited, many of which were very applicable and strong; and it was conceded that under the authority of those cases and the rules laid down in the books, if any of the objections were well founded, they would go so far towards vitiating the contract, that this court will not decree a specific performance of it. Uuon mature consideration, the court are of opinion that of the various objections made, there is only one that appears to be well grounded, all the rest being sufficiently obviated by the defendant himself as will appear by referring to his answer, or are refuted by complainant's counsel. With regard to the uncertainty by whom the titles were to be made, the defendant after declaring that he looked on complainant as the owner of the house, and that he was *to convey (which is something extraordinary, as the complainant in the letter wrote immediately above the agreement, declared he was not acting for himself) he goes on and says that in five or six days after signing the agreement (and which by the by was before he took possession of the house) he was informed by Mr. Ward that the title was in Williamson, and that Mr. Pringle was drawing conveyances to be executed by Williamson to defendant; nor did he object to receiving titles from Williamson, till 12th July, more than one month after he had signed the agreement, when he wrote the letter to complainant, which is recited in his answer; so that however uncertain it might have been who was to convey at the time of signing that agreement, it was reduced to an absolute certainty in the course of a very few days afterwards. The second objection is, that no time is limited when titles are to be made. We do not apprehend it is material, because when no time is mentioned, it must always be intended a reasonable time. In the case of Crafton v. Cook and Ragland, Ragland's not having complied with his contract within the time limited in his bonds for making titles, was only one of the reasons assigned by the court for decreeing complainant's bond to be cancelled; but there were several other grounds for the decree equally strong. Ragland had never made or tendered titles to complainant; he was not able to make them within the time limited; he had parted with his whole estate in the lands several years before; that estate was never revested till 1791, and complainant had been sued for the purchase money in 1789, and Ragland could not at the hearing of the cause make an indisputable title to the whole of the land, one fifth part of it having been sold under execution, issued out of the court of chancery in North-Carolina. But lapse of time, unattended with other circumstances, is not of itself a sufficient ground for the court to refuse its aid, to compel a specific performance of an agreement. In the cause of Lewis v. Lechmore, which has been very much relied on, the time was held to be material, because the price of stock from whence the money for the purchase was to arise on the day specified in that agreement, *was 260 per cent. and at the hearing but 92 per cent. That case therefore does not apply in the present instance for it is in evidence that fundable indents are nearly at the same price as when the agreement was made. The objection as to want of mutuality, was answered by complainant's counsel by the cases which they cited. And indeed there is no doubt but the court would have compelled him to make titles if he had refused on a bill brought by defendant for that purpose. As to the objection on the point of concealment, it must be observed that there is no charge of fraud, circumvention or surprise imputed to complainant; so that that objection is by no means well founded, especially as defendant by his answer acknowledges that all the incumbrances of the mortgage and judgments were known to him previous to his signing the agreement, and that he first understood and discovered them himself, and mentioned them in the first instance to complainant; nor could he undertake to say that complainant would not have mentioned them to him before the contract was closed. That circumstances have materially altered since the agreement for the purchase, may be an objection on defendant's part, because he has parted with the indents which he then possessed: but it is not a solid objection, for the price of fundable indents (we have it in evidence) is nearly the same now that it was when the contract was entered into. The only objection then that remains is, that complainant is not now able to make or procure a good title, and this is the only one about which the court entertained a doubt. It was contended for complainant that M'Queen took merely a power coupled with a beneficial interest in this land, and though liable to his debts, it was so only sub modo; and that he had a power to direct the trust to be executed in favor of such of his creditors as he chose to transfer it to. If in the conveyance to Williamson there had been a clause declaratory of the trust, vesting expressly a power in M'Queen to direct conveyance of the premises to the use of such of his creditors as he chose, it might possibly have prevented any judgments against him from attaching on that particular property; but as that is not the case, and from Wil*liamson's testimony it appears that he held the premises confidentially, and in trust for M'Queen's use, subject to his control and direction; and that M'Queen exercised every act of ownership over the house that cestui que trust could do, by receiving and disposing of the rents prior to Penman's judgment; and as it is also admitted by complainant that his letter to Williamson directing him to convey to such person as complainant should direct, was subsequent to Penman's judgment, we cannot consider him in the light merely of an agent, vested with a power of directing the trust to be executed in favor of particular creditors but as the real cestui que trust; and therefore that the estate must be liable to all the incumbrances to which such estates are subject in the hands of cestui que trust. The court therefore will refuse its aid to compel defendant to a specific performance of his agreement to accept a title which may eventually involve him in future litigation; and ordered the bill to be dismissed with costs.

*397

*398

*399

*400

A motion was made for a re-hearing, and was argued by Mr. Pringle and General Pinckney for complainant; and by Mr. Ford and Mr. Read for defendant. It was urged on the part of complainant, that Mr. O'Hear having no notice of the trust to M'Queen at the time he made the purchase from Mr. Butler, could not be affected by the judgments against M'Queen; and being safe, he ought to perform the contract; and the direction of M'Queen to convey as Butler should direct, shews a trust for him as a counter security. That after articles for the sale of land are executed, the interest vests in the vendee, and no judgments after the articles and before the execution of titles can affect the land. The common law cannot lay hold of a personal trust estate, though the statute of frauds gives a remedy against the lands by extent. The counsel cited 2 Powell, 56, 61. 1 Chan. Cas. 34, 39. 2 Comyns, 339. 18 Viner, 118, § 7, Title Purchaser. 5 Bac. 583. 2 P. Wms. 81, 618, 678. For the defendant it was argued that the title was in too much obscurity for the court to impose it on the defendant. Here are trusts upon trusts; a conveyance in fee to Williamson, who has no in*terest. He is said to hold in secret trust for M'Queen; and M'Queen directs Williamson by letter to convey as major Butler should direct. This raises another trust for Butler. How the judgments and liens against these several parties would affect the lands, cannot be seen; and the court will on no account oblige defendant to take a title under such difficulties, especially when the person to make the legal title requires to be released from the effect of such incumbrances and from the usual liabilities of a seller. It cannot be pretended that all these difficulties were disclosed either at the time of the sale, or indeed at any time pending the negotiations; and such concealment is fatal to the contract. The counsel quoted 18 Viner, 118. Chanc. Cas. 34.

*401

[I have no official statement of the opinion delivered by the court on the motion for a re-hearing; but it is understood to have been rejected.]

Chancellor Hunt died in the summer of 1794, immediately after the rising of the court, and the vacancy was not supplied for some years. The court continued to be held by Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

1 Desaus. 401

Case XCVI.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

JOHN WARD, Administrator of John Wilson, v. LEIGHTON WILSON, and K. SIMONS and Wife.

(September, 1794.)

[Dower ⟸40.]

A marriage settlement even of the property of the lady, not recorded within the time prescribed by law, is void as to creditors; but the wife shall be relieved from her agreement contained in the settlement to give up her dower in her intended husband's lands; and the master was directed to report a proper allowance for dower to the widow.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Cheney v. Lubbock, 1 Nott & McC. 451; Speake v. Kinard, 4 S. C. 56.

For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 113; Dec. Dig. ⟸40.]

[Husband and Wife ⟸29.]

[The statute of 1792 in relation to recording marriage settlements does not apply to the second clause of the act of 1785; and a settlement made between the times of passing the two acts, and not recorded, is void.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 167; Dec. Dig. ⟸29.]

[Husband and Wife ⟸29.]

[Where a woman had been in possession of property under a marriage settlement void for want of registration, supposing her title perfect, the court refused to charge her with the income thereof in favor of the husband's creditors, by whom the settlement was avoided.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 167; Dec. Dig. ⟸29.]

[Husband and Wife ⟸31.]

[A person who, after the death of the husband, marries the widow on the faith that the settlement is valid, will have no greater rights under the settlement than the former husband.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 179; Dec. Dig. ⟸31.]

The bill states that after the death of John Wilson, the complainant administered on the estate, and possessed himself of the personal estate of the said intestate, except certain slaves named in a deed of settlement, a copy of which is filed with bill; which said slaves the complainant understood were secured by said deed to the sole use of Eleanor Simons, the widow of the said John Wilson, deceased; but who, since his decease, hath intermarried *with Mr. Keating Simons. That the complainant hath not only exhausted all the credits of said intestate's estate in discharge of the debts, but hath advanced considerable sums above the assets which have come into his possession. That notwithstanding his said advances, he is still pressed for the payment of several other large debts of equal degree with those which he hath already satisfied, and which by the rules of law and equity, he will be found to pay in average and proportion to the relative value of the estate of the said John Wilson at the time of his decease, and which will be greatly distressing to the complainant, as he will have no means of indemnity in his hands. That the said John Wilson also died, seized of certain lands, a list of which is filed with bill, over which land the complainant hath no control, although he hath been constantly obliged to pay large sums for taxes; that he hath applied to Leighton Wilson, the nephew and heir at law of the said John Wilson, deceased, stating the premises, and requesting that he would consent to the sale and apply the proceeds of said lands to the payment of the said intestate's debts; and also to the said Keating and Eleanor since their intermarriage, to deliver up the said negroes claimed by them under the deed aforesaid, and which your orator is advised does not in law, and cannot in equity protect the said negroes from the payment of the said John Wilson's debts, inasmuch as it is stated not to have been recorded within the time prescribed by law; and he well hoped that they would have complied, as in justice and equity they ought to have done. The bill prays that the said lands may be ordered to be sold for the benefit of the creditors of the said John Wilson's estate, and that the said Keating and Eleanor Simons may be ordered to deliver up the said negroes with the issue of the females, and that they may be sold and disposed of for the benefit of the estate of the said John Wilson, deceased; and that the complainant may be relieved in the premises.

*402

Defendant Leighton Wilson's answer. The defendant admits that the late John Wilson died intestate, and that the complainant obtained letters of administration on his *estate; but he neither admits or denies that the complainant has fully administered the estate and effects of his said intestate, and humbly prays that the master may be directed to enquire thereinto. The defendant also admits that the said John Wilson did die possessed of the lands described in complainant's exhibit D; and that he hath been applied to by complainant to have the same sold, but being informed that the proceeds would be entirely and wholly applied to the payment of said John Wilson's debts, this defendant refused to intermeddle with the business. That he is ignorant of the nature of the deed made by the said John Wilson on his marriage with the defendant Eleanor, now Eleanor Simons, or whether the negroes named therein are thereby protected from the payment of the late husband's death. That he admits himself to be the heir at law of the said John Wilson, deceased, and humbly prays that his interest in the lands may be protected; or should it be deemed expedient to sell and dispose of said lands, or any part of them for the payment of said John Wilson's debts, that the same may be sold on a reasonable credit, and the surplus money, if any should remain, be paid over to him.

*403

The answer of Keating Simons and wife admits that the said John Wilson died intestate, and that the complainant obtained letters of administration on his estate, and possessed himself of the personal estate, but not of the negro slaves named in the deed of settlement, a copy of which is with the bill filed, which was in fact a settlement made of the defendant Eleanor's own property on her, previous to her intermarriage with the said John Wilson, and which secured the said negroes to her, on the event of her surviving the said John without issue, which event has happened; and the said deed did not comprehend any part of the property of the said John Wilson, but contained a renunciation from her of all right to dower in his lands; and these defendants admit that the complainant always understood, as he in bill sets forth, that these slaves were secured by the said deed to the sole use and behoof of the said Eleanor on the event above mentioned; and they humbly submit that they were so secured. That *this was also the belief of the defendants, and in conformity thereto they were never appraised as the property of the estate of the said John Wilson, and never were in the possession of his administrator the complainant. The defendant Eleanor for herself says, that she took possession of the said negroes shortly after the death of the said J. Wilson, and they continued uninterruptedly in her possession till her intermarriage with her present husband Mr. Keating Simons, when they went into the possession of John Ball, appointed her trustee on her second marriage, and now remain in his possession. She denies that the complainant ever made any application to her during her widowhood for the delivery of the slaves, nor did she know that he had any idea of claiming them till after her marriage with the present husband; that she does not know positively when the settlement which was made previous to her marriage with the said John Wilson was recorded, but is informed it was about the 16th of August, 1790. The defendant Keating Simons for himself says, that previous to his intermarriage with the defendant Eleanor, he knew that the slaves in question had been secured to her by a marriage settlement, made previous to her intermarriage with the said John Wilson, and that they remained in her possession; that he knew of no claim that existed against them, nor did he know or believe that they were liable to the payment of the said John Wilson's debts; that under this impression this defendant by a deed made previous to his intermarriage with the defendant Eleanor, did make a marriage settlement, conveying the said negroes to certain uses contained therein, and which settlement has been duly recorded; that he considers himself and humbly submits that he is in fact a bona fide purchaser of those negroes for the most valuable consideration, and he humbly prays that he shall be protected in his rights to them, and more particularly because all the debts due by the said John Wilson were contracted long previous to his the said John Wilson's intermarriage with the said Eleanor, and not on the credit of the said negroes, and the said settlement was not a secret one, but was notorious to the said complainant and many others. They *contend that in equity the said negroes cannot be made liable for the said John Wilson's debts, as well for the reasons above mentioned, as because it appears by the exhibit A. that at the time the said John Wilson contracted with the said Eleanor before her marriage, that this property should be reserved to her in case of her surviving him without issue, he obliged her to contract on her part that she should have no dower in his lands, which, without she had entered into such contract, she would have been (notwithstanding his previous debts) entitled to; reserving thereby to his creditors all the property he had, on the credit of which they trusted, and reserving to the said Eleanor on the event above mentioned only her own property; which contract these defendants submit is replete with equity, and should be carried into effect. And these defendants answering, say they know nothing of the accounts contained in the exhibit B. or with the particulars of the lands contained in the exhibit D. both with bill filed, and pray that they may be quieted in their right to said negroes; and the answer concludes in usual form.

*404

*405

The cause came to a hearing, and it appeared in evidence that the deed of settlement in question between John Wilson and his intended wife, previous to their marriage, of her property, was executed on the 1st of January, 1789, and was recorded on the 16th of August, 1790. That John Wilson was dead at the time it was recorded. The debts of Wilson were contracted chiefly before the settlement. Those after contracted did not exceed £160.

Mr. John Ward contended that the deed of settlement not having been recorded within the time prescribed by our statute on that subject, was void as to creditors, and the property included in it liable to their demands against the husband. The law is peremptory in requiring the deed to be recorded within a limited time, and no excuse is receivable for the delay. Marriage settlements are not to be favored; they are not adapted to our institutions and republican form of government.

Mr. E. Rutledge and General Pinckney for defendants, Mr. and Mrs. Simons, contended that as the pro*perty included in the settlement was wholly the wife's, and as she actually agreed therein to renounce all claims of dower or other interests in her intended husband's estate, she stood in the most favorable point of view; and the court would, if possible, protect her, though the deed was not recorded in the prescribed time. She was in reality a purchaser for the benefit of the creditors, who would obtain the benefit of the sale of Mr. Wilson's lands, without any diminution by dower. The creditors in question never gave a credit to Mr. Wilson on the faith of this property, for they were all creditors before the marriage, except to a small amount. The settlement was generally known, and neither the administrator or creditors took any measures to question it for several years. The administrator did not even include the negroes in the appraisement of the estate. This was an acquiescence which ought to be conclusive, as she has since married Mr. Simons, who, upon the faith of the property being in her possession, has made a new settlement thereof on his marriage with her, which ought not to be disturbed. If the property included in the settlement is taken from her, it will be a peculiarly hard case on her, because in consideration of such settlement of all her property, she renounced all claims on her husband's estate, and being of full age at the time, she will be bound by her agreement. It is a mistake to suppose that settlements are anti-republican; they are quite the reverse, and ought to be favored. Settlements take care that the property shall go equally among all the children; they prevent partiality, and bring back to that fairness and equality the property which, by the legal polity of a monarchy, was vested in one child to the prejudice of the rest. Settlements produce a conformity to the laws of Rome and others, where women had rights: not as according to the English laws where the woman's existence is supposed to be annihilated. The counsel cited 3 Co. Rep. 59. Cro. Eliz. 473. 2 Bac. 140. 3 Atk. 8. 2 P. Wms. 243. 1 Atk. 439. 2 Vern. 274. 4 Bacon, 645.

*406

Chancellor MATHEWS delivered the decree of the court:

*407

*It will be unnecessary for us to follow the counsel through the wide field of argument they have gone into in this cause. We think the whole case is reducible to a single point, that is, whether the neglect of recording the settlement made by Wilson on his marriage with one of the defendants, now Mrs. Simons, will be fatal to such settlement or not; and this must altogether depend on the construction to be given to the law of 1785, and that of 1792, made for the amendment of the former. The first clause of the latter law only provides against the defect of the first clause of the first law. The second clause enjoins certain things to be done after the passing thereof, and takes not the least notice of such settlements as were made between the passing of the first and second law; and the proviso, which is the last clause, is prospective, and in no part retrospective. From hence we must conclude, that as the legislature from their review of the law of 1785, thought proper to explain or amend only the first clause of that law, because it was "defective and inadequate to remedy the mischiefs thereby necessary to be provided against," and have observed a profound silence with respect to the second clause, that they were satisfied that the second clause of the law which comprehends the cases of settlements made between the passing of the one and the other law, was adequate to the purposes of its original intention, and left it to its full operation. We must therefore consider ourselves bound to construe the remaining part of that law according to what was their intention, however inaccurately it is expressed. From this view of the subject, it would neither be decent nor allowable in us to say that the law of 1785, might have been made more clear and comprehensive than it is. The legislature have thought it sufficiently obligatory as it stood on those who came within its intention, either to conform thereto, or subject themselves to the penalty thereby to be incurred. As the case now before us is clearly included in the second clause of the law of 1785, the settlement having been made since the passing of that law, and not being recorded within the time therein limited, the penalty of the law is thereby incurred, and it is not possible for this *court to apply any remedy. On the contrary, we are of opinion that the settlement under that law has become forfeited, and must be liable to the debts of Wilson, the former husband of the defendant, Mrs. Simons. As to the defendant, Mr. Simons, her present husband, having also made a settlement of the same negroes included in the first settlement on his marriage, without any notice of the claim of Wilson's creditors on them, they not having been returned in the inventory of Wilson's estate, that he is thereby become a fair purchaser, and ought not to be divested of the negroes contained in the said marriage settlement, we cannot place him in a better situation than Wilson would have been. The negroes were forfeited in Wilson's life, and were subject to his debts. The law does not point out any time when the creditors are to demand the forfeited property, and it does not lay with us to animadvert on their indulgence to their debtors by not demanding it sooner; but as the property has once been forfeited by the law, we cannot restore it. Yet, as the negroes might have been demanded sooner, and Mrs. Simons was permitted to retain them in her possession, under an impression that they were her property, we think the law gives us so far a discretionary power, as to say that the creditors have no claim to any compensation for the work and labor of the negroes. They had a right to demand them immediately, and if they neglected to do so, it was their fault. We therefore think it would be unjust that she should incur a double penalty.

*408

The cause of Lennox v. Gibbes [1 Desaus. 305] determined in this court, must be the case referred to by the preamble to the law of 1792, as no other had been previously made, and that decision was upon the first clause of the act of 1785. But as the case before us comes under the second clause of that law, the two cases are materially distinct; and for reasons already given, must be subject to different constructions. There can be no doubt about the sale of the lands.

It is therefore decreed, that the negroes in the marriage settlement contained, with their issue and increase, be delivered up to the complainant, the administrator of *Wilson, to be applied to the payment of his debts. That the lands be sold by the master on a credit of one year, and the securities therefor be by him delivered over to the complainant, the administrator. But as from the forfeiture of the marriage settlement, the late widow, now Mrs. Simons, is restored to her right of dower in her former husband Wilson's lands, that the master do report what will be a proper allowance for her dower, if she chooses to take such compensation; otherwise that commissioners be appointed under the direction of this court, to assign to her her dower in the lands. And that the costs be paid out of the estate.

*409

---

1 Desaus. 409

Case XCVII.

Present—Chancellor Mathews and Rutledge.

W. W. BURROWS and CHARLES BROWN v. M'WHANN and CAMPBELL, Administrators of Patrick Carnes.

(September, 1794.)

[Executors and Administrators ⇐263.]

Co-securities in a bond have a right to call on each other to contribute to pay the debt of their principal, who is insolvent; & to have the benefit of the judgment obtained by the creditor against them all, though satisfaction had been entered up on the judgment: So as to let them stand as judgment creditors against one of the co-securities, who was dead and insolvent; but whose estate could pay his proportion of this debt, if considered a judgment debt.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Lenoir v. Winn, 4 Desaus. 75, 6 Am. Dec. 597; Ex parte Reynolds, 68 S. C. 439, 47 S. E. 728.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 995; Dec. Dig. ⇐263.]

[Equity ⇐72.]

A lapse of 7 years is no bar to the equity under such circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 218; Dec. Dig. ⇐72.]

The bill charges that the complainants, together with Robert Forsyth, Patrick Carnes and Joseph Brown, became bound as securities for John Banks, the principal, in and by a certain bond or obligation bearing date the 4th December 1785, in the penal sum of £9,800 conditioned for the payment of £4,900. That a warrant of attorney being contained and inserted in said bond, James Warrington immediately entered up judgment against all the obligors. That the said John Banks after the obtaining the said judgment, quitted this state and died insolvent, leaving a considerable balance due on the said debt. That the said Robert Forsyth being greatly reduced by his unfortunate connection with Banks, was unable to discharge any part of said balance, but that the said Patrick Carnes, Joseph Brown and your orators remained liable and responsible for the same in equal proportions. That the said Patrick Carnes departed this life in 1786, intestate, and the said William M'Whann and David Campbell, on the 22d December, 1786, administered and possessed themselves of all his personal *estate: which, although not adequate to pay all the debts due by the intestate, were far more than sufficient to pay the said Carnes' proportion of the judgment aforesaid; which being the first judgment against his estate, at his decease, ought in justice and equity to be, (and your orators charge the said defendants by law are,) bound to pay, in preference to every other debt. That after the death of said Carnes, and said Forsyth being absent from this state and insolvent, your orators and the said Joseph Brown, anxious to discharge said judgment which bound their estates as well as that of the said Patrick Carnes deceased, came to a settlement in respect of the balance then due, and advanced and payed large sums of money towards satisfaction of said debt. That the said Forsyth lately died insolvent; and the said Joseph Brown being also insolvent, was unable to pay an entire third of the said judgment, but that a very trifling balance remaining thereon, was paid by W. M'Whann, one of the administrators aforesaid, and a creditor of said Carnes' estate. That immediately on said payment, and without the knowledge of your orators, he caused satisfaction to be entered up on said judgment. And your orators shew that the sum paid by them as aforesaid is considerably more than their just proportion: That they have frequently applied to the defendants as administrators aforesaid, stating the insolvency of said Joseph Brown, and of the estates of said Banks and Forsyth, and requesting that they, the said administrators, would come to a fair and equitable settlement in the premises, and pay to your orators a rateable proportion of said judgment, with legal interest, or any fair balance which on such settlement appears to have been advanced by your orators over and above their proportion: But the administrators of the said Patrick Carnes have on various pretences refused to do so, and the bill prays relief.

*410

The joint and several answer of W. M'Whann and D. Campbell admits, that the complainants, with R. Forsyth, P. Carnes and Joseph Brown, became bound, together with, and as the securities of Banks, to J. Warrington, in and by a certain bond or obligation, as stated *in complainants' bill. They admit that the said Warrington, immediately on the execution and delivery thereof, proceeded to sue, and entered up a judgment against all the obligors aforesaid. They admit that the said Banks, shortly after the judgment was obtained, quitted the state, and died insolvent, leaving a considerable balance due on the aforesaid debt to J. Warrington. But they neither admit nor deny that the said Forsyth was reduced to very indigent circumstances, or that he was unable to pay his proportion of the debt. They admit that the said Carnes departed this life about the time the bill mentions, and that they administered on his estate: but that the said D. Campbell never intermeddled with said estate and effects, and that the said M'Whann alone possessed himself thereof according to the inventory and amount sales of the same, herewith exhibited. That the said M'Whann soon after taking upon himself the administration aforesaid, searched the proper office to see whether there were any judgments entered of record against said Carnes in his life time, but was informed that there was none; he therefore appropriated, disposed of and applied the assets in his hands according to the account of his administration herewith exhibited. That during that time he had no notice of said judgment or any application from complainants to contribute any part or proportion towards satisfaction thereof, and it was not until a considerable time had elapsed that he was informed that there had been a judgment entered against the said Carnes, together with the complainants Banks, Forsyth and Joseph Brown, at the suit of said Warrington, as in bill mentioned. That being surprised at such information, he recurred again to the office, where he found that said judgment had originally and at the time of his search been entered on the dockets in the name of Warrington against Banks and others, the name of the said P. Carnes not being expressed; and the defendant having no information or suspicion that Carnes was one of the party included therein under the word others. That the other obligors to the said bond, as in bill mentioned, having previously paid towards satisfaction of the said judgment *the sums, and in the proportions in bill mentioned, the defendant W. M'Whann, upon application being made to him by the said Warrington and by some of the parties concerned, did on the 30th day of May 1792, pay the sum of 419*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* being the full balance of the debt and costs due on the said judgment and costs and charges, and obtained from said plaintiff a full release therefrom, and of all demands against him as administrator. The defendant W. M'Whann says, that some time after, at the particular instance and request of the said Joseph Brown, he procured the plaintiff Warrington to have satisfaction entered of record on the said judgment in due form of law, which was accordingly done. The defendant W. M'Whann therefore insists, that as satisfaction was duly entered on said judgment after full payment made thereof as aforesaid, and that without any undue means or unfair practices on his part, the said judgment ceased to be any legal lien or at all operative against said estate; nor can this court justly, under the circumstances of the case, restore its pristine efficacy, or place complainants in any other rank of creditors than that in which the law in such case places them, viz. as simple contract creditors, entitled to recover the surplus of their own proportions by action, in nature of indebitatus assumpsit, for so much money laid out and expended to the use of the other co-obligors. The defendant presumes that the court will be less inclined to deviate from the law which prevails in such cases, when it is considered that the defendant is himself a specialty creditor of the said Carnes, who together with the said John Banks, stands jointly and severally bound unto him, in and by a certain bond or obligation bearing date the 27th of June 1783, conditioned for the sum of £2743. 14*s.* 8*d.* sterling, great part of which he will lose.—Defendants deny all combination, &c.—Answer concludes in usual form, with prayer for costs.

*411

*412

This cause came to a hearing at the sitting of the court in ——— 1794.

Mr. Ward for complainants argued, that the doctrine was quite settled, that where there are several securities in a bond, and the principal is insolvent, the securities *have a right to compel each other to contribute proportionably to pay the debt. So if the principal and some of the securities are bankrupt, the solvent securities are bound to pay rateably, and they shall have the benefit of the judgment or other security existing in the case. 1 Atk. 133–5, ex parte Crisp. 2 Vern. 608, Parsons and others v. Briddick and others. There was no judgment against Carnes in his life but this; and his administrators were bound to have paid his proportion, as the principal, and several of the securities were insolvent. The payment of the balance by the administrator, of about 419*l.* was made the 13th May, 1792, six years after Carnes' death, and nearly three years after complainants overpaid their proportion. If the administrator M'Whann had then exhausted the assets as he states, why did he pay that sum? It seems his object was to get a satisfaction entered on the judgment, in order to get rid of the lien, and to endeavour to place the complainants, who had a right to compel a contribution from Carnes' estate, on the footing of simple contract creditors, as is avowed in the answer. But he has deceived himself—the court will not only compel the contribution, but will set up the judgment or mortgage if satisfaction has been entered thereon, so as to protect the securities: and that too even if executors have paid away the money in their hands on the supposition that such security was extinct. 1 P. Wms. 355, Pooly and Ray. But in this case the administrator had an interest to defeat the complainants, and put them on the footing of simple contract creditors, for he had bonds due him by Carnes—But the court will set up the lien for the benefit of the securities. 3 P. Wms. 400: And the insolvent party need not be brought before the court. 3 Atk. 406, Madox v. Jackson. 2 P. Wms. 313. Collins v. Griffith. The pretence set up by defendant M'Whann, that he searched for judgments before he paid away the funds of P. Carnes' estate, will not avail him. He was bound to have searched accurately. The judgment was on record, and might have been found.

*413

Mr. Pringle for defendant.—The administrator M'Whann had no notice of the judgment against Carnes' *estate. He should have had notice. He swears he searched the office, and did not find any. He therefore paid away the assets in a course of administration, and the court will justify him, and not suffer him to be a loser by requiring him to pay out of his own estate the proportion due by Carnes on this judgment which he could not find; being indexed, as it since appears, in the name of Banks and others, and not of Carnes. See 3 Atk. 208, Ashly v. Pocock. Besides, satisfaction has been actually entered up by the creditor in this case, and this court has no power to set it up, and restore its pristine efficacy as a judgment. Therefore the demand for a contribution on Carnes' estate, is merely a simple contract demand; and the assets of that estate will not even pay all the bond debts. See 1 Comyn 141, and 2 Vesey, sen. 569, Woffington v. Sparks. See 2 Bac. 435, as to error in payment of debts by the executor. This court marshals equitable assets, such as bankrupts' and trust estates, but not legal assets.

*414

Gen. C. C. Pinckney in reply for complainants.—Administrators are to be considered only as trustees for creditors. By our statute they have not even a right to pay their own debts, in preference to others of equal degree; as executors might formerly have done. Marshalling assets is the peculiar business of this court; and the court of law has nothing to with it. See 2 Atk. 439. 3 Atk. 333. This court will consider as done that which ought to be done. 3 P. Wms. 215. Now the administrator ought to have made provision for the payment of the proportion of Carnes' estate of this debt, in common with the other co-securities who were solvent; and will oblige him to do so now. It is his fault that it has not been done; for it is a mere excuse to say that he could not find out a judgment, standing openly on record, and the only judgment subsisting against Carnes in his life time. If he really had no notice he waived the want of notice by afterwards paying a part of the debt on the judgment, though far short of the third part to be provided for by Carnes' estate. If a surety pays off the debt, he is entitled to assignment to enable him to obtain satisfaction. 1

*415

*Atk. 135. And bonds extinguished at law may be set up in equity. 2 Vern. 480, Acton v. Peirce. In a joint bond, if one of the obligors dies, the remedy is lost at law, against the executors of the deceased—but yet it is set up in equity. Bishop v. Church, 2 Ves. 100, 371. The justice of the case is wholly with the complainants, and the court will prevent the contrivance of the administrator of Carnes getting satisfaction entered on the judgment, to defeat that justice; especially as the inventory returned of Carnes' personal estate shews that it was very sufficient to pay his proportion of this debt, which was the first judgment.

The court took time to deliberate, and afterwards Chancellor MATHEWS delivered the judgment of the court:

This case has demanded our serious consideration, and we have bestowed on it more time and attention than usual, as it is of a new impression not only in this court, but also in that from which we have derived our jurisprudence, and by whose rules of decision we are still directed. That the case is a novel one in this court, we well know, and we must conclude it to be so in that we have alluded to, because, had any decisions been there made, the books would have shewn them; and could they have done so, we are persuaded they would not have escaped the researches of counsel, with whose ingenuity and industry we are so well acquainted. We have been equally unsuccessful in our labours. As it then becomes our province to fix the rule of decision, we have been at uncommon pains in forming our judgment.

The material point in the case is, whether the judgment at law against the complainants and Carnes, whose administrator the defendant is, having been satisfied, this court ought now to interpose its authority, so as to afford any and what relief to the complainants?

A great number of cases have been quoted, and commented on with great ingenuity by the counsel on each side, for the purpose of applying the principles on which those cases have been determined to the case now before us. All those cases relate to sureties, or co-obligors who having paid the bond of the principal, or more than their *proportion of the obligation, have come into this court to be indemnified out of the estates of those whose debts they have been obliged to pay. How far the case of a satisfied judgment and that of a satisfied bond differ or can be assimilated, is the point now for consideration. And here, as in all cases, the circumstances that enter into and accompany them, in the course of the transaction, must always have material weight in the decision of the case, as far as they are admissible under the rules of the court.

*416

The counsel for the defendant has laid down the two following positions, viz. that this court cannot interfere in this case without intrenching on the rules and laws of another forum: But that if it does interfere, and revive the judgment, all the relief that can be given to the complainants, will be to give them a right to a special action on the case, for an implied contract, as sureties, who had been obliged to pay the debt of the principal, whereby they will be entitled to come in as simple contract creditors.

This court has always studiously avoided breaking in upon the rules of any other jurisdiction, and as in the various and multiplied instances, in which it has been called on to exercise its extraordinary powers in restraining proceedings at common law, we have never yet been charged with exceeding our powers, we hope we shall not incur that censure on the following occasion.

We will first inquire into the powers of this court with respect to injunctions to stay execution. The right to grant them is not to be questioned, it is every day's practice. But yet it is an interference with the jurisdiction of the court where the judgment was obtained. It does not however impeach the right of that court to award the judgment; it merely relates to something, which by the strict rules of that court would not admit of correction, but which by the more enlarged rules of this court can be restrained and relieved against. Here is no clashing of jurisdiction; the laws of each court are known and uniformly admitted.

*417

*Another instance in which this court interposes its authority against the rigid rules of law is, in the marshalling of assets, contrary to the legal course of administering them.

This court has in several instances directed new trials at law, when by the rules of that court the time had elapsed, when the application ought to have been made; and as they never deviate from that rule, this court has, in cases where manifest injustice would arise from a strict adherence to it, directed new trials to be had. It will be unnecessary to multiply instances of the like nature. These are sufficient to shew that this court does interfere with the rules of the courts of common law; and from whatever source they have arisen is now immaterial; it has been for ages the established practice, and consequently has become the law of both courts.

It is true, neither of these cases come up to the case before the court. But let us examine the principle on which they are founded, and see whether they are not so far analogous as to demand the same claim to relief. In the case of an injunction against an execution at law, it will be found that the execution is as mandatory as any act of that court can be, and the signing of the execution is the last act of the court on any suit preferred there; yet the writ of injunction issuing from this court is equally mandatory, positively forbidding that to be done which had been by the other court ordered to be done. But it is contended, that in the present case, every requisite that could be wanting to the completion of a suit at law, was complied with; not only to the payment of the money demanded by the suit, but even the entering satisfaction on the judgment, by which final act the complainants must now be barred; because, if they ever had a right to come here for relief, it ought to have been in some intermediate stage of the proceedings at law; but as they have not done so, it is their own laches, and if they have been injured, they ought to suffer for it.

That the complainants have been injured is most evident. It is a maxim of law that there can be no right without a remedy; and that equity regards not the cir*cumstance, but the substance of the act. Are there not various instances in which this court will relieve against what has been considered as the final adjustment of the claims of parties? For instance, where a receipt in full of all demands has been given, yet if it can afterwards be clearly proved that there was an omission of some right of the party giving the discharge, will not this court take cognizance of such a claim, and if found to be a just one, grant relief to the injured party? In case of a conveyance of land, in which there is the clause of a certain number of acres, more or less, for a certain sum, when it is afterwards found that there is a very material deficiency in the quantity or quality of the land, does not the court grant relief against even so solemn an act of agreement of the parties, and sometimes carry their authority so far, as totally to rescind it? In cases of wills, where subsequent events which could not have been foreseen or guarded against by the testator have turned up, which would operate to the ruin of those he intended to benefit by his bounty, if the will of the testator was to be literally carried into execution,—has not this court under these peculiar and oppressive circumstances over-ruled the express directions of the testator, and done that which would tend to the accomplishment of the benevolent intentions of the testator? In all these cases, and others that might be mentioned, this court has always exercised those extraordinary equitable powers vested in them, that the objects of their appointment might be fulfilled. Were we to act otherwise, this court would be an useless institution. We consider ourselves placed here to do certain things, which the courts of common law by the strictness of their rules cannot do. Indeed the first principle of a court of equity is, to correct the rigor of the common law.

*418

This brings us immediately to the material point, viz. whether the powers of this court can be extended so far as to alter the records of the courts of common law, by reviving a judgment, which is become inoperative in consequence of satisfaction having been entered on it, whereby it is rendered a mere litera mortua.

*419

*We have said this is a new case; we are then called upon to act as our predecessors have acted under the like circumstances; that must be on principle, and the equity of the case. Under this impression, we are of opinion, that this is a case over which this court ought to exercise its jurisdiction, as no possible relief can be had at law, and unless we do interfere it will be at once to pronounce to the citizens, that although they may in a particular case be ever so much injured, yet our laws are incompetent to the administering of a remedy. This would be derogatory to one of the first principles of law. How can we then, consistently with the duties of our office, in one breath declare, that a party upon the truest principles of equity and justice, is entitled to relief against an oppressive act done by another, yet in the next breath say, the laws of our country do not authorize us to administer relief. In this case we cannot act so inconsistently.—But let us be clearly understood. We do not mean to say, that there is no case of hardship but what is to be relieved against; because we know of one, viz. that of Oliphant v. Singleton, where we could not give relief, although it was a hard case: But it was from the very particular circumstances of that case, that no remedy could be applied to the injury. As private men, we were convinced, from the well known character of Oliphant, that he had paid the money; but as there was not one tittle of proof that he had done so, as judges we could not say he had, and consequently could not extend relief. But is that the case here? It is not; because here is the clearest evidence to the point on which relief is required, and opposed to which is the mere formal act of entering satisfaction on the judgment, as will hereafter appear.

The complainants, together with P. Carnes and others, were securities for Banks in a bond to Mr. Warrington for 4900*l.* and which was accompanied with a warrant of attorney to confess judgment thereon, which was accordingly done, and judgment entered up against all the parties to the bond. The principal in the bond becomes a bankrupt; so do several of the securities, leaving a considerable sum due on the judgment. The complain*ants have been obliged to pay a very large sum on this balance; and Joseph Brown, another of the sureties, has also paid a part thereof, since which payment Joseph Brown has become insolvent. Carnes died without paying any thing on the judgment. The defendant, the acting administrator of Carnes, who was also a large bond creditor on his estate, (but as security only for Banks,) pays out of the assets which came to his hands the balance due on the judgment, and gets satisfaction entered thereon; and the remaining assets (except a few trifling expenses incurred by himself on account of Carnes) are sold, and he applies them towards payment on his own debt. But the complainants contend, that this was not a fair payment, for as Carnes was equally bound with them, that his estate was liable to, and ought to have contributed equally with them for satisfaction of the judgment; the principal and rest of the securities being insolvent. That the administrator's taking advantage of a payment (made by himself) of the small sum due on the judgment, and getting satisfaction entered thereon without their privity or knowledge, was taking an undue advantage of them; and his now insisting on sheltering himself under such advantage derived to him by the rules of common law, is contrary to equity, and therefore prays relief.

*420

The defendant M'Whann, the acting administrator of Carnes, insists on the right obtained by him at law; and that this court ought not to interfere to deprive him of such right.

The administrator of Carnes can be in no better situation than Carnes himself would have been, had he now been before this court. Would he not have been obliged then, under the circumstances of the case, to contribute his full proportion towards satisfaction of the balance on the judgment? He certainly would. Shall his administrator then be allowed to avail himself of the advantage he has got, and in the manner in which it was obtained? If this is admitted, it would be countenancing an act which we must consider as a very unreasonable and mischievous one. Because a man finds he can do a thing which will work a material injury to another, and to his *own particular benefit, under cover of the precise forms of law, shall he therefore be permitted to do so, and such act be implicitly acquiesced in, when it is derogatory to every principle of substantial justice? Although the act of entering satisfaction on a judgment is so far substantial as to shew to all the world that the debt is paid, and will be a perpetual bar to any future claim of the creditor, yet it is well known that it is a thing very seldom done, because the debtor knows that if he once obtains possession of his bond with a proper acquittance for the payment of his debt, it will at all times be a sufficient voucher for him to shew that the debt is paid, and to prevent an execution being taken against him for the same debt, with these documents in his possession. It is a very rare instance for a man to demand of his creditor to go to the prothonotary's office to enter satisfaction. In many instances it would be impracticable; for if a man of extensive dealings in Charleston was to be called on to do this in every suit he had brought in the different courts of the state, he would find very little leisure for any other business. It would therefore appear rather extraordinary that the defendant in the present case should have been so extremely cautious, did his conduct rest on this single circumstance: But it is readily explained when coupled with another, viz. the payment of his own debt; for it is evident, that the less of the assets of the intestate's estate he applies to the payment of other debts, the more will remain to satisfy his own. Was it for the purpose of paying his own debt only, that the administration was granted him? Surely not. Then again, when he did come to a knowledge of the judgment against Carnes, did he not plainly see, or did he not know from Warrington, what parties had paid money on the judgment? Did he not find that Carnes had paid nothing? Did he not find that some of the other securities had paid large sums? That on every principle of justice Carnes' estate was equally liable with the other securities for payment? Ought he not then to have called on all the parties concerned, and come to a fair adjustment of the business with them? This is what he ought properly to have done: But *what did he? Why he pays a small balance, due on the judgment out of Carnes' estate; and then applies the whole remainder of the estate in his own hands to the payment of his bond debt; and as he confesses by his answer, thus turns the other securities over to their action of indebitatus assumpsit, and obliges them to come in as simple contract creditors, whereby his specialty debt would be entitled to a priority of payment: when he at the same time acknowledges the estate to be insolvent. We may really say with the prayer of the bill, that such actings and doings are contrary to equity and good conscience. It might be further asked whether Carnes' estate has been benefitted by the payment made by the complainants? There is a lapse of near three years between the payment made by complainants and that made by the administrator of Carnes; is it not fair to presume from hence that Warrington was induced to wait for the small balance in consequence of the large payment that had been made him by complainants. But had no payment been made, the strong presumption is, that the parties would have pressed for payment; and had Carnes' estate been pressed for payment equally with the others, it must have been distressed, because it appears that the funds equal to such a demand did not come into the administrator's hands till March 1790; and the payment made by complainants was in 1789. The advance made by the complainants must clearly then have been a benefit to Carnes' estate. One remarkable circumstance in the accounts rendered by the administrator is, that the 419*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* paid by him on account of the judgment, was the only debt paid by him, which had been incurred by Carnes as security to him for Banks; the remainder is for expenses incurred by himself; and out of 47*l.* 15*s.* so incurred, 42*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* of it has been paid for towit counsel fees, and costs. One other circumstance too remarkable to be passed over in silence is, the application of Mr. Joseph Brown to the defendant, to demand of Warrington satisfaction to be entered on the judgment after he had paid the 419*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* As he Brown was then confessedly insolvent, why should he have been so *solicitous for this being done? This must be best known to the parties.

*421

*422

*423

It has been further contended, on the part of the defendants, that it is from the laches of complainant that any loss has been incurred by them; for had they given notice to the defendant of their intention to demand a contribution from Carnes' estate before defendant had paid the balance on the judgment, and had otherwise disposed of the whole of the assets which came to his hands, he would have been prepared to meet the demand, but as they never did so until he had administered the assets; and as there was a lapse of near six years from the death of Carnes to the time he paid the judgment, and near eight years before the demand was made, it is such an unreasonable delay and laches in the complainants, that they ought not now to be permitted to come here and unravel the transactions of the administrator, to his great inconvenience and detriment.

It must be admitted, that there has been some laches on the part of complainants, but we do not think it such as ought to preclude them from relief, as one of the complainants resides out of this state, as all the parties are still alive, and as the payments made by the administrator has been to himself only. Had the payment been to a number of persons, and the relief prayed for would necessarily have turned the administrator over to such relief from the other creditors, this court would have entertained considerable doubt on the question; but as that is not now the case, and as the case is circumstanced, we think the complainants ought to be relieved.

From this view of the case, and from the most mature consideration, we are of opinion, that the complainants are entitled to be relieved against the act of the defendant: Because we do not conceive it to be one of those solemn requisites of law, that will not admit of a revision in a court of equity, and which, if corrected here, can be liable to any kind of dangerous or even inconvenient consequences; but on the contrary, it will be opening that door of justice, and admitting injured parties to the benefits which the real equity of their case entitled them to, which *would otherwise be for ever closed against them; not only to their oppression, but greatly to the discredit of the jurisprudence of the state.

*424

As it is admitted that the estates of Banks and Forsyth are, and that Joseph Brown is insolvent, it must therefore be referred to the master to state what has been paid by complainants, and what by defendants out of Carnes' estate; that interest be allowed on each payment; that the amount be divided into three parts, and whatever sum shall be found to have been paid by the administrator of Carnes less than his third part, be by him paid to the complainants. And that each party pay their own costs.

---

1 Desaus. 424

Case XCVIII.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

WOODBERY v. Executor of COLLINS.

(September, 1794.)

[Wills ⊂=712.]

A legacy is given to a lady during her own life and that of her husband, and to the heirs of her body: but if she had none, then the property was limited over to others. The legacy was to take effect after £1000 was raised out of the estate for another legatee. The husband was a subscribing witness to the will, but he died before it was proved, and another subscribing witness proved it. This prevented his taking such an interest in the legacy as would make it void under the statute, on account of his being a subscribing witness. The wife surviving is entitled to the legacy.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Taylor v. Taylor, 1 Rich. 540.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1693; Dec. Dig. ⊂=712.]

[This case is also cited in Taylor v. Taylor, 1 Rich. 551, on the application of St. 25 Geo. II, c. 6, to the execution of wills in South Carolina.]

The point for the determination of the court at present is on a clause in the will of J. Collins, in the following words: "I give and bequeath to Mrs. M. Hallone the following negroes, viz. Dolly and child, Nanny, &c., during the life of the said Mrs. Hallone, and that of her husband H. Hallone, and should the said Mrs. H. have heirs of her body, then to the said heir or heirs; but in case of no heir or heirs, then I give the said above mentioned negro slaves, and their increase, unto the eldest son of Dr. M'Gregor, and the eldest son of Alexander M'Gregor; in case there be no sons, then to the daughters."

The defendant the executor by his answer, admits that testator made his will in 1786, with such bequest as in bill mentioned: That testator died in 1789. That defendant alone proved the will and qualified, and is ready to deliver up the negroes, if the complainant will give security for their being returned at her death, in case the court should not think her absolutely entitled to them. At the same time he fully admits that it was the testator's *intention she should have a life estate in them even if she had no children. He then states that H. the husband was a witness to the will. A question arises, whether the legacy to his wife is not void, agreeable to the statute 25 Geo. II. which makes void any devise or bequest of real or personal estate, to any person who becomes a subscribing witness to such will. It was contended, that H. and his wife took an estate for their joint lives, and that by H's death, his wife's estate was at an end: But that even admitting that was not the case, he took a beneficial interest in such bequest to his wife; and being a subscribing witness to the will, the bequest was void under the words of the statute. It is manifest from the words of the bequest, that the testator had no intention of giving any estate whatever to H. the husband; the negroes being expressly bequeathed to Mrs. H. during her life time, and the life of her husband, with remainder to her heirs. To construe the bequest in the manner contended for, would be to frustrate the intention of the testator altogether; for as complainant was not to have the negroes until a legacy of £1000 to another person was raised by crops to be made out of the estate, the death of H.

*425

before that period would prevent the legacy from ever vesting. The court was of opinion therefore, that as H. would have taken only a beneficial interest in the negroes during his wife's life, no estate either by intention or construction being bequeathed to him; and as there can be no doubt but that he would have had a beneficial interest in the negroes, the moment they were delivered over, so if he had made the present application agreeable to the words of the statute the court must have determined against him. H. is now dead, and for aught that appears to the court was dead when the will was proved; for it was proved by Bochet, one of the other witnesses, who is confessedly totally disinterested. The single question then is, whether the bequest is so utterly void from the circumstance of H's being a witness, that the court cannot decree a delivery of the negroes agreeable to the testator's intention? This is a specific bequest of a personal chattel. It did not vest immediately on testator's death, but required the execu-tor's assent before it *could vest; and such assent was never formally given.—The will has been proved in a court of competent jurisdiction by a disinterested witness. The bequest, so far from being contested by the executor, has been admitted by him to have been his testator's intention: And had this legacy been sued for in the court where the will was proved, it must have been adjudged to complainant. All presumption of fraud or imposition is taken away by the testator's having lived near three years after the execution of the will. The case of Ansty and Dowsing, reported in Strange, which is said to be a very singular case, and gave rise to the statute above mentioned, does not apply. There the legacy was expressly given to the witness himself, and the establishing the will would have defeated the heir at law's title to the real estate: but the case has been much shaken by subsequent adjudications since the passing of the act. This is a bequest of a personal chattel, which in no event can effect the real estate. It would have been good without any witness at all; and two of them were competent witnesses, one of whom proved it. Shall then the accident of a third person signing it, who might have been (but who is now dead, and therefore cannot be) benefitted by it, totally frustrate the intention of the testator, and deprive the complainant of his bounty? Surely not. Under all the circumstances of this case, and the particular mode in which this bequest is made, the court is of opinion that the estate being given expressly to Mrs. M. H. the complainant, to take effect at a distant period, viz., the raising a sum of money for another person out of the estate, the interest which her husband had was a contingent one, and barely possible: That as no act of his gave efficacy to the will, but it was proved by witnesses altogether competent, therefore the statute can have no operation in this case; but that the bequest is a good one, and complainant is well entitled to the negroes.

*426

Decree that the executor, who is defendant, deliver to her the negroes, agreeable to the will of the testator, together with the increase.

Costs to be paid out of the estate.

---

1 Desaus. *427

*Case XCIX.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

HIGGINSON, Survivor of Greenwood and Higginson, and Executor of John Berwick, v. I. C. AIR and Others.

(March, 1795.)

[Descent and Distribution ⇐153.]

Creditor may follow the land of his debtor, in the hands of his heirs, after a great lapse of time, on the failure of personal assets: peculiar circumstances preventing the operation of the statute of limitations, or the usual effect as a bar, of a great lapse of time.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Gregory's Ex'rs v. Forrester, 1 McCord, Eq. 326.

For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. §§ 523–525, 528; Dec. Dig. ⇐153.]

[Partnership ⇐187.]

Private estate liable for co-partnership debts.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Dickinson v. Legare, 1 Desaus. 541.

For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 340, 342; Dec. Dig. ⇐187.]

[Interest ⇐60.]

Compound interest ceases when the mutual dealings cease.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. §§ 134–137; Dec. Dig. ⇐60.]

[Interest ⇐55.]

Interest during the war stopped.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. § 128; Dec. Dig. ⇐55.]

[Limitation of Actions ⇐143.]

[A new promise on an outlawed firm debt, made by one partner after dissolution, revives the debt as against other partners.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 580; Dec. Dig. ⇐143.]

[Limitation of Actions ⇐143.]

[Cited in Fisher's Ex'rs v. Tucker's Representatives, 1 McCord, Eq. 172; Shubrick v. Adams, 20 S. C. 56, to the point that admissions of surviving partner bind the other partner's estate, and that the law does not limit the time as to several of partnership debts by acknowledgment of surviving partner.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 578–583, 587; Dec. Dig. ⇐143.]

[Partnership ⇐118.]

[Cited in Ellis v. Commander, 1 Strob. Eq. 193, to the point that equity will restrain fraudulent act and waste by a partner.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 181; Dec. Dig. ⇐118.]

The substance of the case was as follows: Peter Benoist and Paul Townsend were engaged in trade in Charleston, under the firm of P. Townsend & Co. and were indebted to the complainants in England for goods shipped to them in the usual course of trade. In 1762 the mutual dealings ceased, and a balance was then due, as per stated accounts; and several remittances were made by Townsend, the surviving co-partner in successive years to the complainants. In the year 1772, Townsend the surviving co-partner, acknowledged the balance then due; and in 1773 made another remittance; and in 1774 acknowledged the receipt of the annual statement of accounts, but said he had not time at that moment to examine it. The revolutionary war then came on, and stopped the intercourse. After the war the legislature interfered, and various statutes impeded the recovery of debts, till the year 1793; but at the same time suspended the operation of the statutes of limitations, for a corresponding period. One of the co-partners Benoist died in the year 1759, and by his will bequeathed a particular property to assist in paying the debts of the co-partnership, if the funds should be insufficient. Some time after the death of Benoist, the partnership effects were sold, and £6000 of the then currency, part of the proceeds of the sales, were paid over to the executors of Benoist, in April, 1763: What has become of this fund cannot now be learnt. Benoist left a considerable estate; and amongst other things a tract of land, which he devised to his daughter and her heirs. Townsend, the surviving co-partner, ultimately died insolvent: and no co-partner funds can be found, nor indeed any property of Townsend or Benoist, except the said tract of land, which has been held by his family ever since his death in the year 1759.

*428

*In the year 1792 this suit was instituted to establish the debt, and to make this land liable for it.

For the defendants it was contended by Gen. Pinckney, that the length of time from the death of Benoist, and from the dissolution of the co-partnership, made this a stale claim which should be barred. That forbearance of suit for twenty years is a good bar to a suit in equity.—That the statute of limitations applied to this stated account; and that the acknowledgments of Townsend ought not to bind his deceased co-partner's estate. That if application had been made in a reasonable time, Benoist's personal estate was sufficient to have paid this debt, and his executors might have been made to pay the debt. But in the lapse of time it has been used and exhausted. Townsend was trusted and looked to by complainants fifteen years after Benoist's death. That even the fund set apart by Benoist for the payment of his proportion of the partnership debts, was sold and exhausted before the time of these defendants: And that at all events, if the claim could not be supported, compound interest ought not to be allowed after the mutual dealings had ceased—nor simple interest during the war. That the act of 5 Geo. II. for making lands in the colonies liable to debts, does not make them liable in the first instance to simple contract debts, but only after the personal estate is exhausted. The practical construction has been, that on failure of the personal estate, the plea of plene administravit is put in, and then the lands are made liable. That the complainants continuing to supply Paul Townsend the surviving co-partner with goods after the death of Benoist, and after the expiration of the concern of P. Townsend & Co. they must have trusted to him for payment. That no assumpsit of a surviving co-partner can bind the heir of the deceased partner, nor his estate. In the case of Sterling v. Drummond it was settled, that as soon as the mutual dealings ceased, and the account was stated, no compound interest should be allowed, nor should subsequent payments be considered as a mutual dealing. —The following cases were cited, 1 Atk. 80. 3 Atk. 105, 517. 1 Ves. sen. 499. Burr. 2613.

*429

2 Eq. Cas. *abr. 252. Douglas, 629. 3 Bac. abr. 513, title Partners, 1 Vern. 118, 456.

It was argued for the complainants by Mr. Pringle, that the laches was on the part of the executors of Benoist, who ought to have called on the surviving co-partner to close the affairs of the concern, and satisfy the debts. That not having done so, they acquiesced in all the acts of Townsend, the surviving co-partner. That he continued the mutual dealings until the year 1773: consequently compound interest continued according to the usage of the trade, and simple interest as soon as the account became stated. The statute of limitations never ran against this demand, for the payments to 1773 prevented that. In 1775 the statute of limitations was suspended; and the suspensions continued after the war to 1793. In 1791 this suit was instituted. Nor does lapse of time bar such a claim under the circumstances of a war of seven years interrupting the communication, and statutory interpositions between debtors and creditors for eight or ten years longer. That it is acknowledged the personal estate is exhausted, and no fund remains to pay the demand but this land: and there is no just ground that this land, descending from the ancestor, should not be liable to the debt of the ancestor.

The court delivered its decree:

The acts and assumptions of Townsend the surviving co-partner, as to the affairs of the co-partnership, bound the other partner's estate, and will bind his representatives; so as to make his private estate in their hands liable to the debt on failure of the co-partnership funds. The law has fixed no limitation of time as to the surviving co-partner reviving co-partnership debts, by his acknowledgments. If the surviving co-partner wastes the funds this court would, on a proper application, protect the estate of his deceased co-partner, by obliging him to give security, or will appoint a receiver. In 1763 Benoist's executor received part of the co-partnership funds, nearly equal to his share of the co-partnership debt, which should have been applied to pay it. The complainants were somewhat blameable for indulgence before the war, but as *Townsend continued to make remittances and promises till 1773, they are excusable. The time from 1774 to 1783 cannot be reckoned against the complainants, by reason of the war; nor from 1783 to 1788, because of the legislative interpositions between debtor and creditor, and the suspension of the statute of limitations; and this suit was brought in 1792. Compound interest ceased with the mutual dealings in 1762. Simple interest has been refused by a jury, half aliens. This court will not allow it, nor send to a jury. This case is hard on defendants: But Benoist's executors are dead, and no funds can be got at but the land in question; and the statute makes real estate liable even to simple contract debts, on the failure of other funds.

*430

The court ordered that the master should report what was due, excluding compound interest, and interest during the war, and directed the land to be sold on twelve months' credit, taking bond and mortgage. Costs to be paid out of the sales of the land.

---

1 Desaus. 430

Case C.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

(Injunction Case.)

Executors of General GREEN v. WARRINGTON and BLACHFORD.

(March, 1795.)

[Bonds ⟸94; Principal and Surety ⟸109.]

A creditor taking collateral securities from his debtor, without stipulating to give further time to the original debtor, will not release the security to the original bond, even though such collateral security should altogether fail, from prior liens on it, which were on record.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bonds, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. ⟸94; Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. § 219; Dec. Dig. ⟸109.]

General Green became bound by bond, (in 1783,) as security for Banks & Co. to Harris and Blachford, in 18,473. Afterwards Banks & Co. gave H. and B. sundry orders on different persons, and assigned them bonds and notes, and H. & B. gave receipt for the papers so delivered them. Among other securities which Banks & Co. had assigned to H. & B. were bonds of M'Queen & Carnes. Some time in November or December 1783, Penman informed Harris that he held a mortgage of the negroes sold by Banks to M'Queen & Carnes, whose bonds to Banks were for those negroes which he sold them *subsequent to the mortgage; which bonds of M'Queen & Carnes were those assigned to H. & B. as collateral security for the debt in which general Green was security. In July 1784 sundry communications were had with general Green, in which Harris informed him of the state of the mortgage of negroes to Penman. In August and September 1784, further communications took place between general Green and H. & B. in which they offer to take the further risk of every thing except M'Queen's and Carnes's bond, and ask security for that. General Green refused further security, but proposed to settle with Penman for his mortgage, and to remove M'Queen's and Carnes's objections to paying their bonds. The assignment by Banks of M'Queen's and Carnes's bonds was in December, 1783. It was contended for complainant, that the mortgage to Penman being on record prior to Harris & Blachford taking the bonds of M'Queen and Carnes, (the principal matter in dispute,) H. & B. were bound to take notice of it. That their not doing so was a laches which the court will not relieve against. That besides, as they were positively apprised of the mortgage, by notice from Penman, at least six months prior to giving general G. notice, such negligence would subject them to the loss; for if general G. had received immediate notice, he might have procured some other security from Banks. That H. & B. having taken the bonds of M'Queen and Carnes, payable at the distant period of two years after the money ought to have been paid by Banks, the principal in the original bond, (to which general G. was security,) without the consent of general G. was changing the original contract, and would release the securities. That after knowing of the mortgage to Penman, (which weakened or destroyed the security of M'Queen and Carnes' bond,) they made a re-assignment to Banks, of debts he had assigned to them, instead of which they should have taken a further assignment of Banks and Carnes' books. That the receipt of H. & B. was evidence of their accepting the assigned bonds and notes as actual and not as a conditional payment, for the receipt says "Received contents in bonds and notes," from which the inference is, they *had received satisfactory bonds and notes, agreeably to the tenor of the order, and this is corroborated by letter of H. & B. acknowledging payment from Forsyth & Co. to the amount of the order.—

*431

*432

The cases of Skip v. Huey, 3 Atk. 91, and Nesbit v. Smith, 2 Bro. 579, were quoted.

It was contended by defendants, that from Harris & Blachford having demanded security from general Green on failure of M'Queen and Carnes' bonds, it is evident he did not consider general G. discharged. That they always designated the papers received as collateral papers, and additional securities. That taking them was not obligatory, but a favor conferred on the debtors. That the receipt refers to an account, by which it appears these papers taken were to be considered a payment, or a satisfaction when paid. That general Green's letter, so late as September 1784, considers them as collateral security. That the taking M'Queen's and Carnes' bonds, being without the consent of general G. was of no importance. It could not hurt, but might benefit him. That the reassignment of some of the collateral securities was to get better paper; and there is no memorandum or receipt to shew the papers were taken as payment. The case of Shubrick v. executors of Livingston was quoted.

The court said, that the whole evidence is to be taken together to explain the tendency of the receipt of H. & B. for the papers. The reference made by the receipt to the account, and what appears on the face of that, shews it was not the intention of the parties, that the assigned papers should be considered as actual payment. All the subsequent letters and communications shew the same. The circumstances indicate that Penman's notice to H. & B. of his having a mortgage from Banks [of the negroes which he had afterwards sold to M'Queen and Carnes, and taken their bonds, which he assigned to H. & B.] was subsequent to H. & B. having taken an assignment of them. The re-assignment of part of the assigned papers was evidently to procure better paper, and the new paper so procured is expressed to be as additional security. Had H. & B. been treating for the purchase of the negroes, they would have been bound to take notice of *the prior mortgage of Penman on record; but they were accepting as a collateral security bonds, which on their face did not relate to any other matter, and no incident then occurred to give them any suspicion that the bonds had any connexion with the mortgage. H. & B. may be blameable for not giving general G. earlier notice of the failure of M'Queen and Carnes' bonds—But not in such degree as to subject them to the loss of their debt. It was so determined in the case of Shubrick v. executors of Livingston [1 Desaus. 315]. Skip and Huey is not applicable here. There is no fraud chargeable on H. & B. nor imputed to them. It never was the intention to release general G. It has been established by a judgment at law, and he must remain bound.

*433

Injunction dissolved; and bill dismissed with costs.

E. Rutledge for complainant, Ward and Pringle for Harris & Blachford, Desaussure and Ford for Warrington.

---

1 Desaus. 433

Case CI.

Present—Chancellor Mathews and Rutledge.

MOSES GLOVER v. WILLIAM SMITH, Assignee of a Bond.

(March, 1795.)

[Vendor and Purchaser ⊂⊃113, 123.]

Purchaser entitled to have his contract rescinded, where there is a great deficiency in the quantity of land.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Adams v. Kibler, 7 S. C. 58.

For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 201, 227; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃113, 123.]

[This case is also cited in Wainwright v. Read, Dupont & Waring, 1 Desaus. 585, and distinguished therefrom.]

This was a bill filed in order to obtain relief against a bond executed by Wilson Glover, (given on behalf of his brother Moses whilst a minor,) on the purchase of a tract of land, formerly the property of Dupont, from the commissioners of confiscated estates. The tract was sold for 350 acres of high land, and 312 acres of swamp. Mr. Wilson Glover after giving the bond to the commissioners, urged them to have the land re-surveyed, that the real quantity might be ascertained. The survey however was not completed for a considerable time, indeed not till the year 1788. When it was made, it was found that there was a deficiency of 64 acres of high land, and 37 acres of swamp. The bond of Mr. Glover had remained in the treasury for some years; but was delivered, a little before the deficiency was ascertained, to the creditors of Dupont, whose land had been sold as confiscated property, under *that clause in the act which directed that the creditors of such persons should be paid out of the sales of their estates. Mr. Smith the defendant holds the bond as the agent of one of those creditors. Upon the deficiency in the quantity of land being discovered, Glover applied to be relieved. But the bond was put in suit against him at law. Whereupon he filed his bill, in January 1789, to obtain relief in this court.

*434

It was insisted for complainant, by Mr. Lee, Mr. Pringle and Mr. E. Rutledge, that there was no notice of the incumbrance at the time of the sale; at least not of the incumbrance which has actually diminished the quantity of the land. And no principle is clearer than that wherever a diminution in the quantity of land sold takes place, the purchaser has a right to a proportionate deduction from the price, or a rescission of the contract; according to the extent of the injury done by the diminution. There was no fault on the part of the purchaser. He solicited a survey, and none was made by the commissioners for several years after the sale. The words "more or less" in the deed of conveyance, are intended to cover trifling diminutions, and prevent litigation, but will not bind the vendee to take the land where the deficiency in quantity, or defect of quality, is material, and greatly affects the utility and value of what remains. The deduction from the price, if the court should think that sufficient, ought not to be made at the rate of what the land sold for per acre, but according to the value of the land taken away compared with the value of the land remaining. The assignee of the bond in this case cannot stand in a better situation than the state. The bond was passed to him, as an old creditor of Dupont, entitled to be paid out of the proceeds of the sales of his confiscated estate. But he must take it subject to all the equity which the purchaser had against the state. The counsel quoted Brown's P. C. 89. P. Wms. 192, 9, Pitfield v. Moore, 2 Eq. Cas. 20. 2 Bro. 118, as to the deterioration affecting the whole of the land.

Mr. Smith and General Pinckney, argued for the defendants, that all the allegations in a bill of injunction *must be proved, or the party fails in his action. That the minority of Moses Glover could not affect this case: for if a minor purchases at a sale, and declines to give up the purchase, but procures an adult friend to take the purchase on him, and to receive the titles in his name, and to give his bond, the transaction cannot be set aside, and the bond avoided on account of the minority of the first purchaser. The judgment against the adult can never be set aside, on account of the minority of the other. (This point was conceded, more especially as Moses Glover had done many acts of confirmation since he came of age.) No complaint on account of any deficiency was made for two years after the purchase. This is too long. See 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 25. Prec. in Cha. 206. 2 Bro. 118, 330, on a sale of lots of land, two of them could not have the titles compleated, but the court would not set aside the whole bargain. As to a want of a survey, Glover took possession without any, and should abide the consequence.

*435

The court in delivering the decree stated, that there was no doubt of the deficiency in the quantity of the land sold to Glover. A resurvey has shewn a deficiency of 64 acres of high land and 37 of swamp. Glover had manifested a desire to have the resurvey from the time of the purchase. The delay was not occasioned by his fault, but that of the commissioners. The confiscation act, under which they proceeded, required the lines of the lands to be run, even before the sales. No resurvey was made until 1788; and the deficiency was then ascertained. The complainant could not apply for relief until the discovery of the deficiency ascertained that he had a reasonable ground of complaint. As soon as that was known he took means to be relieved. The bond had been previously delivered to defendant, who holds it for one of the creditors of Dupont; and it had been put in suit at law. Complainant filed his bill for an injunction against the bond, and for relief, in January 1789. Great stress was laid upon the bonds being in the hands of an innocent third person, a creditor of Dupont, to whom it has been delivered in payment of the debt due by him. But under the circumstances of this case, that cannot *make any difference. The state, which sold the land, and the creditors of Dupont, who received the purchaser's bond, stand in the shoes of Dupont: And as a deficiency in the land would have been a good defence against Dupont himself, had he been the seller, so it will be against the creditor who holds the bond. The equity is good against either, and the complainant is entitled to relief. The deficiency in the quantity of the land is material. It is one sixth of the whole quantity sold, and it takes away almost all the timber land. The plantation is greatly deteriorated by it. Mistake, misconception, or misrepresentation are all good grounds of relief, and for this court to interpose and even to set aside contracts, where the justice of the case may require that. In this case, most of these circumstances occur. It makes no difference that there was no intentional misrepresentation on the part of the commissioners. They were in error as to the quantity of the tract, and their representations led the purchaser into a mistake, from which he should be released. The fall of the price of land does not alter the case.

*436

It was therefore decreed that the contract be rescinded, and that a perpetual injunction do issue, to stay proceedings at law on the bond given by Wilson Glover, on behalf of Moses Glover, to the commissioners of the treasury. The defendants to pay costs of suit.†

†In this case the purchaser was satisfied to have the contract simply rescinded, and the bond given up. So that no question of the quantum of damages, to which a person evicted by a paramount title, is entitled, came before the court. It is however a question of considerable difficulty, and upon which the tribunals of the different states have differed in opinion more than almost any other. In New-York, and in Pennsylvania, the decisions have followed the English rule, to wit, that the measure of damages, recoverable by the purchaser who is evicted, from the seller, is the value of the land at the time when the deed with warranty was executed; and interest thereon; notwithstanding any improvements, or rise of price. See the cases of Staats v. executors of Ten Eyck, 3 Cains, 111, Pitcher v. Livingston, 4 Johnson's Rep. 1, Morris v. Phelps, 5 Johnson, 18, Bender v. Fromberger, 4 Dallas, 441; and the case of Glen's executors v. Washmood, stated by Mr. Cooper in his valuable notes to his edition of the Institutes of Justinian: though contrary to his own declared opinion in a case which came before him at Chambersburg in 1804.

*437

*In Massachusetts it has been decided in several cases, that the measure of damages, on covenant for breach of warranty, was the value of the land at the time of the eviction. See Caswell v. Wendell, 4 Mass. Rep. 108; and Gore v. Brasier, 3 Mass. Rep. 523. (Sed vide 2 Mass. Rep. 407, and 455, for Chief Justice Parsons' opinion.) So decided in Kirby's Con. Rep. 3; and in South Carolina, 1 Bay's Rep. 18, 19, 263, 4, 5. See the cases collected, and clearly stated in Mr. Cooper's notes to Justinian, p. 618, 619, 620. The real owner has never been held liable to pay for the improvements, when he recovered possession of his land: unless he lay by and concealed his title, in which case he ought not to recover at all. See Cooper's Justinian, 618. 2 Atk. 83. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 357. Douglass, 22. Cooper, 473, 6 Term Reports, 554.

---

1 Desaus. *437

*Case CII.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

ANN GARNER and Her Children v. the Executors and Creditors of MELCHER GARNER, Deceased.

(March, 1795.)

[Husband and Wife ⇐33.]

A marriage settlement not recorded according to the original act, not void on account of the obscurity of the act—and the wife and children shall have the benefit of the marriage settlement, though the property had been sold, and the bonds passed to creditors of the husband, under the presumption that the deed was void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 204; Dec. Dig. ⇐33.]

[Reformation of Instruments ⇐13.]

A very gross error in the deed, by an alteration made by the husband, after the deed was drawn, changing the sense materially, corrected by the court. Construction of the deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. ⇐13.]

[Husband and Wife ⇐29.]

[The penalties of the statute of 1785 in relation to the recording of marriage settlements do not affect settlements previously executed, if recorded within the time allowed by the act of 1792.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 167; Dec. Dig. ⇐29.]

[Reformation of Instruments ⇐17.]

[Cited in McDow v. Brown, 2 S. C. 111; Neely v. McFadden, Id., 177, to the point that relief will be granted against a mutual mistake of the parties as to their legal rights induced by erroneous professional advice.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 69-71; Dec. Dig. ⇐17.]

The complainant being about to marry Melcher Garner, and being possessed of twelve negro slaves, a marriage settlement was executed by said Melcher Garner, on the 14th July, 1768, by which he agreed, in consideration of the intended marriage, that the trustees should hold the said slaves, in trust; that Melcher Garner should receive the rents and profits of the hire and labor of the said slaves, during the complainant's life, without any account; "and then, upon the trust that if the said complainant Ann Garner should be living, that they would suffer her to hire out and work the said slaves, and the issue of the females, and receive the profits thereof, during her natural life;" and then, upon the trust that the trustees would deliver up the said negroes and their increase, to the heirs of the body of the said Ann Garner.

The bill charges, that the real intention of the parties to the deed was, that the intended husband Melcher Garner should have the annual profits of the settled property during his life; and then that the profits should go to Ann Garner; and after her death the said slaves and their increase were to be divided among the complainant's children; but that before the execution of the deed it was altered by mistake, in such manner as to produce the absurdity which now appears on its face, to wit, that after her own death she was to have the use of said slaves.

*438

*The bill states, that Melcher Garner died about the 13th June, 1789, having previously executed his last will and testament; and Benjamin Snipes proved the same, and qualified thereon as executor. That during the life time of the said Melcher Garner, many judgments were obtained against him. That the deed of settlement not having been recorded according to a conceived requisition of a law of this state, passed the 8th day of March, 1785, the complainant Ann Garner was led to believe that the said negroes were liable for the debts of the said Melcher Garner. And the said negroes, with other property really belonging to Melcher Garner, were sold by the executor, by permission of the ordinary, in the month of March, 1791; at which sale the complainant Ann Garner became the purchaser of all the slaves included in her marriage settlement except three, which were bought by Plowden Weston. And the said Ann, under the impression given her that the settlement was void, gave her bond to the acting executor Benjamin Snipes, for the negroes she purchased. That complainants afterwards learned, that by a decree of this court, in the case of Mrs. Lennox's marriage settlement, settlements such as the complainants were adjudged not to be comprehended in the act of the legislature; and that by a subsequent act, of the 21st of December 1793, further time was given to record such marriage settlements. That however, her settlement was recorded on the 11th July, 1792; and she thereupon applied to the executor of her husband to deliver up her bonds, and refund the money she had paid on them; and to Plowden Weston to deliver up the three negroes he had purchased. But they have refused to comply with complainant's requests —The bill prayed for relief.

The answer of the executor of Melcher Garner admitted the facts stated in the bill of complaint; except that he is unacquainted with the manner or occasion of the alteration of the deed of settlement, which produces the absurdity stated by the complainant. The executor further stated, that he transferred the bonds of the purchasers of the estate of Melcher Garner, including the settled ne*groes, and amongst others the bonds of the complainant to several of the creditors of the estate of the said Melcher Garner, to wit, to general W. Washington, James Gregorie, and John Blake. That this distribution of the bonds of the purchasers took place prior to the act of 1793, giving further time to record marriage settlements; the executor having been advised that the marriage settlement was void for want of recording within the prescribed time. That the defendant could not comply with the request of the complainant to restore her bonds, as she had actually assigned them to creditors of Melcher Garner's estate.

*439

The answer of Plowden Weston, a creditor of Melcher Garner's estate, states, that Melcher Garner was largely indebted to him; and on the 3d October, 1787, mortgaged as a security for the payment of the said debt, (amongst others) two of the negro slaves named in the deed of settlement. That defendant searched the offices for marriage settlements or other incumbrances before he accepted said security; and finding none recorded, and being ignorant of the one since produced and set up, he considered himself secure. Defendant admitted that at the sale of the estate of Melcher Garner he became the purchaser of several of the negroes, including those mortgaged to him: And he gave his bond to the executor for the amount of his purchase, with a stipulation not to be called on for payment unless prior incumbrances were entitled to payment. That the mortgage of the negroes to him being dated on the 3d October 1787, and the sale of the estate being in March 1791, the defendant conceived the act of December 1793 was ex post facto as to his case. Defendant admits that the deed of settlement is nonsensical as it now stands, but does not know that the interlineation was made by mistake, or that it was not recorded according to the act of the 8th March, 1785, on that account.

The answer of James Gregorie and John Blake neither admits nor denies the facts alleged, and requires proofs of them. Defendants admit that the settlement, as it stood, was nonsensical and impossible. But they do *not admit that it was intended that the property should go in the manner charged in the bill, which is merely conjectural. Defendants admit the death of Mr. Garner, and the sale of his estate by his executor, including the settled property, and the distribution of the bonds given by the purchasers, and amongst others to them. That they were judgment creditors of Melcher Garner before his death, and as early as the year 1785; but they consented to the sale of the estate on credit (not to injure the estate) and to receive the bonds of the purchasers in payment. And Mrs. Garner being the chief purchaser at the sales, and having given her bonds and mortgages to the executor, he assigned part thereof to these defendants, who gave up the original bonds of the said Melcher Garner to the executor. That all these transactions took place with the knowledge and consent of Mrs. Ann Garner the complainant, and she acquiesced in the sale of the negroes included in the settlement; and agreed to the transfer of her bonds (given to the executor on her purchases) to these defendants and others in payment of her husband's debts—And she did not then set up any claims under said settlement. The defendants say that they were innocent and bona fide purchasers for valuable consideration, and ought not now to be disturbed in their rights, after so many years acquiescence, under pretence of an act of the legislature, which, if applicable at all, is ex post facto as to them; which was enacted long after the assignment of her bonds to the defendant.

*440

Gen. C. C. Pinckney for complainant. Parol evidence admissible to explain a deed or to correct a mistake in it. 2 Atk. 383. 1 Ves. 457. 1 Bro. C. C. 92, 341. There was an evident mistake in the deed, owing to the alteration made by the interlineation in the deed, proved by the witnesses. One contingency failing, the next contingent estate takes immediate effect in the remainder man. Although Mrs. Garner was present at the sale, this ought not to prevent her recovery, as she was not then conusant of her rights: And there are minors interested in the property. 1 Ves. 126. The trustees are not charged with any knowledge of Garner's mortgaging *any of the property. See 2 Powell on Contr. 205. 1 Powell, 131. 1 Vern. 136, 325. 2 Vern. 554, 599, 150. 1 Ves. 64. 2 P. Wms. 82.

*441

Mr. Pringle, for defendant. When an estate for life is limited to the ancestor, and to the heirs of his body, it is void as a remainder. Fearn. 342, 345. Courts of equity make no difference in the construction of legal and trust estates. 1 Ves. 133. 2 Ves. 646.

Mr. Ford, for defendant. The creditors of Garner gave up judgments and mortgages, for Mrs. Garner's bonds given voluntarily by her for her purchases. It is too late for her to set up the settlement, which neither she or her husband ever produced in his lifetime. On the contrary he mortgaged several of the negroes he got by her to Weston, and she never interfered. And she even made some payments on her bonds, for purchases of this very property long after her husband's death. This was a complete acquiescence, in sales made with her knowledge and privity. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 684. 3 Atk. 754. See 1 P. Wms. 132. 2 P. Wms. 754.

General Pinckney in reply. Words which in a will would be construed a limitation, will in a marriage settlement be construed words of purchase; and the children take as purchasers. Fearn. 380. 1 P. Wms. 132. 2 P. Wms. 349. Heirs of the body in marriage settlements are construed as purchasers. Trusts are not construed as legal estates. Fearn. 82, 9, 95, 108, 112. In construing trusts the intention must be regarded, as in the construction of wills. See 2 Comyn, 170. 286, mistake corrected. Ambler's Reports, 251, 374. 1 Ves. 126, 457. 2 Vern. 659, 702.

M. Garner by settlement before marriage reciting that his intended wife was entitled (amongst other property) to certain negro slaves named in the deed, agreed that A. Evans, and W. C. Snipes, should be trustees; and hold the said negroes, on the following trusts; to permit him to work and employ the said negroes and receive their profits and earnings, to his own use, during the term of his intended wife's natural life; and from and after her death (in case she should then be living) to per*mit and suffer her, to take the earnings of said negroes to her own use during her life; and after her death in trust, to deliver up said negroes to the heirs of the body of said intended wife.†

*442

The marriage took effect, and M. Garner is since dead, leaving his wife alive, and several children, who are complainants with her. His executors sold the whole estate, including the said negroes. The widow bought all the negroes (except three purchased by P. Weston) and gave her bond to the executors. This suit is to establish the marriage settlement, and to be relieved from the payment of the bonds. The executor in his answer admits the facts stated in the bill, but says he has assigned the bonds to the creditors of Mr. Garner, and has no control over them. P. Weston one of the defendants, answers that two of the negroes he purchased were mortgaged to him to secure a debt by Mr. Garner, in 1787; and he was ignorant of the settlement, which had not been recorded, according to law, and therefore is void as to him. But he knew of the settlement at the time of the sale. Blake and Gregory (other defendants) say they were bona fide creditors of Mr. Garner, and had judgment and execution against him; and the bonds were assigned to them by the executor: And that they are purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice of the settlement which was not recorded.

There are three questions, in this case. 1st. Whether the settlement not being recorded within the limited time, is not void as to creditors. 2d. What estate M. Garner took in the negro slaves under the settlement, whether an absolute estate or for life. 3d. If his creditors purchasing for valuable consideration without notice of the settlement are affected by it.

The first point has been determined in a case in this court, by which it was decided, that the penalties of the act which was very badly penned, did not extend to settlements made prior to the passing the act. In con-se*quence of that decision, the legislature, by an act in 1792, extended the time of recording old marriage settlements; and this settlement has been recorded within the extended time: Indeed before the passing of the act extending the time. This settlement therefore is not a void but a valid deed.

*443

2d. It is contended for the creditors, that if this had been a settlement of real estate, Mr. Garner would have taken an estate tail under it, but being of personal estate, the absolute property vested in him, and became liable to his debts. Many cases were produced —They relate chiefly to trusts, under last wills; which are different from marriage settlements. 1st. Because these last are upon valuable consideration. 2d. They are to be carried into execution, even against parents. 3d. Were they to put the children completely in the power of the parents, there would be no object at all in the marriage settlements. Marriage is the highest consideration; provision for the issue is the immediate object of settlements, and is intended as an effectual provision. The issue are purchasers for a valuable consideration. In most of the cases cited, (except Jones v. ————, 1 Eq. Cas. 392, 2 P. Wms. 359,) the estate moved from the husband; here from the wife, and was only part of her property: the rest not settled. See the following cases—1 P. Wms. 132. 3 P. Wms. 32, Webb v. Webb. 2 Vern. 43, 195, Peacock v. Spooner. 2 Ves. 237, 646, 660, Garth v. Baldwin.

The deed as it now stands is nonsensical (her death for his death.) It appears to have been originally drawn correctly; but it was altered by Mr. Garner, before the marriage, and if allowed to stand in that shape, would defeat the provision for the wife. If not corrected, the deed is inoperative as to the wife. It could not be the intent of the parties to make a settlement on the wife of her own estate, from which she should derive no benefit. The court corrects errors and mistakes.—It is its duty to do so. It must be done in this case, and the deed made to speak its original language (i. e.) to give the husband a life estate, with limitation to the wife for life: Then trustees to hold the negroes for the use of the chil*dren. The intent is plain. The trust is executed as to the husband and wife; executory as to the children. The act to be done by the trustees was to deliver them to the children of the wife. This shews clearly that the husband and wife were to have only an usufructuary interest, and the property to be absolutely secured to the children. The court is of opinion that Melcher Garner took an estate for life with remainder to the wife for life: and the limitation over to the heirs of the body of the wife, will vest the property in them at her death. All the property being originally the wife's, and this being a case of marriage settlement, makes it a strong case in favour of the children, who are deemed purchasers for valuable consideration. And cases of marriage settlements are different from estates at law, or mere trust estates, which follow the law.

†The absurdity of the wording of the deed arose from some thoughtless alterations of the deed, by M. Garner, after the deed was drawn. The errors were corrected by the court.

*444

3d. Point. This case is so singular, that it is governed rather by its peculiar circumstances than by general rules. It is good law that if a person interested in an estate, suffer a disposal of it without notice of his claim to purchasers, the court will protect the purchaser; and where the trustee sells the estate without notice of the trust, the court will give cestui que trust relief only against the trustee. But there are no cases where the court refuses relief to persons ignorant of their rights; if they prosecute their claims soon after they became acquainted with them. In this case the cestui que trust applied to counsel soon after her husband's death for advice on the settlement, and was told that not being recorded according to law, it was void. The executor of M. Garner also received same advice from counsel. In consequence the property included in the settlement was sold as part of his property. The question as to the validity of the settlements in that predicament was decided in 1792, 18 months after the sale in this case, in the cause of Lenox v. Gibbes [1 Desaus. 305]. The complainant then became apprised of her rights, and instituted suit, but her bonds had been previously assigned to the creditors of her deceased husband, instead of his bonds which were given up to the executor. This is unlike all the cases cited. Mr. Garner mortgaged *two of the negroes to P. Weston. There is no proof that this was done with the consent or privity of the trustees or complainants. P. Weston acknowledges that he knew of the settlement before the sale, therefore he is not a purchaser without notice. The court is of opinion that there was no such fraud, concealment or negligence of complainant, as should operate to her disadvantage. She and the executor acted under professional advice, on a point not then legally adjudicated, and which proved to be erroneous. Decreed that the bonds of Ann Garner the complainant be given up to her and cancelled, and that the mortgage to P. Weston being void, the negroes shall go to complainant. Executor to apply other funds of Melcher Garner, if any, to protect creditors, to whom he had assigned Ann Garner's bond, so far as the same were given for property comprehended in the settlement. What she bought in, really the property of her husband's estate must be paid for. P. Weston to pay for the use of the negroes, and deducting taxes.

*445

Costs to be paid out of M. Garner's estate.

---

1 Desaus. 445

Case CIII.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

CATHARINE MEGRATH v. Administrators of JOHN ROBERTSON and ANN ROBERTSON.

(August, 1795.)

[Husband and Wife ⇐94.]

A wife may become a sole dealer or trader, by permission of her husband, even without deeds: and she becomes entitled to all her earnings, as her separate estate.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in McDaniel v. Cornwell, 1 Hill, 430, 432; Ewart v. Nagel, 1 McMul. 52.

For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 370; Dec. Dig. ⇐94.]

[Aliens ⇐9.]

The alien mother of a citizen, entitled under our laws to the personal estate of her daughter, who left no husband, child, or father living: And also to the real estate under our laws and by virtue of the British treaty of November, 1794.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Aliens, Cent. Dig. §§ 21 29; Dec. Dig. ⇐9.]

[Aliens ⇐13.]

[By the treaty of 1794 an alien mother of an American daughter may inherit her lands, under the laws of South Carolina.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Aliens, Cent. Dig. § 50; Dec. Dig. ⇐13.]

[Husband and Wife ⇐131.]

[Where a feme covert is permitted by her husband to trade on her own account, property brought to their residence will be presumed to belong to the husband until the contrary is shown.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 471; Dec. Dig. ⇐131.]

John Robertson and Ann his wife lived together many years in Charleston. He carried on business, and acquired real and personal property, for which he took the titles and bills of sale in his own name. His wife also carried on a separate business, bought and sold property in her own name; and took the titles to the real estate, and the bills of sale for the personal estate, in her own name. There was no deed from the husband formally constituting the wife a sole dealer, nor any writing agreeing that the acquisitions of her industry should be her own separate property. But there was ample proof that she acted with her husband's privity, acquiescence and verbal permission; and she always claimed the property *acquired by her as her own. Some of the witnesses proved he acquiesced merely for peace sake, as she was of a violent temper. But the majority of respectable and well informed witnesses stated that for many years she had acted, and been considered a sole trader; was active and industrious, and she made great profits in her separate dealings, and bought property for herself. That her husband knew and acquiesced in her conduct: that he sometimes borrowed money from her, and returned it. One of her debtors offering to pay the husband, he told him that he must go and settle with her, as she acted for herself, and had the note; which was accordingly done. The husband would sometimes caution her against bidding too much for property at auctions, but she repelled his interference, and said the money was her own, and she would do as she pleased with it; to which he replied that was no reason she should ruin herself. In short the evidence was conclusive that she acted constantly, for many years as a feme sole, or as a sole trader; had a clerk to keep her accounts, and took titles in her own name, with the privity and acquiescence of her husband. But no writing could ever be produced of any agreement to that effect. John Robertson died intestate leaving his wife alive: but no children. She administered on his estate, made an inventory and sale of it. She died not long after, intestate, leaving a considerable property, real as well as personal: and the defendants administered on her estate, as well as on John Robertson's. The administrators returned an inventory of her estate, of cash and other personal estate, to the amount of £2971. But the defendants thought themselves bound to submit the point to the court whether the property thus acquired by her, should be considered as her separate estate; as there was no evidence of the existence of any deed by the husband constituting her a sole trader, or of any written agreement that she should hold and enjoy as a separate estate what she had acquired by her industry. The complainant was proved to be the mother of Mrs. Robertson, and she filed this bill to have an account of her daughter's personal estate, and to have the titles of her real estate delivered up to her. Claiming *as the nearest relation entitled to take according to the laws of this state, the daughter having died intestate without leaving alive either husband, children or father. The defendants submitted to the court that as Mrs. Megrath the complainant was an alien, she could not take or hold the landed estate.

*446

*447

Mr. Ford, for complainant contended, that the statute of 1744 (Public Laws, 190,) prescribes no particular solemnity by which a wife is to be made a sole trader: but recognizes her being such by tacit consent. And if she may be sued as a sole trader according to the provisions of the act, she may hold property to answer the debt; the contrary would be absurd. See 2 Eq. Cas. 133, 138. Lister v. Lister, 2 Vern. 68; and Slanning v. Style, 3 P. Wms. 334, 7, which is a very strong case. A tacit assent shall sometimes be set up against the wife. It ought therefore to be allowed against the husband. 1 Atk. 269. Gifts between husband and wife will be supported in equity though void at law. See 2 Atk. 271. If the purchases be supposed to have been made jointly to the benefit of the husband and wife, they survived to the wife, on the death of her husband. Choses in action survive to the wife. The husband might have disagreed and vacated the wife's right, but if he does not and dies, it survives to her. 2 P. Wms. 496.

General C. C. Pinckney, for defendants, insisted that acquisitions made by the wife enure to the husband. If a bond be given to the wife, the husband may sue alone. 2 Atk. 207. See 3 Atk. 72, and 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 61. That the rule of law being clear, as to the husband's rights, any exception must be made out by the clearest proofs, and the parol evidence however positive cannot establish the husband's agreement to give up the marital rights. There must be a written agreement; or a deed to constitute her a sole trader. The acquisition of the wife therefore in this case became the property of the husband; and the purchases being made in the name of the wife does not alter the right: For she in that case must be considered a trustee for the husband. See 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 380. 1 Bla. Com. 442, 3. 1 Bac. 290.

*448

*The court after taking time to deliberate, delivered the following decree:

This is a case of a new impression: the only case in the books resembling it is that of Slanning v. Stile, 3 P. Wms. 334, 337, and that is by no means as strong as this. The marital rights were and are very strong, and give absolute power to the husband over the personal property of the wife. In latter times they have been somewhat relaxed under written agreements or usage. There are three questions here. 1st. Whether John Robertson, one of the deceased, constituted his wife a sole trader. 2d. What benefit resulted to her from it? 3d. What portion of the estate of Ann Robertson (the wife of J.

Robertson) goes to the complainant who was her mother? Upon a full review of the evidence (which was very ample) relative to the acts of John Robertson and Ann his wife, it is evident that John Robertson permitted her to act a sole dealer, and to make contracts, and to purchase, and to sell on her own account, and to take titles in her own name. It is a maxim that no man shall be presumed to be ignorant of the law. There is no law here defining what is a sole dealer, or how a feme covert can be made a sole trader; nor is there in England. The custom of London authorises it: and a clause in our attachment act recognizes the right in this country. See the preamble, also the 11th section, and the act of 1712. But there is no particular mode pointed out. If the husband permits his wife to act as such, he relinquishes the control he had at common law. The case before the court made out by the proofs, is the strongest possible, next to producing a deed from the husband, authorising the wife to act as a sole trader; and establishes her power so to act. 2d. As to what benefit resulted to her from it? She became sole mistress of the property which she acquired in the character of a sole trader, free from the control of her husband. In this case he died first: she administered on his estate, and died soon after; whereupon the defendants administered on both estates. The difficulty is to discriminate the property. What was brought home to the house must be considered the hus*band's unless shewn to be her's by documents, deeds, or employed in her trade; and except her wearing apparel. This must be the rule to discriminate. The inventory of her husband's estate may assist, as done on oath. As to the land, the titles were made to her of her houses; to him of his; they are conclusive. As she survived her husband, who died without children, she is entitled to the moiety of her husband's estate, under the statute of 1791, besides her separate estate as a sole trader. 3d. Complainant is entitled as mother of Ann Robertson to the whole of her personal estate, and to the real if the British treaty now pending, be ratified by our government. Decree for complainant: Let the accounts be referred to the master. Costs to be paid by defendants. †

*449

[The treaty of 19th November 1794, commonly called Mr. Jay's treaty was then under discussion in the senate of the United States. It was soon after ratified, and became the law of the land. By the 9th article of that treaty it was agreed that "British subjects who now hold lands in the territories of the United States (and American citizens holding in Great Britain) shall continue to hold them, according to the nature and tenure of their respective estates and titles therein; and may grant, sell or devise the same," &c. It was under this treaty that Mrs. Megrath who was a British subject, was decided to be entitled to the real estate of Mrs. Robertson her daughter, who died without leaving alive husband, or children, or father. She took the estate under the regulations of our statute of 1791, which allows mothers to inherit real, as well as to take personal estate.]

†See besides Slanning v. Style, the case of Calmady v. Calmady, 11th Viner, page 181, pl. 21.

---

1 Desaus. *450

*Case CIV.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

The COMMISSIONERS OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS v. GREENWOOD and Others.†

(August, 1795.)

[Officers ⇐130; States ⇐80.]

A treasurer gives bond to the state for the faithful performance of his duties: His term of office expires and he is re-elected, but gives no new bond. His first bond does not cover his acts during his second administration.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in South Carolina Society v. Johnson, 1 McCord, 46, 10 Am. Dec. 644; Treasurers of State v. Lang, 2 Bailey, 434; South Carolina Ins. Co. v. Smith, 2 Hill, 591; State ex rel. Causey v. Causey, 93 S. C. 303, 310, 76 S. E. 707.

For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. § 235; Dec. Dig. ⇐130; States, Cent. Dig. § 80; Dec. Dig. ⇐80.]

[Executors and Administrators ⇐261.]

The state has no prerogative to be paid out of the effects of its debtor in preference to any of the citizens who have judgments, mortgages or other liens—And the act of 1789, prescribing the order for payment of the debts of deceased persons, and directing the debts due to the state to be first paid, is merely directorial to executors and administrators, and does not alter the law in relation to the rights of the state and other creditors of the deceased.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Haynsworth v. Frierson, 11 Rich. 478; Rutledge's Adm'rs v. Hazlehurst, 1 McCord, Eq. 471; Klinck v. Keekley, 2 Hill, Eq. 256, 257; Hinton v. Kennedy, 3 S. C. 489; Baxter v. Baxter, 23 S. C. 116, 118, 119; Lockwood v. Lockwood, 68 S. C. 331, 47 S. E. 441.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 948; Dec. Dig. ⇐261.]

[Officers ⇐123.]

[A bond given by a commissioner for the treasury for the faithful performance of his duties, and recorded in the secretary's office, is not a debt of record, so as to bind the estates of the obligors.]

[Ed. Note. For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. § 217; Dec. Dig. ⇐123.]

[This case is also cited in State ex rel. Causey v. Causey, 93 S. C. 300, 76 S. E. 707, and distinguished therefrom.]

Peter Bocquet was elected a commissioner for the treasury, and gave his bond for the faithful performance of the duties of his office, according to law. This bond was recorded in the secretary's office. After the expiration of Bocquet's time of service, he was re-elected commissioner of the treasury, but did not give a new bond. During his life there were several judgments against him; and he gave a mortgage of some property to Greenwood to secure a just debt. He afterwards died, in arrear to the state, and without leaving assets sufficient to pay all his debts. The state claimed priority of payment over all private creditors, on the general ground of the royal prerogative, as well as on the particular provisions of the statute of 1789 directing the order in which executors and administrators should pay the debts due by the deceased. By the provisions of that act, executors are directed to pay debts due to the state, next after funeral expenses.

†For statement and arguments of counsel in this case, see post, p. 599.

The cause was fully argued, but no notes of the argument have been preserved.

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the following decree of the court:

In this case there are three questions to be considered: 1st. Whether the state retained the common law prerogative of the king of an unlimited priority of payment of debts due it, before those of a citizen?

2d. Whether Bocquet's bond as a commissioner of the treasury recorded in the secretary's office is a debt on record, and bound his estate from the time he signed it, and for how long a time, if at all?

3d. How far the act of 1789 will operate so as to postpone the judgments and executions obtained against Bocquet in his lifetime, and also a mortgage given by him to the defendant Greenwood, to the debt due to the state?

There is no express clause in the constitution of the year 1778, declaratory of the intention of retaining the *prerogative now claimed on the part of the state; and it is only from the general words of the 33d clause of the constitution, which declares that all laws then in force shall be continued (unless when temporary) until altered or repealed, that we can even infer that such was the intention; because under that clause, the act of 1712, which makes the common law of force is continued: On the other hand, the idea of the state retaining this prerogative (however improper it may be) seems to be altogether a new one; the direction to executors and administrators in the law of 1789, plainly evinces it: and to shew it still more evidently, we need only refer to the constitution, which directs that the commissioners of the treasury shall give bond with approved security; and to subsequent acts of the assembly, such as the vendue act, duty act, and paper medium act, which direct that persons becoming indebted to the state, shall give bonds with security. If this idea of prerogative had prevailed, it is more than probable that no man would have become security for another, if immediately on his giving a bond, the right or prerogative of the state would so attach upon his estate as to prevent him for an unlimited time from disposing of any part of it; and no sale or judgment or execution could divest the state of its interest therein. But even if the common law prerogative was retained, yet we are of opinion it cannot affect the defendants in this case, because by the common law the king was entitled to a preference only where the debt was on record, or specialty, in cases where he and the subject stood in equal degree; which brings us to the second point. Whether this is a debt on record? That this is not a debt on record is manifest from the legal definition of an obligation by matter of record; which is said to be a writing obligatory, acknowledged before a judge or other officer having authority for that purpose, and enrolled in a court of record. This bond it is true is recorded in the secretary's office; but that does not make it a record in the legal acceptation of the word. It is not even directed by the constitution to be recorded; it was done merely for security from the chance of being lost or destroyed by fire:

*451

*452

*as some other bonds to the state are particularly directed by law to be recorded. Any person having the bond of another may record it in the secretary's office, but that will not make it a record, which would bind the debtor's estate, and yet it might with equal propriety be insisted on, as in the present case. We can consider it therefore in no other light than a penal bond, on which nothing is immediately due, nor will the penalty at law be recoverable before the condition is broken; and it will even then have no binding efficacy before judgment has been regularly obtained. We are further of opinion that this bond can only be obligatory for such defalcations as may have been incurred during Bocquet's continuance in office, under his first appointment; because his being again elected by the legislature was a new act. It was a new legislature; he received a new commission; he took the oath anew; and the executive ought to have taken a new bond. So likewise on his second election, it was a new house of legislature; another governor; he had a new commission, and took the oath again. Though the same person, he was a new officer, and the constitution required all those acts to be done each time; they ought to have been done and we must consider them as done. If they were not, there is no blame imputable on the defendants. If the public sustains a loss, the censure must fall on those, whose duty it was to have taken care of the interest of the state. The neglect of doing what ought to have been done, cannot revive or give efficacy to a bond for a longer period than it was originally intended to be binding. This case is altogether different from that of the deputy post master: He was continued in office under the original appointment by the person who first appointed him. It may be worthy of observation, that as by the present constitution the commissioners of the treasury are not obliged to give bond with security, and we do not know of any law which directs it, whether it would not be expedient for the legislature to be more explicit on this subject by passing a law declaring particularly in what cases the state shall be entitled to a preference of private creditors.

*453

*As to the third point, how far the act of 1789 will operate so as to postpone the executors of the defendant, and invalidate the mortgage of Bocquet to Greenwood, we must observe that this act is directory to executors and administrators in the disposing of the assets of the deceased; and therefore if they should administer them contrary to the direction of that law, and the state receives an injury, they might be liable to answer in an action for devastavit. In the present case there are no executors or administrators. This court has no right to assume the power of executor or administrator; nor if we were inclined to it, does there appear to be any personal assets over which the court could have any control; and it is only with such assets that executors would have a right to intermeddle. As the effects were all assigned in Bocquet's lifetime and not only delivered to, but actually levied on by the sheriff, the property in the goods was thereby totally divested out of Bocquet in his lifetime; nor could his executors have taken it without being liable to an action by the sheriff. He has since sold it, and is compellable to pay over the money to the creditors on those executions, for we cannot presume, that the legislature intended in the very general directions to executors respecting payment of debts due the public, (by a side blow) to overset the whole common and statute law doctrine concerning the binding efficacy of executions. A variety of cases were cited from Bunbury and Parker's Reports to shew that when an extent at the king's suit and an execution for the subject were issued, though the extent was last it should be preferred; that is upon the established principle of the common law, that when the king and the subject stand on equal ground, the one having an extent, and the other an execution, the king should have the preference. But it is indispensably necessary that the king's debts should be proved in a court of record before an extent can issue. If judgment and execution had been obtained against Bocquet on the bond in question, the cases would have applied, but on the contrary no such proceedings have been had. It was also asserted that even a simple contract debt due the king should *have the preference to a bond due to the subject; and further that the lands of the king's debtor are liable from the time of contracting the debt, though not of record, and a case was quoted from Parker's Reports for that purpose. Upon looking however into that case it does not warrant the assertion; they were the arguments of counsel, and the court expressly declined giving any opinion on those points, because they did not then come judicially before them. Bocquet's bond not being considered as a record, and therefore not binding on his estate, in the first instance; he had undoubtedly a right to mortgage the lands to the defendant Greenwood, subject however to any prior incumbrances; after discharging which they will be liable to satisfy Greenwood's demands. Upon the whole, the court are of opinion, and decree, that the injunction be dissolved and the bill dismissed, but without costs, upon the principle that the state pays no costs.

*454

---

1 Desaus. 454

Case CV.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

ELIZA POTTS v. JOHN COGDELL.

(October, 1795.)

[Lost Instruments ⇐8.]

Parol evidence received to prove the existence and loss of a deed of marriage settlement; corroborated by other deeds referring to and speaking of the deed of settlement. The contents of the deed ascertained also, by reference to other deeds. Construction of the deed of settlement.

[Ed. Note. For other cases, see Lost Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 17; Dec. Dig. ⇐8.]

[Dower ⇐10.]

[Personalty settled, upon a marriage, to the use of the parties for life, with remainder to their issue, was converted into land by the husband after the death of the wife. Held, that his second wife was entitled to dower in the land, though it was, in other respects, to be treated as personalty.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 20; Dec. Dig. ⇐10.]

[Evidence ⇐182.]

[Where all the parties interested acknowledge that a deed of marriage settlement was entered into between certain parties, and a bond entered into by the husband, as also a deed from the husband to his second wife and another, refers to and speaks of such deed of settlement, there is sufficient proof of its execution to authorize the introduction of secondary evidence.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 602; Dec. Dig. ⇐182.]

[Husband and Wife ⇐35.]

[On proof of the loss of a marriage settlement, the substance of which was recited in a subsequent deed by the husband, the court revived and enforced the settlement.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 210; Dec. Dig. ⇐35.]

Chancellor MATHEWS delivered the decree of the court:

This is one of those cases in which this court is authorized to exercise that extraordinary jurisdiction vested in it, for setting up, or reviving deeds or contracts lost or mislaid on sufficient proof of their having existed. In this case it appears to be acknowledged by all the parties interested, that articles for a settlement were entered into previous to the marriage of George Cogdell the father of complainant, with his first wife: and which is also shewn by a bond entered into by George Cogdell to Joseph White referring to such articles, bearing even date with the bond, for securing £10,000 old currency, to his then intended wife Hannah Screven; and which is further shewn by a deed from George Cogdell to his second, wife and to John Cogdell conveying lands in trust for the children of the first marriage. The first question is, whether the *evidence offered is sufficient to substantiate the existence of the deed now attempted to be set up? We think it is; for it does not often happen, that the proof in similar cases can be so well authenticated as is done in the present case. In the last term an application being made to this court to set up a will said to be the last will of Mrs. Ann Berwick, but which was lost, (in opposition to a will produced) on an issue directed for a trial at law, the jury set up and confirmed the will which was lost, as the last will, on the positive parol evidence of one witness, of the existence and contents of such will; and on the circumstantial parol evidence of other persons; which verdict was confirmed by this court. The present case is a much stronger one, as the proof goes much further in the support of the articles of marriage settlement.

*455

The 2d question is, what proportion and what estate the children of that marriage were entitled to by virtue of the marriage settlement? On this point we have no certain guide for our government. The bond goes no further than a provision for the wife: but the deed from George Cogdell and his second wife to John Cogdell goes to a provision, as well for the surviving child, as for the representatives of the two deceased children. We must therefore have recourse to a former decision in this court, on a point nearly similar to this, as the best possible guide for a decision in this case. We mean the case of Wragg and others v. Mathews and others; the words of the court in delivering their opinion in that case were as follows: "This release must be looked upon as drawn by the direction of Mr. Wragg, and must be considered as his exposition of the deed of 1741. It shews clearly what was his construction of that deed; and he being a principal party in the transaction, best knows what was the intention of all the parties; he certainly best knew what was his own intention. Here then is his declaration, that his daughter being the only issue of his former wife, was entitled to the provision made by the deed of 1741, for the issue of the marriage." In the principal case the deed from George Cogdell and his second wife contain these words: "Whereas upon the *marriage of aforesaid George Cogdell with Hannah his former wife, the sum of £10,000 being by deed duly executed was by him G. Cogdell settled upon such child or children as should be born of that marriage: And whereas the aforesaid G. Cogdell had three children by the aforesaid Hannah his wife, that is to say Elizabeth, now living, and Charles and Mary, who are dead, and whereas for the better securing the payment unto the aforesaid Elizabeth his daughter, as well as to the representatives of the aforesaid Charles and Mary, his deceased children," &c. On the same principle then, that the case we have referred to was decided, so we think ought the present, namely for want of better information, we must resort to the exposition and opinion of the principal party to the former deed, as expressed by him in the latter deed, as he must have known what was the intention of all the parties to the first deed. From hence the decision is rendered easy and unembarrassed, as we have only to pursue the words of the latter deed, which speaks plainly the meaning and intention of the first deed, which has been lost. But whether the legal representatives of Charles who arrived at full age, but who died before his father and unmarried, were to take his portion under the statute of distributions, or whether the deed being intended as a provision for the children of the marriage ought to be construed according to the usual tenor of marriage settlements, and the distribution consequently confined to the children of the marriage, may be made another question. But we think there can be no doubt but that the death of any of the children of the marriage, without children and before a division of the estate settled, vested a right of survivorship in the other child or children, and their lineal descendants, exclusively of collateral representatives, not contemplated by the deed itself; for if in this case a contrary construction was to obtain, the consequence would be that the father of Charles would have been entitled to his distributive share absolutely, which he might have given to the children of the second marriage, to the injury of the children of the first marriage; especially too as the estate flowed wholly from the *mother. This surely never could have been the intention of the parties to the deed: it evidently was not the construction or intention of the father, G. Cogdell, for he never made any claim to it, although he survived Charles his son several years: And because in the latter deed, executed after the death of Charles, he recognises the right of his children to the whole £10,000 and makes that deed for the better securing that sum." Now had he conceived that he had a right to Charles's part, he would not have entered into a new engagement for securing the whole sum. As the original estate settled was money, the real estate into which it has been in part changed must still by the well known rules of law be considered as money. But as the widow has claimed her dower in these lands, to be sure we cannot deprive her of it. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the defendant, G. Cogdell, the trustee under the deed of 1792, do dispose of the lands mentioned in the said deed, on a credit of one, two and three years, reserving thereout what shall be allowed the widow of G. Cogdell for her dower; and that he do pay so much of the balance, together with the sums for which the negroes sold by him amounts to, as shall make up the sum of £10,000 secured by the marriage settlement, with interest thereon from the death of G. Cogdell, in the manner following, namely, one half to the complainant E. Potts the surviving daughter, the other half to be by him placed and kept at interest on good security, to be approved by the master, for the benefit of the children of Mrs. Johnston, the other daughter of aforesaid G. Cogdell, until they may be entitled to receive the same: deducting therefrom a reasonable sum for the value of a negro woman, carried away by R. Johnston the husband of Mrs. Johnston, belonging to the estate of G. Cogdell; and also the usual allowance of £10 sterling per annum for the hire of the said negro, from the time of her being carried away to the present time: And that the costs be paid out of the proceeds of the estate.

*456

*457

[On examining the record of the court, the register stated that the only proceedings of record in the case of Legare *v. Ash and others, (referred to by the court in the above case) to set up a will of Mrs. Ann Berwick, which was alleged to be lost, in opposition to a written will which was produced, were examinations of witnesses, and the confirmation of a verdict, on an issue directed by the court of chancery. The following are the entries:

*458

Court of Chancery, 1st July, 1795.

Present Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

—Thomas Legare and Wife v. Mrs. Ash and Others.

The bill and answer being read, five witnesses were examined viva voce in open court, and their testimony reduced to writing in memoriam rei perpetuam.

Tuesday 4th August, 1795.—This court having directed an issue at law, in nature of a writ of trespass and ejectment, devastavit vel non, and general Pinckney having presented a copy of the verdict found on such issue,—It was ordered, that the same be and is hereby confirmed; and that the evidence taken in this case, in memoriam rei perpetuam, together with the said verdict, be recorded; which verdict is as follows: We find for the plaintiffs, the lands in the declaration mentioned, with costs of suit. We also find that Ann Berwick, on or about the 10th day of November, A. D. 1793, made her will to the following purport and effect, to wit: She gave and bequeathed, &c. (the verdict proceeded to set forth in detail all the devises and bequests of the will, as proved to them by the witnesses)—And that of her said last will and testament she appointed Thomas Jones, E. Rutledge and T. Legare, executors; which will we find was duly and legally executed in the presence of three credible witnesses.

13th July, 1795.

(Signed) Daniel Hall, Foreman.

We certify that on the trial of the issue in the above cause, the jury found the verdict above set forth.

(Signed) Thomas Waties, Elihu Hale Bay.

To the Honorable the Judges of the Court of Equity.

See report of the trial of the issue above directed, by Mr. Justice Bay, 1st vol. 464; under the title of Legare and Wife v. Ashe and Others. See also the important case of Havard v. Davis, in the supreme court of Pennsylvania. 2 Binney's Report's, 406; also the case of Haines v. Haines, 2 Vernon 441, and 7 Bacon's abr. 320, title wills and testaments.]

---

1 Desaus. *459

*Case CVI.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

M'DOWEL v. TEASDALE.

(October, 1795.)

[Equity ⇐345.]

The bill was filed for a discovery. The defendant denied the charges, and supported his denial by his books of entry. The complainant produced only one witness in support of his charges. His testimony was positive as to the principal charge, but contained some contradiction; and his testimony was not supported by any circumstances. The court held itself bound to take the answer as true, and decreed accordingly.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 722; Dec. Dig. ⇐345.]

This bill is brought for a discovery by defendant's oath, whether it was not expressly understood by him, that a certain quantity of goods, consigned to him by complainant, were to be sold on a commission of seven and a half per cent; and whether the amount sales, if sold on a credit by defendant, were not to be guaranteed by him to complainant, and not sold at his (the complainant's) risk. The defendant in his answer positively denies that the goods were taken by him at his risk, or account; or that he was to guarantee the payment of the amount sales; but insists they were received and to be sold by him on commissions at the sole risk of the complainants. His book in which the original entry of the transaction was made was produced, which corroborated his answer. There was only one witness produced in support of the charge in the bill, who swore that the complainant directed the goods to be sold for cash, or if on a credit, defendant must have the money ready for them when he returned; and it was also agreed, that if defendant guaranteed, he was to be allowed seven and one half per cent; he also swore that the last goods were delivered on the same terms as the former parcels were. It is the invariable law of this court that as the defendant is compelled to answer on oath the charges of the bill his answer must be taken to be true, unless contradicted by the positive testimony of two witnesses, or the testimony of one witness, with strong circumstances. The defendant having positively denied the charge against him and supported such denial by the evidence of his book containing the original entry made at the time of the agreement; and there being no proofs against the answer; and it likewise appearing on examining the book that the first parcel of goods was sold on the account and risk of the complainant, we are of opinion that the weight of evidence strongly preponderates in favour of defendant; and that he can by no means be considered as a guarantee to the complainant for the *goods sold, and therefore he is not liable for any loss sustained by the insolvency of the persons to whom they were sold. It was ordered and decreed, that the defendant assign over to complainant and deliver to his attorney the vouchers against the respective purchasers of the goods, on being indemnified; also that he account before the master for what monies he has received; that a commission of five per cent. be allowed on such monies; and only two and one half, for the goods sold and not paid for; that a reasonable allowance be also made for store hire; and lastly that the complainant do pay the costs of this suit.

*460

---

1 Desaus. 460

Case CVII.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

JOHN REID v. JAMES SMITH, Attorney for J. Nutt.

(October, 1795.)

[War ⇦29.]

A creditor entitled to priority of payment out of an estate, under an act of the legislature, selects and receives in payment a bond growing out of the sales of the estate; and afterwards assigns it to a third person. The other funds of the estate are transferred to other creditors. Some doubts arising whether the bond first abovementioned would be good, the assignee filed a bill to get the benefit of the other funds of the estate. The court was of opinion that the election having been made of a particular fund, and the remainder transferred to other creditors, they could not now be disturbed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see War, Cent. Dig. § 191; Dec. Dig. ⇦29.]

Chancellor MATHEWS delivered the decree of the court.

G. Dupont's estate was confiscated, and the lands sold by the commissioners of confiscated estates, and bonds were taken from the purchasers. A special act of the legislature appropriated to Jane Villeponteux, the sum of £472. 17s. 7d. out of the said estate, in preference to other creditors, under peculiar circumstances of claim; for payment of which the commissioners assigned to her Wainwright's bond. Nutt and other creditors got the bonds of other purchasers. Glover one of the purchasers of lands of the estate, got relieved from his purchase, by decree of this court; and Wainwright also applied to the court to be relieved. Jane Villeponteux meanwhile assigned the bond of Wainwright to J. Reid the complainant, who applied to the court to enjoin defendant from selling the land purchased by Glover (and which was about to be resold to pay Nutt) under an idea that the land bought by Wainwright (out of which grew the bond, which was assigned to J. Villeponteux and by her to J. Reid) would be insufficient to pay the bond, at the present reduced prices of land, if Wainwright should be released from his purchase, as Glover had been. That complainant had a lien on all the lands of the estate of G. Du*pont, for payment of his bond, under the act of the legislature giving Jane Villeponteux a priority of payment out of G. Dupont's estate. The court was of opinion, that J. Reid had no lien. The lands had been sold to different persons, and J. Villeponteux had made her election out of the bonds; and the bond she chose being assigned to her, the act of the legislature was fulfilled, and the other creditors of J. Dupont were entitled to the remainder. The court therefore dismissed so much of the bill as related to this point, but retained so much of the bill as related to Wainwright's purchase, until the final decision of the cause depending before the court, between Wainwright and the commissioners of forfeited estates.

*461

1 Desaus. 461

Case CVIII.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

THE COMMISSIONERS OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS v. HUGH ROSE, ADAM TUNNO, WILLIAM TUNNO and A. MOULTRIE.

(October, 1795.)

[Attorney and Client ⇐99; Attorney General ⇐6.]

An attorney general acting for the state, suing for a bond put in his hands for recovery, settles the debt with the agent of the debtor, by receiving houses, merchandizes, &c. which he applied to his own use; and did not pay over the proceeds to the state; but he debited himself in the account. He was then very greatly embarrassed. His releasing the debt, and giving up the bond and mortgage to the debtor, does not release the debtor, for he had no right to release the debt without actual payment to him. The original debtor was decreed to pay the debt, though he was ignorant of all these transactions, having furnished his agent with funds to purchase indents, and pay the debt.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Noonan v. Gray's Ex'rs, 1 Bailey, 437.

For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 200; Dec. Dig. ⇐99; Attorney General, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. ⇐6.]

[Attorney and Client ⇐76.]

[Cited in Mayer v. Blease, 4 S. C. 11, to the point that as a general rule the attorney's authority terminates with the judgment.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 130; Dec. Dig. ⇐76.]

[Attorney and Client ⇐98.]

[Payment to the attorney is payment to the party.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 190; Dec. Dig. ⇐98.]

[Attorney and Client ⇐100.]

[An attorney at law by virtue of his general authority may receive the money due on the judgment, and satisfy the same.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 204; Dec. Dig. ⇐100.]

[Principal and Agent ⇐197.]

[The obligor in a bond employed an agent, in whose hands he deposited funds for the purpose, to satisfy the bond; but the agent improperly procured the attorney of the obligee to cancel the bond, without applying the funds of the obligor. In a suit by the obligee against the obligor, in which the bond was decreed a subsisting security, it was held that no decree could be made against the agent, although a party to the suit, for want of privity between him and the obligee.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 733; Dec. Dig. ⇐197.]

This was a bill filed on behalf of the estate, to recover a debt originally due by Hugh Rose. The bill charged that Hugh Rose was bound, together with J. B. Fon, as his security, in a bond bearing date the 17th December, 1783, in the penal sum of £49,200. 10s. with condition for the payment of the sum of £24,600. 5s. in specie or indents, with interest, to the commissioners of the treasury, for the use of the state, on or before the 17th day of December, 1788: and that the said Hugh Rose to secure the payment thereof, mortgaged several tracts of land to the said commissioners. That the said debt being unpaid, the said bond was placed sometime in April, 1789, in the hands of A. Moultrie, the attorney general, to sue for and recover the principal and interest due on said bond, according to the condition thereof; but that he did not pursue any measures at law or in equity to recover the said debt. That the commissioners requiring an account from him, he rendered in an account, by which he debited himself in the sum of £26,000 on account of the said bond, *and as assumed by him. That the commissioners required and obtained from the said A. Moultrie, according to the custom of the office, the original bond and mortgage, but the seals and signatures of the parties were torn off, and the following receipts endorsed. "Received 9th June, 1790, £6,400 in indents in part of this bond. (Signed) A. Moultrie." "Received 26th July, 1790, £13,000 in indents in part of the within bond. (Signed) A. Moultrie." That not being satisfied on this subject, the commissioners questioned the said A. Moultrie as to the mode of settlement of said bond, and of the cancelling thereof; and he candidly disclosed to them such particulars, as satisfied them, upon the advice of the present attorney general, that the cancelling the said bond, and the entry of satisfaction on the mortgage, would not under the circumstances attending the transaction, be deemed sufficient in a court of equity to release the parties therefrom, or bar the state of its right to revive and set up the same in full force. The bill charges that the defendant Hugh Rose, employed A. and W. Tunno as his agents, and supplied them with funds, to purchase indents, then in a state of depreciation, and to apply the same to the payment of his said bond, and that the said agents in pursuance thereof purchased large sums in indents (said to be to the amount of £31,000) on account of the said Hugh Rose, to be applied to pay said bond. But that indents rising in value rapidly on the assumption of the state debts by congress, the said agents were induced to fund or dispose of the said indents, at a great profit, and to resort to some other method of settling said bond. That no part of the payment of £6,400 expressed in the receipt of the 9th June, 1790, was actually paid in indents; but was made up by discounting debts of the said A. Moultrie, or some other way. That of the sum of £13,000, expressed in the receipt of the 26th July, 1790, no part was paid in indents. But that two houses in Charleston were accepted by the said A. Moultrie, in lieu of the said indents, at a certain rate and valuation: and the agents paid £3,548 in unfundable indents; and finally gave their bond for £12,000 the computed balance due on said bond of *Hugh Rose to the said A. Moultrie; and prevailed on the said A. Moultrie to give them a written receipt in full discharge of the said H. Rose, against his said bond, which was cancelled, and to enter satisfaction on the mortgage. That the said agents in their account with the said H. Rose charged him with the amount, as paid in indents at a certain rate. And the said agents afterwards took up their said bond of £12,000 by paying some indents, and by settling sundry debts due by the said A. Moultrie, at a discount; and by delivering him sundry goods, wares and merchandizes, which were applied to his own uses, and of which the said agents could not be ignorant, as they well knew he was in a state of embarrassment. That the commissioners of public accounts not considering such a mode of settlement at all binding or obligatory on the state, applied to the said H. Rose and A. Tunno, to satisfy and settle the said bond debt, according to law. But they having refused to do so, the complainants pray relief on behalf of the state: and that the said bond and mortgage should be revived and set up, and the defendants obliged to satisfy the same.

*462

*463

The defendant Hugh Rose in his answer admitted the execution of the bond and mortgage as stated in the bill; and that he appointed A. and W. Tunno, merchants in Charleston, to purchase indents for him, in order to pay off the said debt, for which he was to furnish funds. That some time after, A. Tunno, after various previous communications, informed the defendant that he had purchased indents for him to the amount of £31,000 and hoped shortly to procure the balance. They were then selling at seven or eight for one. After some time he delivered to the defendant, his own and his surety's names taken from the bond, and the attorney general's receipt, dated 18th July, 1790, for £35,936 17s. 2d. in principal indents, in full of Mr. Hugh Rose's and J. B. Pon's bond to the state, and satisfaction was also entered on the mortgage. That soon after A. Tunno furnished this defendant with his indent account, in which he charges him for £35,936. 17s. 2d. in indents, purchased on account of the defendant; £4,559 10s. sterling (payable in paper *medium,) and the defendant solemnly declared that he believed that the attorney general had actually received indents to the amount of £35,936 17s. 2d. in satisfaction of said debt: That he had no information that indents had not been paid him, and that he never knew that his bond had not been paid off in indents, till he received a letter from the commissioners informing him of it. The defendant submitted that he could not be implicated in the transactions that took place between the said Adam Tunno, and the attorney general, and he pleads his discharge, fairly obtained by him.

*464

The answer of Adam Tunno admits that Hugh Rose gave the bond stated in the bill: which was put in suit by A. Moultrie the attorney general, and upon payment of the principal and interest, the said bond was cancelled, and satisfaction entered on the mortgage, by A. Moultrie the attorney general, acting on behalf of the state. That this defendant made the payments to the said A. Moultrie with good faith; and they could as well have been made in indents as in any other way: and that the said A. Moultrie, having received the payments, was alone accountable to the state; and the legislature directed suit to be brought against said Moultrie, on which he confessed judgment and is accountable. That defendant meant no fraud against the state, but supposed that the said A. Moultrie was fully authorized to make the settlement he did. That the defendant Hugh Rose was entirely unacquainted with the mode of settlement made by this defendant with A. Moultrie, and this defendant admits that the said A. Moultrie took off the seals and signatures of the debtors, and gave the receipts and entered the satisfaction stated; which the defendant relies upon as a full and sufficient discharge. That defendant was employed by Hugh Rose to purchase indents to pay off his bond, and advanced some funds for that purpose, but not sufficient to enable him to pay off the bond. That he settled the debt partly in indents, and partly in other ways satisfactory to the said Moultrie; and he sold part of the indents, but never funded any. That he settled with said A. Moultrie by paying some of his debts, at *his particular request, at the current rate of indents, and without any gain to defendant; being satisfied that the said A. Moultrie had full power to represent the state, and give sufficient discharges. That some of the other payments were made by goods furnished said A. Moultrie at his desire, at fair cash prices, and receipts given for indents at the current price of eight for one. That the settlement for the other sums receipted took place by the sale of houses in the same way; the houses being worth the sums allowed for them in indents, at the instance of the said A. Moultrie. This defendant admits that he and his brother William gave their bond to the said Alexander on account of the state for the balance due on H. Rose's bond, which he thought was perfectly fair and just; and he afterwards took up the said bond, by payments according to law; and never paid by taking up any of said Moultrie's debts at a discount. Defendant denies that he knew that it was not in A. Moultrie's power to settle the amount of this debt to the public; and this defendant never informed said H. Rose of his mode of settling with A. Moultrie; and this defendant avers he made no profit by these transactions, but was an actual loser, as appears by his statement. That the state would not have been benefited by the payment of the whole debt in indents, as the sums actually paid the attorney general in indents were applied by him to his own use, and not accounted for.

*465

The defendant A. Moultrie admitted that A. Tunno, acting as the agent of Mr. H. Rose, settled with him the debt due on bond by H. Rose to the public, which he held as attorney general, by various arrangements, partly by the purchase of houses, some merchandizes, &c. and this defendant assumed to pay the debt to the state, according to the tenor of the bond. That all the settlements were with Mr. Tunno, and not at all with Mr. H. Rose. He was much pressed and urged by Mr. Tunno, and finally yielded and made the arrangements desired of him: being fully convinced that his resources would enable him to settle the debt to the public which he had assumed, and in which he has been unhappily disappointed.

*466

*At the hearing of this cause Mr. Trezevant argued for the state, that the attorney of the state had no right to settle the debt, and give discharges in the manner he did. That the principle is a broad and general one. An attorney cannot withdraw the action of his client, but it must be by a retraxit by the client himself. A factor cannot pledge the goods of his principal for his own debt. See Wood's Institutes, 55, 6. 2 Strange, 1164. See 3 Bacon, 562. Salk. 442. Raym. 928. 2 Shower, 139. 8 Co. 58. It was decided in the case of Sarrazin v. Nelson that neither the plaintiff's attorney, nor the sheriff have a right to discharge the debtor, unless the money is actually paid to one or the other. Tunno must have known the situation of Moultrie, as there were many judgments and mortgages on his property; and Moultrie must be considered the agent of Tunno, for as he paid Moultrie no indents, he trusted to him to procure them and satisfy the public demand, which could be satisfied in no other way, and the discharge was of no validity, till the debt was effectually paid.

Mr. Marshall, for defendants, insisted that the court could not set aside such a release, unless shewn to have been obtained by fraud, and there was no proof of that. He cited 4 Burr. 2046. Strange. 1182, Cowp. 255.

General C. C. Pinckney and Mr. Edward Rutledge for defendants. The legislature having directed a suit to be instituted against Moultrie for his default, and having recovered a verdict against him, cannot have a double remedy; especially against Mr. Rose, who has had no share in these transactions, and who furnished the funds necessary to purchase the indents to pay the bond. Tunno might have sold his houses for indents, and paid them to Moultrie. If he had done so there would have been an end of the business, as to Tunno and Rose, even if Moultrie had never paid over the indents to the state. His transferring the houses and other articles direct to Moutrie cannot make any difference. Moultrie assumed the debt on himself, cancelled the bond and mortgage, and made himself debtor to the state; which should look to him. If the bond was illegally cancelled there was a reme*dy at law, according to a decision of lord Mansfield, reported in Durnford and East; and the suit should have been brought at law. Cases quoted, 3 Bacon, 698. 3 Wilson, 345, 2 Bla. rep. 866. 3 Wilson, 374. 1 Salk. 86.

*467

Mr. Pringle, (attorney general,) for complainants. When the bond and mortgage were cancelled, not a cent of money or indents had been paid on the bond. The payments were in merchandizes and houses, delivered and conveyed to Moultrie himself, who applied them to his own use. For the balance Tunno gave his bond, and that had been settled and taken up chiefly in the same way. Tunno could not be allowed the benefit of the commutation act: for whoever claimed that, was required by law to take an oath that he had not the indents previous to the passing the law: and Tunno admits by his answer that he had purchased indents for Rose to pay the bond to the amount of £21,000. Had Tunno paid money to Moultrie equivalent to the current price of indents, this might have answered, and the release of the bond might have been supported. But having paid neither money nor indents, according to the tenor of the bond, but lands and goods, it must be considered as no payment. If Tunno trusted to Moultrie to satisfy the public, and he has not done so, he must look to Moultrie, but the public must be paid by their original debtors: For as attorney for the state, Moultrie had no more right to release the public debt, but in consideration of actual payment, than a common attorney had to release the debt of his client without payment. Tunno must have known that Moultrie was deeply involved; It was notorious: and that the kind of settlements he was making with him put the public debt in jeopardy. What is done by the agent is virtually the act of the principal, and he is liable: If therefore Tunno has acted improperly as the agent of Rose, the latter must be accountable. At the time the state ordered a suit against Moultrie and recovered a verdict against him, the legislature and its public officers knew nothing of the mode in which this debt had been settled; but it was supposed that the debt of Rose had been paid in indents, as it ought to have been: and as it was represented by Moultrie, who debited himself in his account for indents. Therefore no inference can be drawn of the state intending to waive its claim against Rose and Tunno. Quoted 1 Burr. 128. 3 Viner. 303. 1 Durnford and East. 757.

*468

After the court had deliberated, it delivered the following decree:

The importance of this case is occasioned more by the magnitude of the debt, than any real difficulty or intricacy in the subject.—It must be determined on two points:

Whether the defendant Hugh Rose has complied with the conditions of his bond, which was to pay £24,600 5s. with interest, in specie or indents, to the commissioners of the treasury, or their successors in office, in trust for the use of the state, on the 17th December 1788?

If he did not, whether the defendant Moultrie, in whose hands the bond was placed by the commissioners for the purpose of suing the same, and recovering the debt, could legally cancel and release it without actually receiving payment in specie or indents, according to the condition thereof?

That the condition of the bond was not complied with cannot be denied: however, there is no fraud imputable to the defendant Mr. Rose in the transaction, his conduct was fair and upright in every point of view. He positively swears, that when he received his own and his security's name, which had been torn off the bond by the defendant Mr. Moultrie, and was sent him by his agent the defendant Mr. Tunno, he conscientiously believed the debt had been actually paid in indents, and that the account which he afterwards received and settled with Tunno confirmed him in his belief. The defendants Tunno and Moultrie both acknowledge that only a small part of the debt was paid in indents, and that the remainder was satisfied by his (Tunno's) assuming payment of a number of demands against Moultrie; by the sale of two houses to him, and in various other ways.

The first point being thus disposed of, the second remains only to be determined, viz.

*469

Whether the defendant *Moultrie, who acted as an attorney at law to sue for the debt, could legally release it without actual receipt of the indents or specie? The cases of master and servant, &c. cited by the counsel for the state, although in some degree similar, are not immediately applicable to the present. Nor does the case of persons, appointed by letter of attorney, apply altogether, because they are generally vested with power to receive, compound, or compromise with debtors; but the authority of an attorney at law is materially different: and we cannot consider the attorney general in any other point of view, when suing for the debts due the state. He is to sue for and recover a debt. After judgment and execution his authority was at an end. The judgment and execution evince it: the latter directing the sheriff to bring the money into court at a certain day, to be paid to the plaintiff; and it was formerly doubted whether payment to the attorney, was payment to the party; though it is now settled to be so. The cases in Salkeld and Blackstone, cited by defendant's counsel, are certainly good law, but they are confined merely to the acts of the attorney in the course of the proceedings in the cause, and do not relate to his receipt of his client's debt. And in a case in Salkeld, 88, it is expressly declared by the court, that if an attorney suffer a judgment against his client, and he is not responsible, which means of ability to satisfy his client in damages, if the judgment be irregular; the court will set aside the judgment; for otherwise the defendant would have no remedy, and any one might be undone by that means. From the whole train of authorities, it is evident that he must actually receive the money, and that an ideal payment, or the receipt of any thing else in lieu of it, will not bind his client. It cannot be supposed that the defendant Tunno, on a moment's reflection, could have imagined the defendant Moultrie was authorized to settle the debt in the manner he proposed and did settle it; or that he could totally alter the state of the debt, and become the obligor instead of Rose: the idea is too absurd. Tunno, it is plain, was not authorized to make the negotiation he did; it was an unwarranttable speculation, *between him and Moultrie, on Rose and the state. Suppose it was a case between two individuals, it is reduced then to this single point, on whom in justice and equity ought the loss to fall? On the plaintiff, whose attorney released the debt without recovering the money? Or the defendant Rose, whose agent was in possession of funds to pay the debt; but instead thereof speculated with them for his own advantage, and settled the debt in a manner which he was not authorized to do by his principal? Most certainly the loss must be the defendant Rose's, according to the maxim which invariably prevails in courts of law as well as equity, that the principal is civilly responsible for the acts of his agent: And though there is not any fraud imputed to the defendant Tunno, his irregular conduct must affect his principal. In the case of Latham and Sarrazin, lately determined in the court of common pleas, it was clearly settled, that an attorney can do no act incompatible with the nature and end of his authority: and that if he was to give a discharge or remit the debt without receiving it, his client would not be bound by it. The defendant Tunno having acted contrary to the trust or confidence reposed in him, the defendant Rose must seek redress against him, for whatever damages he may sustain. And as on the one hand, the state would have been bound by the defendant Moultrie's act, if he had actually received the specie or indents for Rose's debt; so on the other hand, as he has not received the specie or indents, Rose shall not be released from payment, although his bond has been cancelled. Creditors would be placed in a perilous situation indeed, if by the combination of an attorney with the debtor or his agent, a receipt without payment of the money should be deemed sufficiently valid to discharge the debtor from his obligation. It is undoubtedly a hard case on the defendant Rose; but it is a hardship which every one is liable to, who reposes so unlimited a confidence in another as he did in the defendant Tunno; who though a party in this suit, yet as there was no privity of contract between the state and him, cannot be decreed to pay the debt.

*470

*471

*It is therefore ordered and decreed, that it be referred to the master to ascertain the sum either in indents or specie that has been actually paid to the defendant Moultrie on account of the defendant Rose's bond, and to report the balance, which is still owing and unpaid: That the bond notwithstanding the receipts thereon, shall be considered a subsisting contract, and the defendant and his security still liable for the payment of what shall be reported due. Also, that the mortgage given by the said defendant Rose as an additional security be deemed and held as still binding, notwithstanding the acknowledgement of satisfaction thereof, the same having been illegally vacated, without a valuable consideration. And lastly, that the defendant H. Rose do pay the costs of complainant, and the costs of the defendants shall be paid by them respectively.

---

1 Desaus. 471

Case CIX.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

MARY LOOCOCK v. WILLIAM CLARKSON, A. L. CLARKSON, and ARCHIBALD BROWN, Executors of Aaron Loocock.

(July, 1796.)

[Wills ⊂⊃810.]

A testator bequeathed to his wife an annuity of £300 for life, and also several specific legacies, in lieu of dower. By a codicil he made additional bequests to his wife. The rest of his estate, after several pecuniary legacies to others, he devised and bequeathed to his two nephews, partly specifically, and partly as residuary legatees: one of them was a favorite nephew, brought up as his son, and who had devoted himself to his uncle's affairs for many years. The testator left a large real and personal estate; but so much in debt that the pecuniary legacies could not be paid: And if the annuities for the wife should be raised, it would trench on the legacies to the nephews. The wife was decreed not to be liable to abate with the nephews: and the annuity was directed to be raised by them and secured to her. The husband when dying abroad, gave his wife an order for £100 to pay her expenses home. Decreed that she should be paid that amount, by the executor.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Cogdell's Ex'rs v. Widow, Heirs and Devisees, 3 Desaus. 389.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 2106; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃810.]

Mr. Aaron Loocock being in possession of a considerable estate, real as well as personal, made his last will and testament on the 14th day of April, 1791. Wherein amongst other things, he directed his just debts to be paid; and then, he bequeathed to his wife Mary Loocock, the annual sum of £300 during her natural life, in order that she might live in quiet, and easy circumstances. He also bequeathed to her, sundry negro slaves, about 23 in number, and his plate, furniture, carriages, horses, liquors, &c. And he devised to her the use of his plantation, in St. James's Parish; and the use, and occupation of his house in Charleston, for life. All of which was to be in lieu and bar of dower. And the testator bequeathed, as a mark of his affection for his wife, £1,000 to be paid to whomever she should appoint, if she died before the *testator. He also bequeathed, £1,000 apiece, to his two sisters, to be remitted to them as soon as possible. The testator then devised to his nephew, William Clarkson, his plantation, called Middleborough, near the Great Raft, on the Wateree river, and he bequeathed his said nephew the remainder of his slaves, with some stipulated exceptions; and he bequeathed to his nephew A. L. Clarkson, sundry slaves by name, and a plantation, and £1,000. The testator bequeathed to two nieces in England, £1,000 apiece, with directions to his executor to be very particular in securing these legacies. And he bequeathed other pecuniary legacies to several persons. The surplus of his estate, real and personal, he directed to be sold, and the proceeds, after payment of his debts, he bequeathed to his nephews W. Clarkson and A. L. Clarkson, his residuary legatees. And he appointed his said nephews, his brother in law, A. Brown, and others, to be his executors. The testator made a codicil to his will, on the 13th day of November, 1793, being then at New-York, by which after confirming the legacies to his wife, he bequeathed her some additional slaves. The testator also gave his said wife an order on W. Leight, of New-York, for £100 to bear her expenses home, which she delivered to Mr. W. Clarkson, soon after the death of her husband; and which she believes has been paid to him. The testator died about the 11th February, 1794, leaving the said will and codicil in force, and the defendant W. Clarkson proved and qualified thereon as executor, and A. Brown and A. L. Clarkson also qualified thereon; and they possessed themselves of the estate, and particularly of the estates bequeathed to the two Clarksons. But they have not made any provision for the regular payment of the annuity to the said Mrs. Loocock, the widow. The widow claimed a preference, over all the legatees, as a purchaser, because what was bequeathed her, was in lieu and bar of dower, in great landed estate: which provision she was willing to accept if the annuity was secured to her, and the other legacies paid, and delivered to her. But the executors not considering her claims entitled to a preference, she filed her bill for relief.

*472

*473

*The executors contended, that as the debts were much larger than had been anticipated, and would exhaust the funds intended for the payment of the debts; and as none of the pecuniary legacies could be paid; and the specific legatees would be obliged to abate, that the widow was bound to abate proportionably with them. That in all events the specific legacies to the defendant W. Clarkson, ought not to be obliged to contribute to the annuity, as the testator had brought him up as his child, (being a favorite nephew,) and had promised to provide for him, as his child; and he had devoted the best part of his life to his uncle's service, in his counting house, unrewarded. His uncle feeling his services to be so indispensable to him in the management of his affairs, would not permit him to go into any kind of business: as he had abundant opportunities to do, with advantage. And he remained in his uncle's service, devoted exclusively to his business, without any reward but a maintenance, till his death, when his nephew was 30 years of age. And the nephew under these circumstances considered himself not less a purchaser for valuable consideration than the complainant.

It was insisted that the annuity of the complainant stood legally on the footing of the pecuniary legacies, and must abate with them—and that at all events she could not be on a better footing than the specific legatees. And that the lands devised specifically could not be touched to pay debts, till the whole personal estate should be exhausted.

The defendant stated that he never received the payment of the order on Mr. Laight, having destroyed it when delivered to him by the complainant, as he had carried abundant funds to New York for the use of his uncle: and he paid the expenses at New York and supplied the complainant with money there.

Mr. D. Deas, Mr. E. Rutledge and general C. C. Pinckney contended for the complainant, that a woman is entitled to dower even against the claim of creditors, previous to her marriage. See 1 Eq. Cases abr. 218. 1. 2. 220. 8. 1 P. Wms. 693. 730. Wives are preferred. *See Cooper v. Williams, Prec. in Chanc. 71. In all cases where a devise to the wife is in lieu of dower, it is preferred to all other claims. See Burridge v. Bradyll, 1 P. Wms. 127. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 552. pl. 5. This case is not shaken by Hinton and Pinke, so far as relates to the wife being a purchaser of the annuity by releasing her dower; but only so far as the decree related to the annuity being a pecuniary legacy. See also Lewin v. Lewin, 2 Ves. senior 415. Blower v. Morret, 2 Ves. senior 420. Davenhill v. Fletcher, Ambler, 244. Swinburne, 277, 8. 2 Vern. 477. 3 Atk. 369. 2 P. Wms. 701. When a legacy is given in lieu of dower it is not liable to abate as the other legacies are. The gift of the £100 was a donatio causa mortis. And this can only be avoided by creditors, or by a wife, or by those who have such an interest in his estate as he cannot dispose of. It takes effect before a legacy. In devising to Clarkson the testator does not say it is in lieu of what he owed him; though it would be a satisfaction, if he owed him any thing. Lands are liable in this country for simple contract debts. By Stat. 5. Geo. II. And the act for the abolition of the rights of primogeniture has placed real and personal estate nearly on a footing. And equitas sequitur legem: There is no reason now for saying that real estate is less a fund for payment of debts than the personal estate. The hæres factus is not favored. See 4 Burns, 244, 5, 6. 282. Talb. 53. The annuity is not an absolute gift to complainant. It is only for life—Yet is in lieu of dower.

*474

Mr. Desaussure and Mr. Ford argued for the defendants, that even if the wife's annuity was entitled to a preference over the pecuniary legacies, it does not follow that she is entitled to such preference over the specific. And in this case, the fund will be so exhausted that the specific legatees will be obliged to abate. And there are no decisions that the annuity to the wife has ever been decreed to be paid in preference to specific legacies. The cases shew that an annuitant is not considered as a specific, but as a pecuniary legatee. 3 Atk. 693. 2 Comyns 190, 259, 235. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 555. See 1 P. Wms. 544. The annuity is not bound to be made good at all events: *it is not charged on any particular fund, and therefore comes out of the general estate; and is liable to abate, by the very words of lord Hardwicke, in 3 Atk. 693. So in Blower v. Morret, 2 Vesey, 420. So in Lewin v. Lewin, 2 Vesey, 415. If an annuity is not specific, but pecuniary, then it abates even with pecuniary legacies; and is postponed to specific legacies. 2 Vern. 688. 2 Vesey, 623. 1 Vern. 31. See 1 P. Wms 540.

*475

Mr. Clarkson is a specific legatee as to the personal estate, and a specific devisee of the real estate devised him. 2 Vern. 688. and 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 298. Fonb. on Eq. 374. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 555, note. Indeed any devisee of land is a specific devisee. See 1 P. Wms. 678. 2. Eq. Cas. abr. 556. 2 Com. 190. Mr. Clarkson's equity is as strong as Mrs. Loocock's. The will of the testator treats him as his favored nephew and his adopted son. Mrs. Loocock has elected the annuity and legacies in preference to her dower—and she takes them with their precise legal qualities and characteristics, as any other legatee would do. Mr. Clarkson is not a volunteer. He states his equity to the provision made for him by the will, upon oath in his answer, and the facts are conceded to him. The devises to him then are a recompense, and ought not to be postponed to any other legatee. If the complainant loses part of her annuity, he will lose part of his legacies by the debts. Their equity is equal and their claims at least on an equal footing.

Chancellor MATTHEWS delivered the decree of the Court.

This is one of those cases which admit of a great deal of argument, but which is ultimately resolved into a very narrow compass. Very elaborate arguments have been accordingly gone into; the result of which has been to reduce the case to a single point, viz. whether the bequests to the complainant, by the will of her late husband A. Loocock, either pecuniary or specific, are liable to abate in proportion with the other pecuniary or specific legacies, on a deficiency of assets, to pay both debts and legacies? And after all the industry and researches of counsel, it is admitted on all hands, that there is not a case in the *books, which is assimilated to the present, in all its material parts. We concede to this assertion; for upon the strictest examination of all the cases that have been referred to, we find that they treat upon the general doctrine of, and the distinctions taken between, pecuniary and specific legacies, except the cases of Blower and Morret, 2 Vez. 420, and Burridge and Bradyll, 1 P. Wms. 127, in which the point of dower is included, and on which point those cases were decided. In the case of Luthins and Leigh, Talbot, 53, although the bequest in that case, is in lieu of dower, yet the decision does not rest on that point, but turns on that of placing the legatee on the footing of a bond creditor, so as to constitute a lien on the real estate, where they have exhausted the personal assets in payment of their demands. In these cases the bequests have been pecuniary; and had they not been given in satisfaction of dower, whereby the legatee was contemplated as a purchaser of such legacy, the decisions would have been as they uniformly are, that is, to consider them as mere pecuniary legacies; and consequently subject to abate on failure of assets. But in the case before us, the annuity is a general charge on the testator's whole estate. There is no sum specified to be laid out in the purchase of an annuity—there is no particular fund pointed out by the testator, from whence the annuity is to be drawn. The words of the will are "I give and devise and bequeath unto my dear and affectionate wife Mary Loocock the annual sum of 300*l* sterling, each and every year, during the term of her natural life, in order that she may live in quiet and easy circumstances."

*476

The technical words, devise and bequeath, we well know the meaning of; and from the use made of them by the testator, we are to presume he also understood their meaning; for in the different clauses of his will, he regularly makes use of the word devise, when lands are the object of his bounty, and when a personal thing he uses the word bequeath; therefore as he has used both words in the clause, respecting the annuity to his wife, a fair deduction may be made, that by the generality of the *terms made use of by him, he meant to charge his whole estate, and render it responsible for the payment of the annuity. Here the rule of construction of wills presents itself, and must influence the decision of this point; that is, what was the testator's intention? When this is ascertained, and it does not militate against the rules of law, it must prevail. There never has been a case presented to this court for consideration, in which the intention of the testator has been more clearly manifested. Who is the first object of his bounty? His wife. And is it not right that she should be so? He had no child. Who then so naturally, so justly, and so consistently with every law, divine and human, ought to have a claim on his benevolence as his wife? One with whom he had lived in harmony and conjugal felicity for upwards of thirty years. A man's will is supposed to be the last act of his life. In that of the testator, Mr. Loocock, he mentions his wife in the most endearing terms; and so anxious did he then appear for her future felicity, that he expressly says, that the annuity is given her to render those days in which she is to remain in this world, (when he himself shall be no more) easy and comfortable. And who so proper a judge of what would be adequate to this purpose, as he was? That adequacy he has himself fixed; and it would be a very ungracious thing then in this court to strip her of that means of quiet and comfort intended by the testator; and thereby oblige her to taste of the bitter cup of indigence in the wane of life; a period when human nature requires all the comforts of ease and tranquillity.

*477

That the complainant was the first object of the testator's bounty and munificence, appears by his will; but she is also the last, which is shewn by his codicil. By the latter, so far from thinking that he had done too much for her, he increases what he had before given her, by giving her an absolute estate in a part in which he had before given her only a life estate; and she is here the sole object of his bounty. And it is proper here to mention, that this was done upwards of two years after he had made his will, in which time he had full leisure to consider not only of what he had before done for his wife, but *also of the situation of his affairs. The most natural conclusion therefore must be, that he did not think his liberal intentions were liable to be defeated, nor is it now pretended that they will be so, as to the defendants. But it is however contended that one of the defendants, Wm. Clarkson, was equally the object of his bounty with his wife; the testator having taken him from his parents in is early youth, educated him and brought him up to business, in the mercantile line; that he had spent the best years of his life in the testator's service; and that he had always promised to reward him with a large proportion of his estate at his death. That he was equally the object of the testator's bounty, no part of his will can justify. That he was one of the principal objects of his bounty we will readily admit; nor has it been by any means shewn that he will not be immediately so. It is true he might not receive that prompt and extensive benefit out of the testator's estate, which he might have expected, owing to there having appeared to be larger debts against his estate, than he had calculated upon; and the property left by him being of a more depreciated value than he had estimated it at. But the effect of this mistake of the testator will be, not the disappointment of the defendant, but of others, who might have expected to have shared some part of his bounty. As it is represented by defendants in their answer, that not one shilling of the testator's pecuniary bequests can be paid, the consequence will be, that so large a sum as 3570*l.* intended by him for other persons, will be appropriated to the benefit of defendants, by paying so much of the debts of the testator. These advantages do not stop here; for upon the death of the complainant every thing given her, except the few negroes contained in the codicil, and some furniture and stock of cattle, will fall into the residuum of the estate, and become the property of one, or the other of the defendants. Where then arises the great hardship, that has been so loudly complained of? We can by no means think the complaint well founded. Hence the testator's intentions as to the complainant, admit of no doubt. It remains to examine whether they are in any respect in*consistent with any principle of law. So far from it, that they are warranted by the adjudged cases of Blower and Morret, and Burridge and Bradyll, as far as those cases correspond with the present case. If those cases then induced the decisions made by the court, on how much stronger ground shall we stand in determining in favor of the complainant in the principal case. In those cases the bequests are accompanied by no special words. They are simply for sums of money, to be paid out of a particular fund or to be laid out in the purchase of an annuity. But as they were given in satisfaction of the wife's dower, the court considered the legacies not only as specific, but that the legatees were fair purchasers; and therefore not liable to abate, with other legacies of the same description. How much stronger then is the case before us? The words annexed to the legacy are nearly tantamount to a positive injunction, that it shall be paid in preference to any other; otherwise the testator's intentions cannot be complied with. The charge appears to have been intended to be on his whole estate: and in lieu of dower, out of a very large real estate: which probably might be equal in value to the legacy given. Besides, the sum she would be entitled to, out of lands already sold, to which she never had renounced her dower, and those which are unsold, would have been a vested interest in her, at her own disposal, whereas she takes nothing by the will, except the trifle before mentioned; but a contingent interest, depending on her life. As to the orders for 100*l.* given to the complainant by her husband a few days previous to his death, to bear her expenses to this state, and by her afterwards given up to the defendant Wm. Clarkson—that point having been conceded by the defendant's counsel, it is unnecessary for us to make any particular observations on it. On the whole, we are clearly of opinion that the claim of the complainant is a well founded one, and ought to be complied with.

*478

*479

It is therefore decreed, that the executors of the testator A. Loocock, do, under the direction of the master, give such security for the regular payment of the annuity of £300 left her by her late husband Aaron Loocock, as *shall be approved by him; that they deliver over to her, such parts of the testator's estate as is assigned her by his will; and that they return her the sum of £100 given her by her husband to bear her expenses to this state after his death; first deducting therefrom, the amount of what was advanced her by the defendant Wm. Clarkson for that purpose. And that the costs of this suit be paid out of the estate of A. Loocock.

*480

---

1 Desaus. 480

Case CX.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

NEUFVILLE v. W. B. MITCHELL and J. MITCHELL.

(March, 1796.)

[Specific Performance ⊂=121.]

The complainant filed his bill for specific performance of an agreement with the defendant for the sale of certain lands and negroes, at stipulated prices, to be paid at certain fixed periods. The agreements were very loose and informal; and there were two memoranda stating different instalments. The defendant in his answer swears positively that the memorandum fixing the longest periods for payment, was the basis of the agreement actually made. The answer connected with that memorandum and not contradicted by proofs, is to be relied upon, and the payments decreed to be made accordingly. The land and the negroes being proved to be as good as any in that part of the country; and there being no proof of any misrepresentation or unfairness on the part of the complainant; and the defendant being well acquainted with the property, and having time and opportunity to examine and deliberate; the full price stipulated in the memorandum of agreement, decreed to be paid, and the securities given, notwithstanding the alleged deterioration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 394; Dec. Dig. ⟸121.]

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court:

Complainant's bill states that he was applied to by defendant, W. B. Mitchell on his own and his brother the defendant I. Mitchell's account, to become purchasers of the plantation in bill mentioned, and a considerable number of negroes; that complainant sold them the plantation for £9400 and 137 negroes for £8905. They agreed to pay the sum of £8905 with interest from April, 1794, in three equal annual instalments; and £9400 in six annual installments. They proposed to give bonds for the purchase money, and mortgages not only of the above-mentioned property, but also of 100 other negroes; and a plantation of the said John Mitchell as a security for the payment thereof—That the said W. B. Mitchell took possession of the said plantation and negroes—That he and the defendant John Mitchell have invariably exercised acts of ownership over the property ever since, and are now in actual possession of it; and uniformly refuse to fulfil their part of the contract. The bill therefore prays a specific performance of the agreement and payment to complainant of what he is entitled to receive from them. The defendants in their answer admit the purchase of the lands and negroes; that the land was to be paid for in six annual instalments; but insist that the negroes were to be paid for in five annual installments; and refer *to exhibit A. to prove it. They also admit the agreement to make the mortgages; but insist they were to be made in such mode only as is set forth in the answer. And they admit the possession of the property and exercising acts of ownership over it. The answer of defendant, W. B. Mitchell, then states various other matters, such as loss of crop by freshets, against which he asserts complainant warranted; and that several negroes died with the whooping cough for which complainant was liable; and that many of them were diseased and not taskable; all of which were causes for abatement or reduction in the price of the property. The importance of this case arises more from the magnitude of the debt than any intricacy in the subject. The questions for the determination of the court are two. What was the time stipulated for payment of the negroes, and whether any and what allowance ought to be made on account of the losses, &c. mentioned in defendant W. B. Mitchell's answer. As to the first point respecting the time agreed upon for payment of the negroes. In all cases when a bill is brought for discovery and to compel specific performance of an agreement, the complainant being deficient in proof, defendant's answer must be held as true, so far as respects the agreement; unless contradicted by two witnesses or one witness, and some strong corroborating circumstances. In this case the defendant, W. B. Mitchell has positively denied that he agreed to pay for the negroes in three years, but that the time agreed upon was five years; and to corroborate his answer he refers to an exhibit filed with it being, a list of negroes delivered him by complainant, wherein the terms of payment for the said negroes are specified; in which list it is mentioned that the amount of one third of the purchase money of 144 negroes with interest to 1st April 1795 is £3775. 4s. and immediately under it is said, one fifth of the principal with interest of the negroes is £2588 from which circumstance, and because on the same paper the terms of payment for the land are altered from five to six years, the defendant has sworn positively that the agreement was five and not three years. It must here be observed that a list of the *negroes actually sold and delivered to the defendants is filed with the bill; and on that paper the terms of payment are said to be three years for the negroes, and six years for the land. Whether such a list was ever delivered to the defendant has not appeared; neither of the lists are dated. That referred to by defendant's answer is signed by complainant, the other is not, though both are in his hand writing; so that the court might make choice of either, if the defendant had not sworn so positively that the installments agreed on were five years. The defendant has likewise sworn that £4000 and no more was to be paid for the first instalment, in which he is confirmed by complainant's own memorandum on the list exhibited with his bill. That sum however is rather more than the instalment of one fifth of the purchase money of the negroes with interest, and a sixth of the land; at the same time that it is £1300 less than a third part. This business has been very loosely conducted. There appears to have been various propositions on the subject. All the papers are in complainant's hand writing. The court can only determine on what has been positively sworn to, which is that the agreement was for five years' instalment; and the list referred to by the answer, seems to warrant the conclusion. The complainant perhaps may think it hard to be kept longer out of his money than he intended or thought he had stipulated for; but it is the unavoidable consequence of his own improvident conduct, in parting with the possession of so large and valuable a property without taking the precaution which every prudent man should do, of reducing the agreement to writing and completing his contract at once. The second point for determination is whether any deduction is to be made on account of the injury the defendants have sustained by the loss of crop and the death of negroes. If this question had depended and was to be determined solely on defendant's answer without proof, the complainant would have been in a very unfortunate situation. For the defendant, W. B. Mitchell has sworn that the complainant warranted the land to be perfectly free from all freshes and the negroes free from all dis*eases. The defendant's answer in this particular cannot be taken as sufficient evidence against complainant to charge him with such a warranty. If there had been one, it is probable he had it inserted in the deeds, which his own counsel drew; and those deeds must have been produced to shew what was the agreement. That has not been done, and therefore the court must conclude there was not such a warranty. Indeed it is not reasonable to suppose the complainant would have been so rash as to warrant against all freshes, when it is a matter notorious that there are very few swamp plantations that can be said to be above all freshes. A variety of witnesses have been examined to prove this land liable to freshes, and the negroes unsound, &c. &c. The substance of their testimony however respecting the land is that the land is of the first quality; that it would be returned as such on oath to the tax collectors; that it is as good as any on the river; and it has the best banks of any plantation on the river one only excepted; that very good crops are usually made on it; that it is not generally subject to freshes; that it was overflowed in 1786; the banks were then bad; they have been made entirely new since, and no fresh has gone over them from that period till the year 1794. Mr. Hamilton declares he had sold a plantation opposite, containing only 220 acres for £4000. The land in question is 550 acres and was sold for £9400. That the soil of Hamilton's tract was by no means so good, and the banks very inferior to those of the plantation in question; and that the land is not in the least injured by the fresh. Col. M'Pherson has offered the same price for the land and negroes, which was given by defendant; and that since the fresh of 1794, he offered defendant, W. B. Mitchell £500 for the bargain. With respect to the negroes all the witnesses swear that they are a prime gang, are as orderly as most negroes and as good as any for work; there are more workers than are usually found in so large a number. There are some who are not altogether sound; but yet generally do their tasks when they work. As to those children that died with the whooping cough; from the evidence of Mrs. Strain it appears that one child died the *day it was landed; and none of the others were then apparently infected with it; five or six had it afterwards and died; they were from two to three years old. To rebut her testimony, Palmer, the complainant's overseer at Rocky Point, swore the child had not the disease when it was sent from thence; and the negroes would not have been sent to defendant if he had not sent his boat for them. From this summary view of the evidence then, it is manifest that it is not so hard a bargain as it has been represented to be. The land is equal in value to any tide swamp to the southward, as far as Savannah river; that it is not generally subject to freshes; and the banks are the best but one on the river. Indeed defendant's own counsel candidly acknowledged that it was a very valuable plantation. The negroes are a prime gang, and as valuable as any one consisting of such a number; and it is well known there will always be some indifferent ones among so large a number; and the same price has been since offered for this property. It is to be observed that in this case the application to purchase was made by the defendant to complainant and not offered for sale by complainant to defendant; nor is there the slightest imputation of any unfair conduct on complainant's part. The contract was not hastily entered into; a month having elapsed from the first offer to the conclusion of the agreement; so that the defendant had full time for investigation, to deliberate and consult with his friends upon the business. He saw or might have seen all the negroes before he purchased. He picked them out from different gangs. If therefore he made a bad choice, he has no one to blame but himself. On this point the court considering the whole evidence that has been offered, are clearly of opinion that there is no such deterioration of the property, as should induce a deduction or abatement from the purchase money, except as to one negro who was under Dr. O. Driscoll's care, for a complaint in her nose, which was of a nature not always visible. Had there appeared any thing like fraud, circumvention or surprise in this transaction, on the part of complainant; if the contract bore the semblance of unfairness, injustice, unreasonable*ness, or uncertainty in any part of it, the court would undoubtedly have refused to lend its aid to the completion of it. But as the principal parts of the agreement are admitted, as it is acknowledged that the offer to purchase was made by the defendant; that they are in the full possession and enjoyment of the whole property, and have been so for two years past;

*481

*482

*483

*484

*485

as defendant, W. B. Mitchell was in possession of a plantation nearly adjoining the one now in controversy, that he must have known the situation of the land he was about to purchase, with respect to its liability to freshes full as well as the complainant, and therefore had no need of information from him on that subject; as the defendant himself saw and made choice of the negroes he bought—as exorbitancy of price is not made a ground in his answer for refusal to fulfil the agreement, (and if it was the repeated offer of colonel M'Pherson is sufficient proof to the contrary) and above all as the defendants themselves are not disposed to relinquish their bargain, hard as it has been represented to be by their counsel; the court cannot hesitate to decree a specific performance of this agreement.

It is therefore ordered and decreed that the complainant do forthwith make, execute and deliver to the defendant good and sufficient conveyances in trust for the land and negroes agreed by him to be sold as in bill mentioned. That the said defendant do thereupon pay to the said complainant, one fifth part of the purchase money for the said negroes with instalments from the first of April, 1794, to the first of April, 1795—that they do also pay to the complainant one sixth part of the purchase money of the land; that they do likewise pay to complainant interest on the principal sums of such fifth and sixth parts of the purchase money from first of April, 1795; and that it be referred to the master to ascertain the same. It is also ordered and decreed, that the defendants, W. B. Mitchell and J. Mitchell, under the direction of the master, do forthwith give bonds to complainant for the balance of the purchase money payable with interest at such times as they ought respectively to become due, pursuant to their agreement; and that for securing payment of the *said purchase money with interest, they do, in the terms of their said agreement (as sworn to by defendant, W. B. Mitchell in his answer) make and execute, under the direction of the master, good and sufficient mortgages of all the lands and negroes in the said answer particularly mentioned and enumerated; and lastly that the defendant do pay the costs of this suit.

*486

---

1 Desaus. 486

Case CXI.

Present—Chancellor Mathews and Rutledge.

OSBORNE v. BREMAR.

(July, 1796.)

[Specific Performance ⟸99.]

The complainant sold several parcels of land adjoining to each other, at public auction: and the defendant become the purchaser of them, though each tract was put up separately. The complainant delayed several years in executing the conveyances, though importuned by the defendant. Afterwards the defendant discovered that the title of one of the tracts, a principal one, was not in the vendor: and he refused to complete the purchase, alleging that this tract was the principal object of the purchase.—The court decreed that as the tracts were put up to sale separately, and there was no proof of the purchaser's buying chiefly with a view to that particular tract, there was no ground to vacate the contract. Also that the delay in executing the conveyances, should not prevent a specific performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 302; Dec. Dig. ⟸99.]

[Specific Performance ⟸130.]

The court decreed a specific performance, deducting interest on account of the delay of the complainant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 124, 125; Dec. Dig. ⟸130.]

The object of complainant's bill is to compel defendant to complete his contract for several tracts of land which he bought at sheriff's sales in January, 1793. The defendant in his answer admits the purchase, and that he was ready and willing to comply with it for a considerable time, until he discovered that he had been deceived in his purchase. He now refuses to stand to his contract, and insists to be relieved from it altogether, upon the grounds of deception, misrepresentation, and concealment; and because of the laches of the complainant in not making titles for near three years after the sale; although repeatedly applied to for that purpose by the defendant and his friends. He also states in his answer that the principal object which he had in view was the purchase of the tract called True Blue; and being disappointed in getting that tract, he ought not to be compelled to take the others, which he bought only in consequence of his intended purchase of True Blue.

We must take a view of the evidence produced, to see how far the defendant's answer is supported by it. Mr. Baily, the first witness examined, proved that the complainant applied to him in April or May, 1795, to draw the conveyances. He found some difficulty in deducing the title: the deeds were however drawn and delivered to the complainant in June following. The defendant frequently told him he would not accept them.

*487

*Mr. Theus, the treasurer, proved that True Blue had been mortgaged by J. Courturier, jun. to the public in 1786, and the mortgage being forfeited, the land was sold in April, 1792, and bought in for the public, ten months before the sale of it by the sheriff as the estate of J. Courturier, the father of the mortgagee.

Mr. Marshall proved his demanding in the spring of 1795, in defendant's name, conveyances from the complainant, who did not then make them, but assigned no reason for not doing it; that defendant was ready to settle, and the money was in the bank.

Mr. Ravenell proved that the defendant thought he had a good bargain; that he went with defendant to see the land very soon after his purchase, and he was then satisfied with his bargain, although the dwelling-house was out of repair, and there was no fence on the land in the swamp, because it had lately been carried off by a freshet.

It was contended that as the complainant could not make a good title to True Blue; and as that was the principal object of the purchase, defendant therefore should not be obliged to take the other tracts. It must be observed that there is no proof of this; the tracts were sold separately; and it does not seem probable that it was the only inducement, because there were upwards of 200 acres of swamp to the two other tracts alleged to have been purchased on account of True Blue.

From this summary view of the evidence, it is clear there was no deception, misrepresentation, or concealment used by the complainant to induce the defendant to make the purchase. The deception, misrepresentation, or concealment, if any, came from another quarter. And that the circumstance of the house being out of repair; and that the want of fences did not operate on the defendant's mind, to induce him to reject his purchase, is evident from Mr. Ravenell's testimony, who swears that the defendant was satisfied with his bargain, after he had taken a view of the premises; and that he continued to be so, appears from his continually demanding titles per*sonally and by his friends for two years and a half after his purchase. Whatever may have been the objects of the defendant in the purchase, they are matters existing in his own breast; they were never imparted to the complainant, nor made a part of the contract. It is not pretended that any conversation on that subject ever took place between him and the complainant. As to the point of concealment, that has never been proved; nor has it appeared that the circumstance of True Blue's having been mortgaged to the public, and afterwards sold to satisfy the mortgage, was known to the complainant at the time of the sale: on the contrary it has been discovered by defendant himself only within a very few months past. The complainant was certainly guilty of great laches in not making titles at an earlier period; but that is not sufficient reason to induce the court to rescind the contract, because the defendant had it in his power to compel complainant to make titles, by filing a bill in this court for that purpose.

*488

Upon consideration of the whole evidence in this case, the court are of opinion the defendant has not supported the three strong grounds of defence, which he set up, viz. deception, misrepresentation and concealment; either of which might have been sufficient to vacate his contract. It is not pretended that there is any deficiency in the quantity of land, or that the quality is different from that for which it was sold; nor can we presume there will be any difficulty in locating it. With respect to the True Blue tract, the sheriff to be sure cannot make titles for that, from the circumstances before mentioned; but that will be no impediment respecting the other tracts, as they are independent of True Blue, and were sold separately.

It is therefore ordered and decreed, that the complainant do forthwith make, execute, and deliver to the defendant good and sufficient conveyances for the other tracts in bill mentioned; and that the defendant do thereupon pay to the complainant the amount of the principal of the purchase money for the same; and as it is owing to the complainant's own neglect that the contract has not *been before complied with, it is further decreed, that the defendant be released from the payment of interest on said purchase money, until the time of tendering the titles. Lastly that the costs of suit be paid by defendant.

*489

---

1 Desaus. 489

Case CXII.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

TOBIAS BOWLES, and SUSANNAH, His Wife, and Others, v. CHARLES, THOMAS, and GLEN DRAYTON, Executors of John Drayton.

(September, 1796.)

[Interest ⟸17; Wills ⟸734.]

A testator bequeathed the bulk of a large estate to his sons, and made them executors. He also bequeathed a legacy of £3000 sterling to his daughter, to be paid on her day of marriage, or on her attaining 21 years of age. The interest to be paid annually. If she died under age, or without issue, the legacy was given over to the sons. The sons qualified as executors, and possessed themselves of the whole estate. The court had by several orders allowed part of the interest for her maintenance from infancy. She married at 18 years of age; and is not yet of age. She and her husband filed a bill for the legacy. The court decreed that the legacy should be paid: with interest, on the annual arrears of interest.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Black v. Blakely, 2 McCord, Eq. 10; Wright v. Wright, Id. 201; Myers v. Myers, Id., 266, 16 Am. Dec. 648.

For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. § 30; Dec. Dig. ⟸17; Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1853; Dec. Dig. ⟸734.]

[Executors and Administrators ⟸303.]

[Where a large legacy became payable on a contingency, the executors were allowed to pay it by installments.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1229; Dec. Dig. ⟸303.]

The bill stated that John Drayton being seized and possessed of a large real and personal estate, made and executed his last will on the 31st day of May, 1779, in and by which he, amongst other things gave and bequeathed to his daughter, Susannah Drayton, the sum of 3000*l.* sterling money to be paid her by his executors out of his estate, on or at the day of her marriage, or when she should attain the age of twenty-one years, and that the lawful interest of the said sum should be annually paid and applied for her use, behoof, maintenance and education—That shortly after, the said testator died, leaving his said will in full force, and leaving the said legatee alive, then an infant of two years—That Charles, Thomas and Glen Drayton, the sons, executors, and principal devisees and legatees of the testator, proved the will and qualified thereon as executors, and took possession of the estate, to the amount of 100,000*l.* sterling. That on the 10th of March, 1795, the said Susannah Drayton being of the age of eighteen years, intermarried with the complainant, T. Bowles, and a marriage settlement was executed, securing her property to their use, and the use of their issue, if any. That on or about the 20th of March, 1785, the court of chancery, on application made, ordered and decreed that the sum of £60. sterling should be paid out of the interest of the said legacy (to commence from the 22d June, 1779) for the maintenance of the said Susannah, which allowance was in*creased on the —— day of September, 1790, to £150. per annum. That there is due to the complainants the sum of £5687. calculating interest on said legacy according to the usage of the court of chancery. That demands have been frequently made for the payment of said legacy and interest, without success. The bill prays relief.

*490

The defendants admitted all the material facts charged in the bill, but denied that so large a sum as 5687*l.* was due to the complainants on account of the legacy; for they insisted that compound interest was not demandable on principle, or on the usage of the court. They admitted that the complainants had applied for payment of the legacy, and they averred that they had offered in payment, property to a considerable amount at a fair valuation. The defendants pray the court to grant them a reasonable time to raise the portion of the complainant, Susannah, as one of the contingencies on which it was to be raised, to wit, the day of marriage was in itself so uncertain, as to leave the defendants unprepared to meet the demand: and the other contingency, to wit, her attaining 21 years of age has not yet happened: and the defendants said they were induced to hope for this indulgence, as in the event of her dying under age and without issue, the said legacy is, by a limitation in the testator's will, to revert to and be equally divided among the defendants.

There were several questions raised in this case, but the only two fully discussed and decided upon, and material to notice were the two following:

1. Whether the arrears of the interest, on the legacy of 3000*l.* directed by the will of the testator to be paid annually, should be calculated and paid with interest thereon, for the detention of the money.

2. Whether the complainants are entitled to have the legacy raised immediately.

Mr. Lee, Mr. Goodwin, Mr. Ford, and Mr. Desaussure for the complainants, argued that on the former applications to the court for an allowance for the maintenance of Miss Susannah Drayton, the master had reported what was due, as interest on the legacy; and that *wherever the master states an account, interest is allowed by the law and the usage of the court, on the balance stated, at least from that time. See 2 Eq. Cases abr. 529, 530. 14 Vin. 457, 1 P. Wms. 453, 652, 478, 480. 1 Bro. P. C. 202, 566. 2 Powell on Mortg. 227. 2 Fonb. 188, 9, 423. But independent of the master's report, interest ought to be allowed on the arrears of interest due on the legacy. The intention of the testator is explicit, that the interest of the legacy should be paid annually, and applied to the use, behoof, maintenance and support of his daughter Susannah, the legatee. Those are the very words of the will, which cannot be otherwise satisfied. If less than the amount of the annual interest was sufficient to maintain Susannah, then the balance of the annual interest ought to have been placed out to interest or vested beneficially for her use and behoof. The testator must have known that the interest on 3000*l.* sterling must have far exceeded the wants of an infant, and would for many years. He therefore intended an accumulation. The executors were bound to obtain that, and in doing so, run no risk, on taking proper securities. But if they were apprehensive of any risk, they should have applied to the court for instructions and authority, at the time when the application was made to the court for an annual allowance out of the interest for the support of Miss Susannah Drayton. That allowance was always considerably below the amount of the annual interest of the legacy, expressly directed to be paid annually. And they were bound by the will to put such balance out to accumulate for the advantage of the legatee. If the executors have not done so, they are bound themselves to make it good to the legatee. But this case is much stronger than the common case of executors without any property in the estate: for here the executors are the devisees and legatees of the great bulk of a very large estate, out of which this very moderate legacy is carved for the benefit of their sister. If they have not raised and put out the interest for the benefit of their sister, they have had personally the benefit of it, and are more strongly bound to make it good to her. The court in allowing £60. per *annum at first, and afterwards £150. per annum out of the interest on the legacy of £3000. well knew that there would be a balance of interest due annually on the legacy. And it must have perceived by the will of the testator, that the whole of the interest was to be paid annually, or improved for the use of the legatee. By leaving the balance of the interest in the hands of the executors, who were also the devisees and legatees of the great bulk of the estate; (to whom it was a convenience) the court must have considered them liable to pay interest on it, else it was giving a great advantage to the executors and owners of the estate, to the prejudice of the minor, which cannot be decorously attributed to the court; especially when it is recollected that it is the peculiar province of this court to protect and guard the interest of minors. The court therefore when it ordered no more than a part of the annual interest on the legacy to be raised and applied to the support of Miss Susannah Drayton, must have relied upon the executors pursuing the will of the testator, and putting the balance of such annual interest to the use of the legatee, by obtaining or by allowing interest upon it, if they retained it in their own hands. If this expectation of the court has not been attended to, the court will feel itself bound to compel the executors to perform the will and do justice, by paying interest themselves on the arrears. Even in cases not so strong as this the court has made executors pay interest, for money retained in their hands without absolute necessity. See 6 Bro. P. C. 319, 3 Bro. C. C. 73, 433, 107. 1 Bro. C. C. 359, 430. 2 Fonb. 184 to 188, 376,7. 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 238, 287. 2 Bro. 430. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 740. 1 P. Wms. 783. 2 P. Wms. 21, 252. 3 P. Wms. 126. See 1 Vern. 251. 2 Vesey sen. 170. Talbot 2. Indeed compound interest is allowed in many cases where it is reasonable, without coming under any particular head or class of cases. See 1 Bro. C. C. 440,3. and the circumstances of this case make it most reasonable, to be allowed. The testator having directed the interest to be paid annually, though the payment of the principal is postponed to a distant and even an uncertain period and event, this may be properly considered an *annuity; and an annuity bears interest. See 1 Salk. 156. 1 P. Wms. 542. 3 Atk. 579. 1 Brown's P. C. 202, 556, 1 Ves. 428,9. It is also an established equity that indulgence entitles the party at whose expense it is given, to remuneration. 2 Pow. on Mort. 220. Now the permitting the executors to retain the money in their own hands, was a great indulgence. Money was then scarce and difficult to be raised; and even now at the end of seventeen years, they ask in their answer, for time to raise the money. The complainant's counsel contended that the troubles and calamities of the war, ought not to bar the claim of interest; as was insisted by the defendant's counsel. There is no such general rule of equity. On the contrary this court had in many cases allowed interest during the war, on legacies; and made executors accountable for crops, where no accounts were rendered, by charging them £10. per annum, for the working slaves. See Mayrant's case v. executors of Nelson, and other cases. Under very extraordinary circumstances of national calamity, extending to all, by which estates are made wholly unproductive, the court of equity may possibly be induced to qualify or restrict the payment of interest; but such circumstances should be proved to have existed, and to have produced that effect. No proof had been given in the cause, to shew that the great estate in the executors and devisees hands had been made wholly unproductive by the war, or in what degree: and the court would not presume it, to the prejudice of a minor daughter and legatee. The complainant's counsel contended that they are entitled to have the money raised immediately. They grounded this on the very words of the will. That directs that the legacy of 3000*l.* sterling, should be paid to his daughter Susannah, by his executors, on the day of her marriage, or when she should arrive at the age of twenty-one years. The testator had a right to prescribe the time, and he has done so. His daughter is married, and is entitled to payment of her legacy, according to the will. It was objected that the executors ought not to be bound to raise the legacy until the daughter attained twenty-one years of age; because in the event of her *dying under age, and without issue, there is a limitation over of the legacy to others: or that at any rate a reasonable time ought to be allowed to raise so large a sum of money. To this the counsel for complainants replied that the testator knew very well that he had made a limitation over of the legacy, in case his daughter should die under age, and without issue: nevertheless he chose to direct the payment to her on her marriage, which has taken place; and his will is the law on this point. See 1 Wilson 140. Besides there are cases which shew that such a legacy is sufficiently vested, notwithstanding such subsequent limitation. See 1 Vern. 462. 2 P. Wms. 612. 2 Vesey sen. 263. 1 Bro. C. C. 105, 300. 2 Bro. C. C. 3. With respect to the demand for time to raise the legacy, there is no just ground for it: the executors knew that they were to pay the legacy when the daughter married, or attained twenty-one years of age. She was married on the 10th March, 1795; and it was the duty of the executors to have prepared to pay the legacy, in sterling money, as the testator directed; instead of which the executors have offered to pay in unproductive property at a valuation. For the time when portions are to be raised, see 2 P. Wms. 612. 2 Vesey, sen. 263. 2 Bro. C. C. 3. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 638. 1 Bro. C. C. 103.

*491

*492

*493

*494

On the part of the defendant, it was contended by Mr. T. Parker, and Mr. E. Rutledge, that the claim of compound interest was not supported by the decided cases. None of them went so far as this demand, which went on (according to the calculation filed with the bill) adding the annual interest to the principal and forming a new principal every year, bearing interest, and thus forming a most enormous accumulation. That interest is a matter of discretion with the court; and it has been refused in times of public calamity. See 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 611. 1 Bro. P. C. 526. That the testator had carved out large portions for his two daughters, £3000. apiece, amounting to £6000. and the debts were £6000. That during and for some years after the war the estate though large could not meet its exigencies, and raise the annuity, or amount of annual interest on the legacies; therefore compound *interest ought not to be allowed. That the executors had offered to deposit bonds with Mrs. Drayton, the mother of the legatees to pay for those legacies, but she refused; and indeed the court refused to allow it, and obliged the defendants to keep the legacies in their own hands. All the cases for the allowance of compound interest go upon the executors occasioning improper delays. But here they were willing to pay in bonds. The executors could not invest the legacy. There were no banks, no public funds at that time. Besides the cases in which compound interest has been allowed are where maintenance was given as the means of subsistence to the children. But in the case under consideration, enough was paid out of the interest to maintain the legatee. The circumstances of the estate would not permit more to be raised for a long time. Again, to whom was the money to be paid? Not surely to the minor legatees. Money could not have been put out to interest, and the interest regularly obtained, so as to be put out again annually, and thus produce a compound interest. If compound interest is allowed, it must be on the ground that the executors have not done their duty, according to the will. Yet it is not proved that they could have done better. As to the other point, the raising the legacy immediately, the counsel contended that would be improper; because Mrs. Bowles, the legatee, will not be of age till December, 1797; and if she dies before that period without issue, there is a limitation over in the will, which will carry the legacy to the defendants themselves. They ought not therefore to be obliged to raise so large a sum, at a great sacrifice, when ultimately it may not be payable to the complainants. Again the time of marriage was uncertain. The executors therefore could not be expected to be prepared to pay the legacy so immediately after the happening of an uncertain event. A reasonable time ought therefore to be allowed the executors to raise the money.

*495

Chancellor RUTLEDGE afterwards delivered the following decree of the court:

*496

*There are two questions in this case—

1st. Whether interest is to be allowed on the arrears of interest, due on a legacy, bequeathed by a father to his daughter.

2d. Whether the portion, bequeathed to the daughter should be now raised.

The cases in the books say that this point rests in the discretion of the court, where such interest is not expressly given. It depends therefore on circumstances whether the court will allow it. The case of Mayrant and Davis was cited to shew that the court would not allow more than simple interest. But in that case the expenses of the legatees were nearly equal to the interest of the legacy, and therefore there was no fund to accumulate. There are many cases in the books which shew the allowance of interest on the arrears of annuity, particularly when given to a wife or child. And this case has been assimilated to an annuity, because the interest of the portion is expressly directed by the will of the father, to be annually paid and applied to the maintenance, education, use and behoof of his daughter. It was plainly the father's intention that the whole interest should be applied to the use and benefit of the daughter; but as she was very young it was not possible she could expend so much. What was to become of the residue? Surely not to lie in executor's hands. But it was asked to whom was it to be paid, as the infants could not receive it and give discharges? The answer is that if the executors had the money, and had applied to this court, they would have been directed what to do and how to invest the balance. But it was at their own request the court suffered it to remain in their own hands, and did not order the interest to be raised annually, and the surplus vested for the benefit of the minor: it was an indulgence granted to the executors because the estate was much in debt. The executors therefore, who are also legatees, come with an ill grace, under these circumstances, and on the above pretence, to refuse the allowance of interest, on the arrears of the annual interest arising on the legacy or por*tion; especially as they have held and enjoyed the estate of the testator. Interest must be allowed.

*497

Decree. The master to make a statement of the account, allowing interest on the yearly balance of interest, deducting the years of the war, and until 1785, before which no interest on arrears, was legally demanded.

On the second point, the court does not see the smallest reason for not raising the portion itself. Seventeen years have elapsed since the testator's death, and not a penny is raised. Defendants have had great indulgence. The suggestion of the doubt whether complainant would ever be entitled to receive her legacy, is not of sufficient weight to induce the court to delay the payment. One of the events, that of marriage has occurred upwards of two years. It is time the portion was raised. But as the sum is considerable, the court will direct that it shall be raised by instalments.

Decreed that defendants pay to complainants on the 1st day of March next, one half of the principal and interest, bequeathed to his wife, by her father, which the master shall report to be now due, with interest thereon: and the remaining moiety shall be paid on the 1st of March, 1798, with interest. Costs to be paid out of the estate of the testator.

---

1 Desaus. 497

Case CXIII.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

JACOB DEVEAUX and Wife, ELIZABETH, v. BARNWELL, Executor of John Barnwell.

(July, 1796.)

[Powers ⊂⊃41; Wills ⊂⊃551, 781.]

A testator bequeathed to his wife the enjoyment of his estate, with power to dispose thereof by deed or will; and that what she left undisposed of, at her death, should be sold, and the money divided among all his children. Two of the daughters died in the testator's life time, leaving children. The widow of testator made a gift of part of the estate to one of the daughters (who is the complainant) for life, with remainder to her children. She died, leaving the rest of the estate undisposed of. The complainant claimed a share of the undisposed property, as well as what they received by gift. It was decreed that she was not entitled to both; but must make her election. The children of the two daughters who died in their father's lifetime, were let in to shares of the undisposed estate.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Addison v. Addison, 9 Rich. Eq. 67.

For other cases, see Powers, Cent. Dig. § 156; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃41; Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1187, 2016; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃551, 781.]

Chancellor MATTHEWS delivered the decree of the court:

The question in this case arises on the will of J. Barnwell. The words necessary to be adverted to are, "Whatever my wife shall leave when she dies, not willed sold or given, and delivered before good witnesses, whether house, lots, horses, stock, plate, furniture, &c. I order to be sold and the money divided amongst all my *children." It seems that Mrs. Barnwell, the wife of the testator, did make a disposition of part of the estate, by deed to Mrs. E. C. Deveaux (one of the testator's children) and her children. It is contended by the complainants, that they are entitled to take what was so given by the mother, and also to an equal share with the rest of the children, of the estate left by the testator to his wife, and not disposed of by her. The first question then is whether the complainants are entitled to take both what is given to Mrs. Deveaux under the instrument of her mother, and an equal share with the other children under the will of her father. It appears that it was the intention of the testator to divide that part of his estate, which his wife might not dispose of, equally among all his children; but it does not appear that he intended to give any child a double portion, which would be the effect of this claim. It appears that the provision made by the mother for Mrs. E. Deveaux and her children, out of the testator's estate, was made from providential motives, to secure to them, what E. Deveaux would be entitled to at her death, on account of the embarrassed state of Mr. Deveaux the husband. But it is contended for the complainant, that the provision made for Mrs. Deveaux by her mother, ought not to be considered as a satisfaction of what she claims under her father's will; because what is given her is only for life, with remainder to her children; and being a less estate ought not be deemed in satisfaction. This is extraordinary. Old Mr. Barnwell gave an absolute estate to his wife, with power to dispose of the same, as she pleased, even to the exclusion of complainant; and what she did not dispose of, was to go equally among the children. Mrs. Deveaux cannot therefore claim under both the deed of the mother, and the will of the father. She may take her choice; but to take both would be highly unwarrantable. The second question under this will arises thus: two of the testator's children died after the making his will, and in his life time; both of them leaving children. Old Mrs. Barnwell, (wife of testator) made no disposition as to them. The question then is, can these grandchildren come in under the will *of the grandfather, for their parent's share of the estate so undisposed of by the grandmother? (See the words of the will above.) The rule, that the intention of the testator, if not inconsistent with some rules of law must prevail is not to be rigidly adhered to in all cases: formerly words of survivorship were construed into joint tenancy. In the case of Elliott and al. v. the Executors of B. Smith, determined in our own courts, the words of survivorship were as strong as could be. The words were, "but in case any of my children should die before the time appointed for the payment of their portions, then the share of such child or children, so dying, shall be equally divided, among my surviving children." It was decided that the limitation over was not confined to the surviving children at the time of the contingency, but at the death of testator; and that such children as survived him, and the representatives of the deceased, were equally entitled on the contingency happening. In the case of Drayton v. Drayton, the court went further: the limitation over was on the death of John to his surviving brothers. W. H. one of the brothers did survive the testator, but died before John; yet his representatives were let in to a distributive share of the estate of John; so that the survivorship was confined to the mere survivorship of the testator. In the case of Sealy v. Executors of Ball, [1 Desaus. 137,] it was decided that as no time was appointed by the will for the legacy vesting, that marriage was a proper period for securing what might otherwise be considered as a joint tenancy. Thus where the intention of the testator is to make an equal distribution of his estate among his children, and where such intention is founded in reason and justice, and not contrary to some rule of law or the principles of equity, courts of equity will carry them into effect. In the case before the court, the intent is manifestly to divide the estate not disposed of by the wife, among all the testator's children. At the time of making his will all of them were alive; but two of them died before the testator, leaving issue. The testator never republished his will (though he lived some time after) nor made a new one. It is a strong presumption that he meant that his grand*children should stand in the place of their parents. To exclude them would be to defeat his expressed intent to provide equally for his children. And though a will is not consummate till the death of the testator, it is in many respects inchoate from the execution. This construction may not quadrate with strict rules; yet it is not repugnant to any rule, and it is well warranted. Suppose a testator should leave by his will all his estate, to be equally divided among his children, and one of them dies a few days before him, leaving a large family, depending on the bounty of the grandfather, and he dies without altering his will; ought the grandchildren to be left destitute, and the large estate to go wholly from them; perhaps to one child of testator, and he without a family? In such a case, the court would be disposed to say with lord chancellor Macclesfield, "if there is no precedent it is time to make one."

*498

*499

*500

It is decreed, that complainants have their option, to take under the will of the father, or under the deed of the mother; and that the children of the two daughters, who died in the testator's life time, take their parents shares respectively, of the estate left by the grandfather, and that the costs be paid out of the estate.

Mr. Pringle for complainant; Mr. Desaussure and Mr. Ford for defendant.

---

1 Desaus. 500

Case CXIV.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

JAMES STUART, Devisee and Legatee of Dr. James Carson, v. WM. CARSON, Executor of James Carson.

HARTLY and Wife, Legatee of Dr. James Carson, v. WM. CARSON and JAMES STUART, Executors of Dr. James Carson.

(September, 1796.)

[Wills ⇐S32.]

Specific legacies to a step-son are exempted from contributing to the payment of debts of the testator; more especially as the legacies were given in lieu of other claims, which he had on the testator.

[Ed. Note. For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 2139 2155; Dec. Dig. ⇐S32.]

[Wills ⇐S09.]

Legacies to a wife, partly specific and partly general, are exempt from contributing to the payment of debts; because given in lieu of dower, and accepted in lieu of some other claims on the testator's estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 2105; Dec. Dig. ⇐S09.]

[Wills ⇐S36.]

The debts are to be paid out of the residuary personal estate. If that is insufficient, then the debts to be paid out of the real estate devised to the testator's daughter, and on her death, under age and without issue, to the testator's brother.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hull v. Hull, 3 Rich. Eq. 92.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 2151; Dec. Dig. ⇐S36.]

[Executors and Administrators ⇐274.]

[In marshaling assets for the payment of debts, the distinction between real and personal property is still recognized.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1061–1073; Dec. Dig. ⇐274.]

[Executors and Administrators ⇐291.]

[An executor, in possession of the personal estate of the testator, has possession of a legacy given by the will, sufficient to vest such legacy, without a formal act for that purpose.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1153; Dec. Dig. ⇐291.]

[Executors and Administrators ⇐272.]

[Cited in Dunlap v. Dunlap, 4 Desaus. 325, to the point that the act of 1791 does not place real and personal property on the same level.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1052–1057, 1059, 1065, 1068; Dec. Dig. ⇐272.]

The bills in these cases were filed to obtain settlements and accounts of the estate of the late Dr. James Carson, who has devised and bequeathed considerable legacies to the complainants. As the bill filed by James Stuart *brought out the whole case, it is unnecessary to give a full statement of both cases.

*501

The bill filed by James Stuart charged, that complainant's mother was possessed of considerable estates, and intermarried with Dr. James Carson, who thereby acquired the property which she possessed. That during the coverture he acquired in her right considerable property under the will of her deceased brother, Lewis Reeves. No part was ever settled on her. That Dr. Carson being possessed of a large estate, real and personal, made his will on the 22d of August, 1777, which is set forth in the bill. That the executrix and executors thereof qualified in the following order: William Ladson on the 3d October, 1777, Ann Carson (complainant's mother) 11th September, 1778, William Carson, the defendant on the 9th August, 1780, under the board of police, and complainant on the 1st day of March, 1783. That during the war the complainant (then of tender years) is not informed of the particulars of William Ladson and Ann Carson's administration; but believes they did little more than keep the estate together as well as they could, except selling the lands on Lady's Island called St. Quintin's which was sold by William Ladson, and a considerable part of the purchase money paid in depreciated currency. Complainant charges, that some part of the purchase money came to the hands of the defendant. That during the joint lives of Mr. Ladson and Mrs. Carson, he chiefly acted—after his death she acted solely till her death, being about nine months. That upon, or soon after the surrender of Charleston to the British, William Carson took into possession all the real and personal estate, and during the British usurpation (between two and three years) continued to hold, manage and dispose thereof—sold most of the personal estate, consisting of furniture and plate, both in Charleston and on John's Island. That he also made and sold considerable crops and proceeds of the estate, of all which he has not rendered proper accounts. That he sold the household furniture, although one half thereof was specifically bequeathed to Ann Carson, on whose personal estate de*fendant took out letters of administration; and he ought to have sold the same (one half) as her property; but he acted irregularly, making no discrimination between the estates. That he never made or returned any inventory or appraisement of either estate, by reason whereof complainant is necessarily in the dark, as well as to the particulars of Mr. Ladson and Mrs. Carson's administration, and of that of the defendant under the board of police, as of the particulars, value and amount of the estate, and the sales thereof. That though complainant's said mother was entitled to one third of the negroes, to be elected by her out of the house negroes, she made no such election, owing to the troubles of the times; and no division was made. And complainant contends that the right still remains in her representatives unimpaired. That she died on the 18th May, 1780, leaving her son, the complainant, and her daughter, Eliza Gibbs Carson, her legal representatives, who were entitled to divide Mrs. Carson's interest between them. That about the time of the evacuation of Charleston, the defendant went to England, and took Miss Carson, then very young, along with him; and returned to his state, with Miss Carson in the year 1790; and she died in the month of July, 1794, under age, intestate and unmarried. By reason whereof and under the act of the legislature of 19th February, 1791, the complainant is entitled to the whole property of his said half sister, and to the whole property of Mrs. Carson his mother. That in consequence also of the death of Miss Carson, "unmarried and before arriving to the age of 21 years," the limitation over of the personal estate bequeathed to her by her father the testator, has taken effect, whereby one third of the residue of the personal estate was to go to Mrs. "Ann Carson, her executors, administrators and assigns forever"—and complainant submits that he is entitled to the same. By these various means complainant, as he contends and submits, is entitled to one third of the negroes of the estate, with the right of choosing from amongst the house servants, together with the rents and profits, from the year 1780. Also to one half of the furniture, plate, and kitchen fur*niture, with interest on the sales thereof. And lastly, one third of the residuary estate bequeathed to Miss Carson, with the rents and profits from the time of her death. Of all which complainant hath given notice to defendant, and requested a discovery and account of the estate, and a settlement, as well of that of Dr. Carson as of Mrs. Carson—And that he will discover all papers, documents and vouchers of each estate, which came to his hands after the death of Mr. Ladson and Mrs. Carson, and disclose the particulars of their administration; and that he would co-operate with complainant in hastening the affairs of the estate to a final close—All which he refuses, and will not agree to have a division made.

*502

*503

The bill prays that defendant may come to a full account, discovery and settlement of both estates. That complainant may have delivered over to him whatever he is entitled to in his own right, in that of his mother, and in that of his sister, Miss Carson. That the funds which the testator intended for the payment of his debts may be ascertained, and applied thereto. That defendant may be restrained in the mean time from selling the estate.† That complainant may have such further and other relief as the court shall judge proper and equitable.

†An injunction was accordingly granted.

To this bill the defendant, William Carson put in the following answer:

The answer of William Carson, one of the executors of Doctor James Carson, (deceased, defendant to the bill of complaint of Doctor James Stuart) stated, that the defendant denied that the testator, Dr. James Carson obtained a considerable property by his intermarriage with the complainant's mother, Mrs. Stuart:—But admits, that on the death of her brother, Lewis Reeves, he acquired some beneficiary interest by his will in favor of his sister. Defendant admits that his brother, the testator was possessed of a considerable real and personal estate, and made such last will and testament, as is set forth in the complainant's bill, whereby he gave to the complainant a far more considerable estate than that *which he acquired by the will of Mr. Reeves, in favor of Mrs. Carson. Defendant admits that he left this state, on political considerations, soon after the death of his brother, the testator, without having intermeddled with the estate, and leaving the whole in the possession of the executrix and the executor, Mr. William Ladson, recommending to them not to sell the plantation on Lady's Island for less than 3000*l.* sterling, having himself offered to give that sum for it. That the defendant returned to this state in the year 1780; and that Mr. Ladson was then dead; and Mrs. Carson, the executrix soon after died; and Dr. James Stuart was then under age. That under these circumstances, defendant qualified on the will of his brother, Dr. James Carson, before the officer appointed by the existing powers, to grant probates, whereby he was enabled to protect the property of the estate; and he considered the oath as obligatory as if taken under the best authority. That to the best of his recollection defendant administered on Mrs. Carson's estate (the widow of Dr. James Carson) and took possession of some paper money, furniture and plate—sold the same to the best advantage, and credited the estate therewith in his accounts. But he denies that he possessed himself of all the papers of Mrs. Carson; but avers that some of the titles of the lands, and he belives most of her valuable papers were carried off on her death, and are now, to the best of defendant's belief in complainant's possession. Defendant admits that till the close of the year 1782, he managed the estate of the testator, of which he kept as accurate an account as the nature and circumstances of the times could admit. That of those transactions and all others respecting his brother's estate, subsequent thereto, (down to the month of last) he has rendered an account to the ordinary, and filed a copy with his answer to a bill already filed against him, in this court, to which he prays leave to refer the court: and prays leave to postpone the exhibiting his subsequent accounts until he can properly arrange them and submit them to the ordinary; after which they may be made part of his answer. That defendant about the year 1782, transmitted to complainant an account of *all his transactions respecting the estate, from the death of Mrs. Carson, to the close of the said year. And also from time to time whilst in Europe, this defendant transmitted to complainant the accounts of monies expended on the education of defendant's niece, and of monies received from the estate of the testator, as remittances. Defendant admits that his niece departed this life at the time mentioned in the bill, under age, and unmarried. That complainant is her brother of the half-blood, and would be entitled to a share of the residue of the personal estate, if such estate be more than sufficient to pay the debts due therefrom, which this defendant does not believe to be the case. That with regard to the various claims of the complainant, defendant submits them to the decision of the court, confident that it will protect him in his rights. Defendant refers to exhibit A. for an account of the negroes, and other personal estate in his possession, belonging to the estate. Defendant begs leave to require on his part, that complainant, while he seeks a discovery of accounts from the defendant, will himself render an account of all his own transactions, and of those of his agents during the time that he managed the estate, and also an account of all his mother's transactions as far as the same ever came to his knowledge. That he will moreover produce all the titles and papers in his possession and control, belonging to said estate. And that he will set forth the profits which were made by the negroes bequeathed to him by the testator on the event of his arriving at the age of twenty-one; and which this defendant has been informed and believes were separated and worked apart as distinct property for considerable time previous to his coming of age. And defendant prays to be dismissed.

*504

*505

The provisions and dispositions of Dr. James Carson's will were as follows: He directed all his debts to be paid as soon as might be, after his decease. For which purpose he directed the plantation on St. Quintin's to be sold; and if it proved insufficient then the remainder of his debts to be paid out of the rest of his estate, not specifically devised. The testator bequeathed to his wife,

*506

Ann *Carson, his carriage and horses, one half of all his furniture, plate, &c. one third of all his negroes, with a right of electing some of them from among his house servants. Also the use of his town house, and of his plantation during widowhood, in lieu of dower. He directed his stepson, James Stuart to be educated at his expense until he attained twenty-one years of age. Then he devises to him the plantation on Lady's Island, Cain Island, and Farrington's Neck; and he bequeathed to him thirty enumerated negroes, with cattle, sheep, &c. &c. Then followed a clause making void all the above devises to his wife and James Stuart, in case they should set up any claim upon the estate in right of his grandmother or uncle; or for dower or jointure; and in that case orders their portions to sink into the residuum of the estate. All the rest and residue of his estate, the testator devised and bequeathed to his daughter, Eliza Gibbes Carson, at twenty-one years of age, or on her day of marriage, which should first happen. But if she died before, he devised all his lands not before specifically bequeathed to his brother, William Carson, and the residue of his personal estate to be divided into three equal parts; one third of which he bequeathed to his brother, William Carson; another third to his wife, Mrs. Ann Carson; and the remaining third (in moieties) to William Ladson and Thomas Ladson. St. Quintin's was sold, but proved to be insufficient to pay the debts. Miss Eliza Gibbes Carson, having died under age, and unmarried, the limitations over took effect.

Doctor James Stuart claimed under the will as follows: The lands devised to him by the will; the negroes bequeathed specifically to him; the third part of the testator's negro slaves bequeathed to Dr. Stuart's mother, Mrs. Carson; with the rents, issues and profits, since her death in the year 1780. Also one half of the furniture and plate, with interest from the time when these were sold. And finally, in right of his half sister, Miss Carson, (under the devise over to his mother) one third of the residue of the personal estate, with rents and profits from the death of Miss

*507

Carson. Dr. Stuart contends that *none of these several interests are liable to be affected by the debts of the testator; but that some other portion of the estate should be applied to that purpose.

Mr. William Carson contended that he had a right to have his lands protected by the personal estate against the payment of debts.

The complainant, James Hartly, who had married the only daughter of Thomas Ladson, (one of the contingent legatees) claimed the legacy to which his wife's father was entitled under the will.

The principal question in this case being out of what fund the debts were to be paid, it was contended by Mr. Ford, Mr. Desaussure and general Pinckney, for the complainant, Dr. Stuart, that the lands and negroes devised and bequeathed to Dr. Stuart, were not bound to contribute to the payment of debts, until all other funds had failed; because they were specific devises; and specific devises are not liable by law to contribute; and because the testator expressly designated St. Quintin's plantation as the first fund to pay debts; and on failure of that (as had happened) then the rest of his estate not specifically devised. Thus the rule of law, and the testator's intention unite to exempt the property given to Dr. Stuart. It was also contended that the property bequeathed to Mrs. Carson, the widow was not bound to contribute to the payment of debts, because part of it was specific, to wit, the carriage, horses, furniture, plate, &c. and because it was given her in lieu of dower which assimilated it to Mrs. Loocock's case, lately decided by this court; and placed her on the footing of a purchaser. But her case, as well as Dr. Stuart's, was stronger, on this ground; for they had claims on Mr. Carson, the testator's estate, derived from Mr. Lewis Reeves, the brother of Mrs. Carson, which the testator refers to in his will, and requires to be given up, to entitle them to take under his will. This they have done, and therefore stand emphatically on the footing of purchasers. And this is the stronger with regard to the legacy of negroes bequeathed to Dr. Stuart; the greater part of whom were negroes which had been bequeathed to him by his uncle, Mr. *Reeves, which came into the hands of Dr. Carson, on his marrying Dr. Stuart's mother, and were retained till his death. The debts then remaining unpaid after the sale of St. Quintin's, must be paid out of the residuary estate. That was devised and bequeathed to Miss Carson, and upon the event of her death under age and unmarried, the real estate was devised to the defendant, William Carson; and the personal estate to be divided into three equal parts; one third to William Carson, one third to Mrs. Carson, to which Dr. Stuart is entitled, and the remaining third to Mr. William Ladson and Mr. Thomas Ladson. With respect to the third of the personal estate bequeathed to Mrs. Carson, in the event of the death of the testator's daughter, that ought not to be made to contribute to the payment of the debts; because all that was given to her by the will directly, or by way of remainder, was in bar of dower, and as a substitute for her claims on her brother's estate, she having survived her husband. That the debts therefore ought to be paid out of the real and personal estate devised and bequeathed to Mr. William Carson, and to the two Ladsons, who were volunteers, unless the court should be of opinion that the testator meant that the land devised to William Carson should bear the whole debts, as he expressly directs the residue of his debts should be paid out of the estate not specifically devised. That these words, estate and devise, are technical words which apply to land. And that at all events the land so devised was bound to bear its proportion of the debts, together with W. Carson's third of the personal estate, and the third bequeathed to the Ladsons; for that seems to have been the intention of the testator, whose bequests in favor of some of the legatees might and would probably be defeated, unless the land was made to bear its proportion of the debts. And that the court would have less difficulty in giving this construction, since the act abolishing the rights of primogeniture had placed lands on the same footing with personal estate. That the old doctrine in favor of heirs could not now be supported: and if it could Mr. William Carson was a mere devisee, and could claim only in that *character; for he was only half brother of Dr. William Carson, and could not be his heir at law. The cases cited for the complainant were from 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 370, 555, (in a note) 556. 1 Atk. 416. 2 Fonbl. 374. 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 298. 2 Vern. 688. 1 P. Wms. 127. 2 Vesey 415, 420. Ambler, 244. 2 Comyns, 208. 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 197. 3 Atk. 525. 2 Atk. 624. 1 P. Wms. 403. 2 P. Wms. 336. 2 Vern. 718. Ambler, 581. Talbot's cases, 202, and Loocock's case decided in this court.

*508

*509

Mr. Lee and Mr. Pringle contended for the complainant, Hartley, that the defendant, William Carson being only half brother of Dr. James Carson, was not the hæres natus; nor was he hæres factus under the will; for the devise is not of a particular tract of land but of his lands generally. The act of George II. passed in 1732 made lands liable for payment of debts in this country. And the statute of Wm. III. against fraudulent devises made lands liable to specialty debts, the heir being thereby expressly bound. The testator manifestly intended to benefit his wife and the other legatees under the contingent bequests, as well as his half brother. And where there appears an intention to exonerate the personal estate, or put it on an equal footing with the real, the land must be liable. The cases cited were from 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 497, 493. 2 P. Wms. 664, 233. 1 P. Wms. 730. 2 Atk. 624. 2 Vern. 477. Talbot, 53. 3 P. Wms. 326.

Mr. Frederick Rutledge and Mr. E. Rutledge for the defendant, William Carson, contended that the personal estate was the proper fund for the payment of debts, unless the real estate is expressly charged therewith, or words are used in the will strongly implying such intent. And the statute of George II. makes lands liable only on the failure of personal estate. And that Miss Carson was entitled to have her maintenance out of that part of the estate given to her mother, one half of which came to her on the death of her mother. The cases cited were 2 P. Wms. 366. 1 P. Wms. 264. 2 Vesey, 313. 1 Wilson, 82, 1 Brown's Par. Cases, 132, 1 Bro. C. C. 454.

*510

*Chancellor MATHEWS delivered the decree of the court:

These cases having been heard together must be decreed accordingly.

There are three points for the consideration of the court.

1st. Whether the legacy to Dr. Stuart is liable for the payment of any part of the debts of the testator?

2d. Whether the legacy to Mrs. Carson, the wife is in like manner liable?

3d. Whether the residuary estate, both real and personal, given in the first instance to Eliza G. Carson, is equally liable for the payment of such debts as the fund appointed for that purpose was incompetent to discharge? Or whether the personal estate alone is first liable?

It having been conceded by the defendant's counsel on his behalf, that the legacy to Dr. Stuart could not be charged, it is unnecessary for us to comment on the first point.

As to the second point, we cannot hesitate a moment on the propriety of placing this part of the case on the same footing as that of Mrs. Loocock, in the case of Loocock and Clarkson. Indeed the case before us has a preferable claim to a similar decision; as this legacy is all that is given to the wife, out of a large estate; whereas in the case of Mrs. Loocock, there were several other parts of her husband's estates given to her by his will, either absolutely or for life, independent of the annuity. And further, in the present case, the legacy to the wife is not only in lieu and satisfaction of dower, but of any "claim by virtue of any deed, or by any other way or means whatever." It is unnecessary for us to dilate on this point, as we gave our reasons so fully in the case of Loocock and Clarkson, and so recently as the last term. It is sufficient at present to say that the legacy to Mrs. Carson being in the nature of a fair purchase, cannot be charged with the payment of any part of the debts of the testator. There are however two other questions which arise out of this point, viz. whether on the death of Mrs. Carson intestate, her legacy, never having been reduced into possession, did not then become liable for its propor*tion of the debts: or, if not liable, whether the share of E. G. Carson, the daughter of the testator, being an unincumbered part of the estate which came to her, ought not first to be applied towards her maintenance and education? As to the legacy of Mrs. Carson never having been reduced into possession, we cannot admit this to have been the fact; because her being an executrix and residing on the plantation where the negroes were, and as the law authorises an executor to take his own legacy, without the formality of a delivery, as in the case of a legatee only, we must consider this as such an actual possession as would vest the legacy in her, and consequently would descend to her representatives, who were her two children, Dr. Stuart and E. G. Carson: and on the death of the latter intestate, vested wholly in Dr. Stuart, her surviving brother of the half blood. And as to the share of E. G. Carson being applied towards her maintenance and education during her life, we can by no means think this either a legal or a reasonable demand; because such never could have been the intention of the testator, as he left her a very large portion of his estate, the income of which we might fairly presume was more than adequate to those purposes. As the testator then never contemplated this contingency as a possible fund, out of which his daughter was to receive any part of her support, and as that part of her father's estate, (except what is given to her uncle) will in consequence of her death go to strangers to her blood; we think it but reasonable that this inconsiderable part of the estate which she had the power of disposing of, ought to go to the person nearest in blood to her; and to whom in all probability she would have given it had she made a will; that is, to her brother, Dr. James Stuart. We think therefore it ought not to be charged with the incumbrances which have been contended for.

*511

As to the third point, a doctrine altogether novel, has been attempted to be maintained at the bar. Having taken a view of the consequences which resulted from the feudal tenures in England, the counsel have analogically reasoned, that the abolition of the rights of primogeniture *in this country ought to induce this court to direct its decisions on the same principles which governed the courts in their decisions in that country under similar circumstances. We cannot think the comparison a well founded one, as there is not that striking analogy which can render it so. For although the courts in that country had in a great degree got rid of the feudal tenures, yet there still remained considerable barriers to protect real estate against the claims of creditors; and it was only in cases where the occupant of the real estate had by deed expressly bound the heir, that the creditor could have any lien on the land; and not even then in many instances, as the personal estate was commonly made the fund for payment of debts, in exoneration of the real estate, although bound by the act of the occupant. Courts of equity first broke through this barrier for the relief of creditors by marshalling assets, thereby subjecting the real estate to the payment of simple contract debts, when the heir had the benefit of the personal estate for the payment of the bond debts. The English courts have also since the above period examined with a strict eye the wills of persons; and in every case where they could lay hold of such words as could be construed into a strong presumption of the testator's intention to charge his real estate with payment of debts or legacies, they have carried such intention into effect in all cases where creditors were concerned, who are always favored by a court of equity. In cases where real estates have been expressly charged, they have been made to contribute as a matter of course. Thus it appears to have been a struggle between the courts and the heir at law in that country; the one to bring the real estate within the reach of creditors, and the other to cover it against their claims. The rule there respecting the marshalling of assets has also been made the practice in this country; but with regard to every other matter in the payment of debts, the laws of this state have so expressly charged the real estate with the payment of every species of debt, that the courts of justice have never been driven to the necessity of exercising their ingenuity to find out words in a will which they *might construe into a charge on the real estate for payment of debts. As to the act of this state abolishing the rights of primogeniture, that merely relates to cases of intestacy; and consequently has left the laws for the administration of the assets of estates just where they were. It would therefore be too bold an undertaking for this court to level the laws and practice of this country, that have heretofore obtained in the mode of payment of debts, to what might be conceived to be the principle of that law; namely, to place real and personal estates precisely on the same level in all cases. We do not conceive this to have been the spirit of that law. To be sure in cases where the law is silent, or doubtful, we must be governed by principle; but we are not reduced to this dilemma in the case before us; because although the law on which we are now commenting is silent as to this matter, yet there were and still are existing laws to direct us in our decisions. From the view we have thus taken of the circumstances which have followed from the riddance in a great measure of feudal tenures in England which bound their real estates, and of the laws and practice of this country, we think there is very little if any analogy between them. We shall now return to the will by which our decisions must be governed. The clause directing the payment of the debts of the testator is in these words: "I direct my executrix and executors to sell my tract of land on Lady's Island, containing 1500 acres, known by the name of St. Quintins, for the payment of my just debts and funeral expenses; but should the said tract of land prove insufficient for the purpose of paying them, the remainder of my debts to be paid out of the rest of my estate not specially devised hereafter." It has been contended by the counsel on the part of the defendant, that this is such a charge on the testator's whole estate, real as well as personal, as ought to make them equally liable for payment of such debts, as the fund appropriated for that purpose was inadequate to satisfy. There are many instances in which persons in making their wills, do not come up fully to the objects they have in view, which renders the interference of this *court necessary to supply those defects. This appears to us to be one of those cases; for by charging his estate generally with payment of his debts, the testator has caused such a clashing in the interests of the legatees of his will, as has rendered it necessary for them to call on this court to say out of what part of his estate his debts are to be paid. This we think will be made sufficiently clear by comparing the last mentioned clause of the will with the clauses which dispose of his estate, real and personal, in the event of the death of his daughter before her arrival at either of the periods limited for her taking the estate intended for her. The material words in the first clause are, "the remainder of my debts to be paid out of my estate not specifically devised hereafter." The words of the clause which are afterwards made use of in the disposition of the real estate are "I give, devise and bequeath all my real estate not before specifically devised, to my brother, William Carson, his heirs and assigns for ever." It appears then to have been the testator's intention to charge that part of his estate with payment of his debts, which was not afterwards specifically devised; the after devise of all his real estate to his brother, William Carson, is such a specific devise as must exempt it from such a charge; consequently the residue of testator's debts, must be paid out of such part of his estate, as is not specifically devised. But as the whole of his real estate is specifically devised, the debts must be paid out of such of the personal estate as remains, after assignment of the legacies to Dr. Stuart in his own right and in right of his mother and sister; but if such remainder should prove insufficient for the purpose, then the balance must be paid out of the specific devise of the real estate to William Carson.

*512

*513

*514

It is therefore decreed that the legacy to Dr. Stuart be forthwith delivered to him. That commissioners be appointed to divide the negroes of the testator's estate into three equal parts; and that one of those shares be assigned to Dr. Stuart, in right of his mother, and another in right of his sister. That he be allowed at the rate of 10*l.* per annum for every working hand which he became *entitled to in right of his mother, and the like sum for those he inherited in right of his sister, unto the time of their delivery to him. That he be allowed the amount of the one half of the sales of the plate and the furniture, and the full amount of the sales of the carriages and horses, with interest from the time of the sale until paid. As to the residue of the personal estate which the several claimants might be entitled to after payment of the debts, we will reserve our opinion, until the debts are satisfied, as it has been represented that the whole of this part of the personal estate will be inadequate to that purpose. And as all the parties are actors in these suits, that each do pay his own costs.

*515

---

1 Desaus. 515

Case CXV.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

MARY EVANS, GEORGE EVANS, and Others, Children and Legatees of George Evans, Deceased, v. the Executors of GEORGE EVANS, Deceased.

(September, 1796.)

[Powers ⟸20.]

Ex'ors selling estate without necessity, and without authority, and even against the implied intent of the testator, are so far responsible, that they shall be accountable for any bad debts, arising from the sales.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Johnson's Adm'rs v. Johnson's Ex'rs, 2 Hill, Eq. 293, 29 Am. Dec. 72.

For other cases, see Powers, Cent. Dig. § 62; Dec. Dig. ⟸20.]

[Executors and Administrators ⟸265.]

An executor having money of the estate in his hands, and being also a bond creditor of the estate, was bound to apply the money at the time to the extinguishment of the bond debts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1012; Dec. Dig. ⟸265.]

The complainants filed a bill against the executors of their father's estate, for an account and settlement of the same; and for the recovery of their legacies under his will. Their bill charged, that their father being seized and possessed of a considerable real and personal estate, made his last will and testament, in and by which he devised and bequeathed certain specific legacies to the complainants; and then directed certain parts of his real and personal estate to be sold for the good of the estate, (meaning doubtless for the payment of his debts.) And he concluded by bequeathing the remainder of his estate, (consisting chiefly of his furniture, and about eighty negro slaves) to the complainants, to be equally divided among them: and directed that the sons should receive their legacies at twenty-one years of age, and the daughters at the same age, or on the day of marriage. The testator died on the 17th November, 1778, leaving his said will in full force. Three of the executors, Richard

*516

*Walter, Benjamin Waring, and Thomas Waring, proved the will and qualified thereon. The fourth, John Glaze did not qualify.

The bill charged, that within a few months after the testator's death, to wit, in January and February, 1779, the executors sold the whole personal estate of the testator (except the property specifically bequeathed) including his negro slaves, without any necessity to do so on account of debts, with the amount of which they must have been unacquainted, contrary to the manifest intention of the testator: without having returned an inventory and appraisement of the estate; and without any decree of this court to authorize the sale. That there were only two of the children of age at the time of the sale, one of whom was not consulted; and the other was induced, by great persuasion of the executors, to consent thereto; but upon condition that the debts of the estate should be immediately paid; which has not been done fully to this day. That the executors having made these unnecessary and illegal sales in depreciated money, neglected to take security in many instances from the purchasers, whereby several debts are lost; and also omitted to pay many debts due by the testator; though to pay the debts, was the pretext for the sale; and though by such sales they were put in possession of funds much greater than enough to have paid the debts; part of which they loaned out to insolvent persons without security, and part they placed in the state treasury; and they have kept the residue in their own hands unaccounted for. That some of the debts which might and ought to have been paid off during the war, from these funds, have been paid since the war, in specie, to the great loss of the estate. That Richard Walter, one of the qualified executors, had two bond debts due him by the testator; and funds of the estate came into his hands much more than sufficient to pay them off, but he has never credited them on the bonds: and since his death his executors have brought suit against the estate and obtained judgment thereon, without having rendered any satisfactory account of the funds which came into his hands. That none of the executors have rendered satis*factory accounts, but they are confused, inexplicable and unjust.

*517

The complainants charge, that no necessity existed for the sale of the estate bequeathed to complainants, because the property directed to be sold, and one crop were sufficient, or nearly so, to have paid the debts of the estate. The complainants submit that the executors had no right to speculate on the property of the legatees, and to convert one species of property into another, without the authority of this court: and that no more of the personal property bequeathed, should have been sold, than was necessary to pay the debts. That though there is no express prohibition of sales in the testator's will, it is strongly implied; for he directs certain specified parts of his estate to be sold; and he directs part of his stock of horses and cattle to be kept for the use of his plantation; and he directed a division of the property to be made among his children. All this shews plainly his intention that the slaves should not be sold.

Complainants insist, that as the executors ought to have paid off debts with the monies received from the sales, and in many cases did not do so, but kept the paper money in their hands, or applied it to their own use, they are not at liberty to claim any benefit from its perishing by depreciation in their hands. The bill prays relief.

The answer of Benjamin and Thomas Waring, two of the qualified executors, admits that George Evans made his last will and testament as stated, and died leaving the same in full force; and that he left the property stated. That they qualified on the will, and made the sale of the estate as alleged by complainants. And that though no express power to sell is given by the will, the defendants were justified in selling, under the circumstances of the estate and of the country; and they acted on the advice of legal counsel. That the estate was considerably indebted, which the executors well knew, though they did not know the precise amount, or the particulars. The defendants sold without the authority of the court of chancery; but in those times of trouble, the court seldom *met, and did very little business. Defendants believe there was an inventory and appraisement; and cannot account for its being mislaid. The defendants insist that the complainant, George Evans, who was of age, approved and consented to the sale, unqualifiedly; and Mary Evans, who was also of age, did not oppose it. That the reasons which induced the executors to sell were the largeness of the debts, and the want of good lands to plant; the testator having devised his good lands exclusively to his eldest son; and his other lands being poor, worn out, and incapable of producing crops; and were situated twenty-four miles from a navigable river, on the Four-hole creek. The defendants deny that any losses were sustained by the executors not taking security from the purchasers of the negroes. The defendants aver that they paid off all the debts of the estate which came to their knowledge, except those to their co-executor, Mr. Walter; and he having received monies of the estate, they supposed he had applied the same to the payment of that debt: and defendants placed 9000*l.* currency in the treasury, and loaned part of the balance to Mr. Morton Waring, who is perfectly solvent. That one of the executors sold his own estate at that time for the current money; which is evidence that he thought it better to sell than to keep property in such times. Defendants are ready to account and settle with complainants as to the affairs of the estate; and file their account with their answer.

*518

The executors of Mr. Walter, executor of George Evans, admit the principal facts, as to the will and death of Mr. George Evans. They believe that he meddled very little with the affairs, and received but a small part of the funds of the estate. That he did receive some money, and his executors are ready to account for the same. They admit that he held bonds of the testator, and that since the peace judgment has been obtained thereon.

The cause came to a hearing, and Mr. Edward Perry proved, that the land of the testator at the Four-holes, was capable of producing rice, indigo and corn. That the distance of transportation was of no great importance. *That he was security for Mr. George Evans, and applied to one of the executors to pay the debt, which was not done; and he has been since sued for the debt.

*519

Mr. Parker, Mr. Holmes and Mr. Pringle for the complainants contended that the sale of the negro slaves by the executors, was contrary to the intention of the testator, and was not warranted by law. And that having made sale of the estate, they are liable for the debts. That two executors joining in a receipt, they are each liable for payment as to creditors. Formerly they were not so liable as to legatees; but only the executors who actually received the money: but by the later decisions, this distinction is done away. That the sale was not only without authority, but unnecessary and improvident. The extent of the debts was not fully known. And the sales of the property directed to be sold by the testator were equal, or nearly so, to the payment of the debts: and actually exceeded the amount of the debts paid by the executors. As the executors sold under the pretence of paying debts, why were they not paid? Instead of doing so they loaned money to others, and put money in the treasury, which has been depreciated. As they did not pay the debts when they could, they are each liable for the amount. See 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 456, 742. 1 Bro. C. C. 114. 3 Atk. 584.

Mr. Ward, Mr. E. Rutledge and General Pinckney for the defendants, argued, that executors had the power of selling personal estates, at their discretion; and no blame is imputable to them for doing so. That in this case there really existed a necessity to sell; for the sale of the articles directed by the will to be sold, did not amount to a sum sufficient to pay the debts. The depreciation of the paper money is not attributable to the executors. Congress as late as Sept. 1779, promised to redeem the paper money at its nominal value. If it had done so, there would not have been any difficulty; for the money placed in the treasury would have been good money, and would have obviated all difficulties. To apply rigid rules to the conduct of executors, under such difficult circumstances as the times produced, would be unjust: and would *be to make them responsible for events beyond their knowledge or control. They will account for what they received, on account of the estate, at its intrinsic value, as established by the laws fixing the depreciation.

*520

The court took time to deliberate, and afterwards Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court:

There is not the smallest reason to charge the defendants with any fraud or unfair conduct in this business. From a review of their accounts it is obvious that if the stock, &c. had not been sold, it would have been absolutely necessary to have disposed of a great number of the negroes, for it is evident the debts could never have been discharged with the annual income of the estate: especially as there were a number of children to be maintained and educated out of it. The stock, &c. being sold, and debts to a large amount paid off, a sale therefore of the negroes became less necessary; and the executors could not on any principle whatever be justified in making it in the extensive manner they did, because they were not only not authorised by their testator, but it was expressly against his direction. As they were all consenting and joined in the sale, they must all be responsible for the debts; but not one for the separate act of the other. Consequently if any bad debts have been made, they must be all answerable for the loss. The case of Smith and Bonsall v. executor of G. Smith, [1 Desaus. 304,] determined in this court, is directly in point; for the executor in that case disposed of the estate expressly against his testator's directions, and when there was not an absolute necessity for doing it; and the court held him responsible for any bad debts. As it appears from the accounts of the executor, Walter, that he had a large sum of money belonging to the estate in his hands, and the estate was indebted to him on several bonds, that money must be applied to the extinguishment of those bonds, the balance being depreciated, and applied towards payment of one of the other bonds. We have no doubt the defendants thought they were doing right, especially as it is said they acted by the advice of counsel; but they set out on a mistaken principle by supposing the estate inadequate to the payment *of its debts. This court however always discountenances the acts of executors, which are done directly contrary to the directions of their testator. It must be referred back to the master, to ascertain what was the net amount of the sales; what debts have been paid; and whether any, and to what amount are still unsatisfied; what funds of the estate remain in the executors' hands; and the amount of the bad debts, if there are any.

*521

1 Desaus. 521

Case CXVI.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

WILLIAM PERRONNEAU v. the Executors of HENRY PERRONNEAU, Deceased.

(September, 1796.)

[Wills ⊂⊃728.]

Devise of the whole estate to executors, to collect the funds and remit the whole to executors residing in England to be invested there; and to pay £300. per annum to the testator's wife for life. Legacies of £5000. to relations in England. After the death of the wife, the whole estate to testator's nephew W. P. if he survives testator's wife. If not, then to his children: If he leaves no children, then to his brothers and sisters. The estate is very large. W. P. has several children, and is in very narrow circumstances. Though the bequest is not vested in W. P. the court, under the circumstances decreed that a maintenance should be allowed to his family out of the estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1766; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃728.]

[Trusts ⊂⊃217.]

The court also decreed that upon great change of circumstances, no more of the estate should be remitted to England than sufficient to pay the annuity and the legacies there.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 304; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃217.]

The bill states that Henry Perronneau, formerly of Charleston, being seized and possessed of a considerable estate, real and personal, in Carolina and England, and having no issue, did on the 9th day of July, 1786, make his will, which is set forth at length in the bill; by which after all his debts and funeral expenses were paid, he devised his estate as follows:—He gave to his wife Ann, all his household furniture, &c. plate, books, beds, bed and table linen, &c. He also gave her an annuity of 300*l.* during her natural life, and charged his whole estate with the payment of it, in lieu of dower. He also directed all his Carolina debts to be collected by his executors there, and remitted to his executors in England to be invested in government securities. He gave to his brother-in-law, Dr. Alexander Garden, £2,500. to be paid on the death of his wife; but if he should die first, then the said legacy to go to his nephew Alexander Garden, his niece Juliett, and his niece Harriott Benson, to be equally divided. He gave to Robert Cooper £2,500. to be paid on the death of his wife; but if R. C. should die before his wife, then he gives the legacy to Cooper's children: If there should be default of child, then he gives it to Ann and Eliza Cooper. He gave to his servant John Champneys £300. to be paid on the death of his wife. He also gives him his wearing ap*parel. He gives to each of his executors 100*l.* Then follows this clause—"All the rest and residue of my worldly estate, whatsoever and wheresoever I do hereby give, devise and bequeath unto my nephew William Perronneau, son of my brother Arthur Perronneau, deceased, immediately after the death of my said wife; but in case of his death before her, then on such event or contingency, I do hereby give devise, and bequeath the same and every part thereof to the child or children of my said nephew William Perronneau, lawfully to be begotten, as shall be living at the time of his death, to be equally divided between them as tenants in common—if more than one, as soon as possible after the decease of my wife: and in case my said nephew shall happen to depart this life without leaving any children or child lawfully begotten living at the time of his death, then and on such event or contingency, I do hereby give, devise, and bequeath the said surplus and residue of my said worldly estate after the death of my said wife unto the other children of my said deceased brother Arthur Perronneau, as tenants in common of like equality of estate; but if there shall be no children or child of my said brother living at the time of the death of my said wife, then and on such event and contingency, I do hereby give, devise and bequeath the same and every part thereof unto such of their children lawfully begotten as may be living at the death of my said wife, to be equally divided between them as tenants in common, if more than one." Lastly, he appointed Dr. Alexander Garden, Robert Cooper, Robert W. Powell, and John Hopton, of Westminster; John Savage, of Brompton; Benjamin Savage, of London; Rawlins Lowndes, Isaac Motte, and Edward Penman, of South-Carolina, executors of his said will.—That the testator died on the ——— day of November, 1786, leaving the will of force, and without issue. That Messrs. Lowndes, Motte, and Penman, proved the will, and qualified as executors, and took possession of the Carolina estate—That the estate was very large; being much more than adequate to raising and securing the annuity to the widow—That the testator at the time of making his will *was under strong impressions of the instability of the American governments, and the insecurity of property from the then unfortunate and unsettled state of public affairs—it was the reason of his directing the funds of his estate to be remitted to England. Complainant is well assured that his uncle was actuated by the strongest desire to secure the legacies to the objects of his bounty, and particularly complainant who was the favored object. But complainant submits that great changes have taken place in public affairs since his death; since which the present government hath been erected, and has happily secured peace abroad and security at home; while wars and revolutions new in their principles and boundless in their extent, disturb the nations of Europe, and threaten the funds of Great-Britain: that it would therefore be more likely to effect the chief views of testator, if after remitting as much as would secure the annuity, the residue were retained in this country, and placed out under the directions of this court for the benefit of complainant and his family, who are chiefly interested, and are anxious it should remain in this country under the jurisdiction of the court. That at the time testator died, complainant was a youth, and lived at no expense to himself in the household of his mother; but since, hath intermarried and become burthened with a numerous family, which hath become exceedingly distressed in consequence of the failure of some of those resources of his mother upon which he had in a great measure depended, whilst the large residuary estate of the testator is locked up from him. The executors not deeming themselves at liberty to extend any relief to complainant, either by the payment of interest, annuity, maintenance or in any other way without the sanction of court. Whereas complainant humbly submits he is entitled to demand the interest on the residuary estate, as well as to have the amount of the same secured to him, after securing the said pecuniary legacies and the annuity prior to the same being transported into a foreign country beyond the reach and jurisdiction of the court. That complainant hath applied to the executors of said estate to have the residuary estate *and the interest thereon secured to him in manner aforesaid, after securing the legacies and annuity aforesaid; but the said executors have hitherto refused him his reasonable request; alleging that complainant is not entitled to any maintenance out of the said estate; nor to have the same secured or retained in this country. The bill therefore prays a discovery and statement of the estate, of the monies remitted to England, of the debts due, and that after remitting to England so much as will pay the widow's annuity, and secure the legatees residing there, that complainant may receive the residue of the interest in whole or in part, and that the residuary estate may be secured for the benefit of complainant and his children, by placing the same at interest in this country, and within the jurisdiction of this court, or otherwise, as this court may direct; and that the remittance of the estate into a foreign country may be suspended: and that the complainant may have such further relief as the nature of the case may require.

*522

*523

*524

The answer of the defendants admits all the facts alleged in the bill; but submits that the legacy to Mr. W. Perronneau not being vested, he is not entitled to any allowance for maintenance out of the estate; and submits that point to the court. Also, that the testator having directed the debts due to him to be collected and remitted to England, the executors are bound to obey his will; and that the court has no power to control the performance of his will.

The brother and two of the sisters of Mr. William Perronneau, to whom the estate was devised and bequeathed over on the event of his dying before Mrs. Ann. Perronneau, the wife of the testator, and without issue, delivered a written declaration that they had no objection to his success in the application to the court for relief in the case stated by his bill; and they also stated that they knew that to be the wish of their sister Mrs. Wm. Hayne, and her husband, who were absent, and did not sign the declaration. At the hearing of the cause, Mr. Ford and Mr. Desaussure, argued for the complainant. They stated that there were two objects in the bill:

*525

*1st. To obtain an allowance out of the interest of the estate, by way of maintenance for an infant family, entitled to a large estate hereafter, but in danger of suffering at present.

2d. To obtain the detention of the estate in this country within the jurisdiction of the court, for the benefit of the persons chiefly interested in it; or if it must be remitted according to the directions of the will, to require security from the executors abroad, to whose care the estate is to be committed.

The application is opposed on the grounds, that the legacy to Mr. Perronneau is not vested, but devised over to his children, on his dying before the testator's wife; and to his brothers and sisters, if he died without leaving children. Also, that a father is not entitled to maintenance for his children out of their fortunes; and that the will of the testator directing the estate to be remitted to England, must be obeyed; and the executors are not bound to give security.

It was contended for the complainant that the sole object of the testator, in postponing the legatees to his wife's death, was to keep his estate together, to secure his wife her annuity at all events; and not to make a distinction between a vested and contingent legacy. But she can be made safe without such a hardship on the complainant, his nephew, and the favorite object of his bounty, next to his wife. And the court will be anxious under such circumstances to give relief. 1 Wilson. 140. 4 Burr. 2246, 3 Bro. C. C. 404. 1 Bro. P. C. 288. 3 Bro. P. C. 337. Wherever the court can find a slender twig to take hold of, they will do so to give relief in such hard cases. Few of the decided cases form exact precedents. Lord Chancellor Hardwicke said, that when and to whom interest was to be allowed, depended so much on particular circumstances; on the relation of parties; on the penning of wills; that hardly one case could be cited that would be a precedent for another, and the court has found means to escape from the operation of harsh and strict cases on small circumstances. 1 P. Wms. 783. 2 P. Wms. 21, 2.

*526

*2 Vern. 152. 2 Bro. C. C. 75. 1 Bro. C. C. 119, 298. 3 Bro. C. C. 471, 90. 3 Bro. P. C. 337.

In many cases it has been decided that the devise over does not make any objection to such a claim as the present. 2 P. Wms. 21, 2, 419, 504. 1 Bro. C. C. 82, 104.

In general, where the court refuses to give aid, it is where the contest is between the immediate legatee and remainder men. But here the application is by the first legatee, for maintenance for his children, who are the first in remainder; and the remoter remainder men consent to the measure. The complainant has no estate of his own, out of which he can maintain and educate his children. He depends on his mother, and her means have been greatly impaired by fire, by insolvency of debtors and other circumstances. No injury can result to others from granting the application—not to the widow because the court can and will order remittances sufficient to raise her annuity of £300 per annum during her life—not to the pecuniary legatees in England, because after remitting enough to secure them, there remains a very large estate, out of which the application of the complainant may be granted; and indeed there are funds enough of the estate already in England to secure them.

The case in 2 Atkins, 41, was of the administrator of the party applying for intermediate interest after the death had happened, and the limitation over, vested. So in 3 Atk. 508, and in 1 Atk. 505. The court looks at the spirit and equity of the cases and doctrines; not the letter of them. In Loocock and Clarkson, the court protected the annuity of the widow against specific devisees and legatees, though no case had ever gone so far before. The distinction between a legacy at 21, or payable at 21, on which many of the cases have been founded, has been questioned by eminent judges. Lord Chancellor King said, the distinction does not deserve to be countenanced, 2 P. Wms. 612: and Lord Keeper Wright said it was a distinction without a difference. 2 Vern. 417, 424. There are two strong cases in favor of the complainant. In the case of Claxton v. Claxton, 2 Vern. 152, the court suffered the devisee to perform the condition, even out of the property de*vised, before the estate in contingent remainders, was to vest. In 2 P. Wms. it was declared by the master of the rolls to have been the practice to allow maintenance even in the case of legacies that were not vested.

*527

Another objection has been made, to wit, that the court does not usually allow a father to have maintenance for his children, out of an estate devised to them aliunde; yet this depends upon the ability of the parent to maintain them.

In Hughs v. Hughs, 1 Bro. C. C. 387, the Lord Chancellor ordered maintenance on the ground of the inability of the parent; though he thought the fund was intended to accumulate.

See too 3 Bro. C. C. 416, 4 Bro. C. C. 223. Maintenance is so much regarded, that the principal is sometimes allowed to be broken in upon. 1 Vernon, 255. 2 P. Wms. 22.

We come now to the consideration of the second great point made in the case.

It is contended for the complainant that the estate should be detained in the hands of the executors in this country; or that the executors resident in England, who require the money to be remitted to them, should give security for the repayment of it to the legatee here on the death of the widow of the testator.

It is true that the will of the testator directs that his whole estate should be converted into money, and remitted to his executors in England, to be invested in government stock, for the benefit of his legatees.

Now it is manifest that this regulation was founded on peculiar circumstances. The testator was a man of sense and probity, but he had adhered to the cause of the mother country, in the struggle which terminated in the independence of the colonies. He was obliged to leave his country, and he was amerced for his political error.—This soured his mind—the distresses brought upon this country by the war; the total want of a national government; the derangement of the finances of the state governments; the interference between debtor and creditor, by state laws, and the consequent breach of contracts, *and depreciation of property, all tended to induce a belief in many, and an apprehension in all, that the new republics were about to become scenes of discord and anarchy. In the minds of those who had been hostile to the revolution, this belief was deeply fixed.

*528

In this frame of mind, the testator sat down to draw his will in the year 1786; and it is not to be wondered that he was desirous to withdraw all his property from a country devoted to ruin in his estimation; not only for the benefit of his wife and his English legatees, but his favorite nephew and residuary legatee, though he resided in this country. The testator died soon after without one circumstance in the political situation of this country being altered. It is now ten years since his death. The United States have formed a strong national government; public and private credit are re-established; internal tranquillity is firmly settled, and peace is maintained with all the belligerents during the arduous struggle which is desolating and exhausting the European nations. England has taken an active part in this wide spreading war: and she has incurred a vast debt in addition to her former burthens; and the revolutionary fervor has spread among her people, and threatens internal convulsions. Under these circumstances, so totally different from those which existed at the time that the testator made his will, there can be little doubt that the testator, if living, would have altered his will; and would have directed that at least so much of his estate should have been left in this country as was intended for the legatees residing here: and what he would probably have done, it seems reasonable for the court to do. It is not asking the court to vary the rights of a single party. It is merely to make such a variation in the arrangement of the funds as will be most beneficial and secure for those interested: which the court is in the habit of doing, even to the sale of real estates, where it is beneficial to the devisees and legatees.

There is already considerable property in England.—Let so much be remitted in addition as will secure the annuity to the widow; and as will pay the legacies to Dr. Garden and Mr. Cooper, who reside in England.

*529

amount*ing to £5,000. The remainder of the estate, which is very large, is bequeathed to the complainant, and on his death to his children; they are natives, and permanent residents in this country. There is no good reason for obliging them to seek their legacies hereafter in a foreign country, where they are strangers, and might have great difficulties, and be put to great expense in the recovery of their rights, if the executors in England should resist their claims, or even put them to the proof of them. And it should be remembered that interest is two per cent. higher in this country than in England. But if the court should feel itself so bound by the positive direction of the will, as to be obliged to permit the removal of the funds of the estate out of this country into a foreign country, it would be quite reasonable to direct that before the removal took place, the executors residing abroad, who insist on the exact fulfilment of the will, and require the remittances to be made to them, should be directed to give security for the repayment of the money to the legatees in this country, on the event happening, which shall entitle them to it. There are many cases in which the court requires security of executors, even without absolute proof of waste or insolvency. See 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 552. 7. 3 P. Wms. 300. 1 Vesey, 282. Ambl. 273, 2 Atk. 58. 1 Bro. C. C. 181, 2. 3 Bro. C. C. 45, 337. Now the removal of the fund out of the jurisdiction of the court, which may be of the greatest prejudice and delay to the complainant, when all the causes which induced the testator to make such an arrangement are totally changed, is surely a reasonable ground to require security.

Mr. T. Lowndes and Mr. Rutledge for the defendants stated, that the executors of the testator Mr. Henry Perronneau, residing in this country, were very sensible of the hard situation in which the complainant was placed, and were willing to do every thing favorable to him which was in their power, or which the court should feel itself at liberty to authorize. But it was their duty to bring to the view of the court the legal grounds of objection to the complainant's application; especially as the executor in England had been consulted, *and had positively required that the application should be resisted, and the estate remitted to them in England, according to the will of the testator. It is admitted that the interest and income of the estate greatly exceed the annuity of £300 bequeathed to Mrs. Perronneau. This surplus income must accumulate for the benefit of the residuary legatee in remainder, unless the court should feel itself free to allow some portion of it to the complainant. This is not a vested legacy—the rule is that where the time is annexed to the legacy itself, and not to the payment of it, it is not a vested but a contingent legacy. The devise over to Mr. Perronneau's children, on the event of his dying before the widow of the testator, prevents the legacy vesting in him, and the devise over to his brothers and sisters, in the event of his dying before the widow, and without leaving any children, prevents the legacy vesting in them. It is a contingent legacy. See 3 Bacon, 478, 486, on vested and contingent legacies. It must be a vested legacy, or the devise over must take effect.—2 Atk. 41. See 3 Atk. 114. 1 Vesey. 111. Where a real estate is devised over, on a contingency, the intermediate rents and profits go to the heir at law. And where there is a bequest of the residue of personal estate, on a contingency, the interest accumulates till the event happens, and the estate becomes vested for the benefit of the ultimate legatee who happens to take. 1 Atk. 505. 2 Atk. 41. 3 Atk. 58. Atk. 473. Green v. Elkins. 1 Vesey, 490. 2 Vesey, 521. The cases cited by the complainant's counsel, are cases of vested legacies. But even if it had been vested, the court will not allow maintenance, unless where the legacy is the gift of the parent. For if the parent be living, it is his duty to maintain his child, and to allow any legacy derived aliunde to accumulate for the benefit of the child. On the other point, for retaining the funds of the estate in this country, the defendant's counsel said, that the defendants residing here were willing to acquiesce in any decree of the court on the subject; but the executors abroad opposed it, and they were bound to state to the court, that the will of the testator gave express directions to remit his whole estate to En*gland, and vest it there.

*530

*531

That whatever were the inducements to the testator's making such a provision, when his principal legatee, the residuary legatee of a large estate resided here, his will should be obeyed. It was conceded indeed that the circumstances of a country might be so altered as to induce the court to restrict the transmission of funds to it in such a case as this. Such as a desperate civil war, or a foreign war, during which the enemy mastered the country. But there must be extreme circumstances to justify a departure from the will of the testator. Who can say that the change of circumstances, justly described by the complainant's counsel, would have induced a change in the testator's mind, attached as he was to Great Britain, and doubtful as he was of any good issues from American Independence? Great Britain was engaged in foreign war, and has greatly increased her national debt; but she pays her interest regularly, and raises new loans at her pleasure; and many politicians have already been deceived in predicting the downfall of her financial system, from the accumulation of her debts. This hardly made out a case for the interference of the court. It was not an extreme one.

The court took time to deliberate, and afterwards delivered the following decree:

There are two points in this cause.

First. Whether the legacy to the complainant is a vested legacy, or a mere contingent interest, subject to be defeated on failure of the condition annexed to it.

Second. Whether this court ought to exercise those extraordinary powers with which it is vested to overrule the dispositions made by testator in his will.

As to the first point, we cannot consider the legacy to the complainant as a vested legacy, consistently with those established and strict rules, which are laid down in the books; for there is not annexed to it either certainty as to the time of payment, or the person to take. The time of payment is not till the death of testator's wife, which is uncertain; and then it is on condition that the complainant survives her; if not, it goes over to his children; and if he leaves no child, then to his brothers *and sisters; but if they should all die before the testator's wife, then to their children. As this therefore is not a vested legacy, in which case the complainant would be entitled to the interest arising thereon, we must consider the case on its own intrinsic merits; and notwithstanding this objection, determine whether we can, without a violation of the essence and true principles on which those rules are founded, extend some relief to the distressed objects now before us, praying for the interposition of this court, for that purpose. It is notorious, that courts of equity have of late very much relaxed their rigid rules of construction, and have conformed their decisions more to the circumstances of the cases immediately before them, than to former precedents, where they have been considered as partaking more of the strict rules of common law, than the more liberal rules of the court of equity. The following observation by one of the most enlightened judges that ever sat on the chancery bench, we think a striking and just one, namely, "in cases of this kind," he says, "how far a legatee who is not entitled to the payment of his legacy immediately, shall have interest in the mean time, depends upon particular circumstances. Some upon relationship, some upon the necessities of legatees, and most of them upon the particular penning of wills; and there is hardly one case which can be cited, that is a precedent for another." With respect however to the case before us, we are not without a precedent to direct our judgment; for the case of Woodberry v. the executors of Collins, is as nearly assimilated to the present, as two cases can be. The words of Collin's will are, "I give to my granddaughter, Mary Woodberry the following negroes, namely, Big Jack and 1000*l.* which money to be made by my said negroes before they shall be divided; but should my said granddaughter Mary Woodberry, depart this life before she arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and shall have no issue, then in that case my will is, that aforesaid negroes Big Jack, &c. and the 1000*l.* should be divided between the following persons, Dr. M'Grejor and others." According to strict rules this is no vested legacy; for she *can only be entitled to it under the condition annexed to it, namely, her attaining twenty-one years of age; on failure of which, it is limited over to others. It is not a gift by a parent who is bound to maintain his child, and out of whose legacy this court would allow interest, if not so directed by the parent. But by the same rules it is considered as a gift by a stranger. Yet the court on a representation, that the father of the infant was incapable of giving her either maintenance or education, made a reasonable allowance out of the legacy for those purposes. What is the case before us? The complainant or his children, will at a future day, be entitled to a considerable estate; but until that day arrives, they must remain in such a state of penury as to want almost all the necessaries of life, and consequently every means of education; unless this court can extend to them some present means for those purposes out of this large estate in expectancy. And why should not this reasonable application be complied with? Because, it is said, this is not a vested legacy, and therefore the interest must be made an accumulatory fund, until the period arrives when the legatee would be entitled to the legacy. We think ourselves warranted on every principle of sound justice, and of precedents, to extend such relief as the nature of the case will bear us out in administering. It will here be proper to state this part of the case more at large than we have as yet done. The testator, Henry Perronneau gives to his wife an annuity of £300 to other persons legacies to the amount of £6200 payable on the death of his wife; the rest of his estate he gives, devises and bequeaths to the complainant if he survives the testator's wife; if not, to his children. The estate is represented to be nearly £20,000 in value. It will require £7500 to be placed in the funds directed by testator, to raise the annuity of £300. The balance will probably produce an interest of £600 or £700 per annum. If then an allowance is made for the relief of the complainant's family, out of this latter fund, where is the possible injury which can arise to any one? We can see none. The widow of the testator can receive none; the other legatees can receive *none; their legacies being pecuniary must be paid with the last farthing of the estate: the residuary legatees can take nothing until the pecuniary legatees are satisfied. As to the possibility that the present complainant may die before he comes into possession of the estate, and therefore what may now be allowed may ultimately prejudice his children, can by no means be a sound objection; for his application is not on his own account, but principally for the support of those very children, who might possibly be entitled to this estate. Can this work an injury to them? Every rational mind must contemplate it in the reverse. But should they come here at a future day and say so, they would come with so ill a grace, as never would entitle them to be countenanced by this court. Besides the relief to be given can and will be so modelled by this court, that it shall appear that they were the peculiar objects contemplated by us, at the moment of granting that aid, which is prayed for their particular benefit.

*532

*533

*534

As to the second point, whether this court will restrain the executor in this country from doing that which by the will of the testator he is directed to do? A great variety of precedents will warrant us in doing so. The first and most striking one is that of Baker v. the executors of B. Elliot. In that case, although the will of B. Elliot expressly mentions that no part of his lands should be sold, yet it being represented by his executors that the estate was so much in debt as to exhaust the whole income in payment of interest alone, that the personal estate was first liable for payment of his debts, particularly the negroes, and without them the lands would become unproductive and a burthen. That in such event the minor, his only child would be deprived of the means of support or education; that if on the contrary this court would authorise a sale of a part of the lands, reserving so much thereof as would be sufficient to work the negroes, the minor would have a competent support therefrom, which would be evidently for his advantage. The court directed a sale of the lands on these grounds: That could the testator have foreseen the very material alterations the circumstances of this country had under*gone, since the making of his will (it having been made in 1778) and since his death, he never would have inserted such prohibitions in his will. That it was not only for the advantage of the minor that this court should interfere, but to save his estate from ruin. We did therefore interfere and directed a sale of so much of the lands as was sufficient to pay the debts and legacies, in lieu of the negroes, which would otherwise have been sold. Since that decision this court have made several others of a similar nature. If then in these cases we have restricted the dispositions of testators, where such restrictions have tended to the benefit of those who were intended to have been benefited by the testator himself, but who would instead of being benefited, be materially injured by a rigid adherence to the disposal made by the testator; surely then this is a case which calls on us, in as peremptory terms for our interference, as any which has yet come before us. We have nothing to do with what were the testator's political principles; we are to consider him like any other man setting down to perform what is always supposed to be one of the last acts of his life; in taking a minute view of the situation of his affairs, and of those who are the objects of his affection and bounty, he disposes of his estate in such manner, as in his best judgment will be most beneficial for those who are at a future day to enjoy it; but if before that day arrives, the circumstances of that country where he had directed his property to be fixed, had undergone so material an alteration, as to render it at least hazardous to fulfil such his directions; and which it was impossible for him to have foreseen, is there not the highest degree of probability that had he been now alive, he would have altered that disposition, and sought for some more certain fund to place his money in? We must conclude that he, as every other prudent man, would have done so. Ought we not then to do that, which it is morally certain the testator himself, under these circumstances would have done? We certainly ought; and the court is well warranted in this decision, because a material benefit will be thereby rendered to one party, and no possible injury done to the *other. Who and where are the persons that are to take the residuary estate after the death of testator's widow, and payment of the pecuniary legacies? They are complainant or his children; natives and citizens of this state, who reside and will most probably end their days here. The defendant and the greatest part of his testator's estate being here under the immediate control of this court, it would be extremely unwise and impolitic to permit him to remove the whole of the property to another country, totally out of the jurisdiction of this court. If a sum of money sufficient to raise the annuity for the widow is remitted to the executors in England, to be vested in government securities, it is all she can in justice require: and as the legatees are not entitled to payment till the widow's death; in that event there will be more than sufficient in that country to discharge all their demands on the estate: to go beyond that would be reducing the residuary legatee, at a future day, on the death of the widow, to the necessity of crossing the Atlantic, to recover his property, at a certain great expense and risk, and perhaps an infinite loss of time; if the executors on that side of the water should be disposed to contest his right, which it is not improbable they would, from the disposition they shew to get the whole property into their possession.

*535

*536

In order therefore that the respective rights and claims of the parties may be justly and equitably preserved and protected, we do order and decree, that the defendant (as soon as he can possibly collect the debts due his testator) remit to the executors in England, to be by them vested in government securities, so much money as (in addition to what they already possess) shall be sufficient to secure to the testator's widow the annuity bequeathed to her. It is further ordered, that the defendant do and shall hereafter retain and keep in his custody and power, all such other monies belonging to his testator's estate as he may receive; and from time to time place the same at interest in the funds of this, or the United States, or other good security, for the benefit of complainant or such other persons as shall, on the event *of the widow's death, become entitled thereto; paying thereon to complainant such sum or sums of money as shall be at any time allowed and directed by the court for the maintenance and education of his children. And the master is hereby directed to enquire and report what may be an adequate allowance for the present maintenance and education of the complainant's children. Also that the complainant do annually account before the master for the sum of money so to be allowed; and to be at liberty to apply to the court by petition for an additional allowance, as his family may increase in number and years. And lastly, that the costs be paid out of the estate.

*537

1 Desaus. 537

Case CXVII.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

DICKINSON v. LEGARE and Others.

(July, 1797.)

[Interest ⇐18, 39.]

Interest allowed on a stated account from the day it is signed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. §§ 34, 87; Dec. Dig. ⇐18, 39.]

[Partnership ⇐161.]

A co-partner going abroad, and giving his own bond for a debt of the co-partnership, can affect only his own private property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 240; Dec. Dig. ⇐161.]

[Partnership ⇐151.]

An assignment of the co-partnership funds by one of the partners, when abroad, without the knowledge or consent of the partners at home, is illegal and void. But such assignee (though he also took the private bond of the assignor) may come in with other creditors pari passu, on the copartnership effects, for the balance of his debt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 267; Dec. Dig. ⇐151.]

[Interest ⇐55.]

Interest stopped during the war; but revived from the treaty of peace.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Davis v. Wright, 2 Hill, 569.

For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. § 128; Dec. Dig. ⇐55.]

[Payment ⇐24.]

[A bond given by one partner for a firm debt, though only binding that partner, is not an extinguishment of the debt against the partnership.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. § 29; Dec. Dig. ⇐24.]

[This case is also cited in Woddrop v. Ward, 3 Desaus. 207, on the relative rights of partnership and individual creditors in property of firm or members thereof.]

Chancellor MATTHEWS delivered the decree of the court:

The argument in this case was taken up first on the master's report, to which an exception was taken by defendant's counsel, as to an allowance of interest on an account stated by Dupont, Brewton and Co. between them and complainant, from the date of the last article in that account; and it was contended that interest ought to be allowed from the time only, that the law of this state allows it, on open accounts, viz. from March, 1784. On that part of the report specially stated by the master, respecting a quantity of salt, it was insisted by complainant's counsel, that it was such a credit as ought to be allowed him; and by the counsel for the defendant, that it ought not. The argument was next gone into on the pleadings at large, and three points were made, viz. 1st. That the bond given by Dupont to Nutt, one of the defendants in this cause, could be binding only on the private estate of Dupont; and that it having been given for a partnership debt, on an open account, the former *being a higher security than the latter, it is in extinguishment of the debt of the partnership. 2d. That the assignment made by Dupont to Nutt of the partnership funds, during the life of Jones, another of the partners, without his privity or consent, was illegal and null and void, and 3d. That the accounts exhibited by Nutt against the partnership of Dupont, Brewton & Co. contains charges to a large amount for compound interest, and interest during the war, which ought not to be allowed. We will first observe on the exception to the master's report, and are of opinion that it is not a well founded one; because it has been the uniform practice of this court, to allow interest on a stated account, from the day on which it is signed; and this account comes fully within this rule. As to the credit given complainant for the salt, it being no more than a conditional one, that is when the money was received, for which it sold, it was incumbent on complainant to shew that it had been received; his failing to do so, must deprive him of any benefit as to that sum. Before we proceed to observe on the second argument in the cause, it will be proper to state the case at large. The copartnership of Dupont, Brewton & Co. was largely indebted to Nutt, one of the defendants, a merchant in England, previous to the war between the United States of America and Great Britain. Dupont during the war went from this country, bound on a voyage to France, was taken by a British ship of war, and carried to England. Whilst there he was prevailed on by Nutt to give him the bond in question; also a general assignment of the whole of the partnership funds; and this without the privity or consent of Jones, the other surviving partner who was at the time in Georgia. Nutt at the close of the war, through his agent here and by virtue of the said bond, procured an act of the legislature to authorise him to receive from the treasury the securities for money which had been taken for the sale of Dupont's private estate, under the confiscation act of this state, in trust for himself and the other creditors of Dupont. He accordingly did so, and by virtue of the assignment has also possessed himself of the partnership books and other *papers; and he insists that he was well warranted in acting as he has done, and ought not now to be disturbed in the enjoyment of those advantages thus obtained. On the contrary it is contended by complainant, that the assignment was illegal, for two reasons, viz. circumstanced as Dupont was, he could not be considered as a free agent, because his refusal to execute what was required of him, would have subjected him to confinement in goal in a foreign country, he being completely in the power of a large and urgent creditor; and because the assignment was made without the privity or consent of his copartner Jones. Having thus stated this part of the case, we will proceed with our observations on these three points that have been made. As to the first point, the bond in question being the individual bond of Dupont, never can attach itself in the first instance on the partnership concerns; but must be considered as binding on the private estate of Dupont alone. Indeed the defendant Nutt himself has so considered it; as by virtue of that bond he applied for and obtained an act of the legislature for possessing himself of that estate, in trust for himself and the other creditors of Dupont; and has accordingly possessed himself of all the securities for which the estate was sold. If the court do not so determine it, they must see it in the light of an imposition on the legislature, that by calling it the private debt of Dupont, thereby acquiring a right to receive from Dupont's private estate, to the injury probably of his private creditors, which he could not legally or equitably be entitled to, until their demands were all previously satisfied. Whether the bond under these circumstances is to be considered as an extinguishment of the partnership debt, we will consider in another branch of the cause. As to the second point, it is one of the first impression; no case analogous to it has yet come under the view of this court; the books from which we usually draw our information furnish no precedent; because, as it has been very properly observed by defendant's counsel, all the decisions contained in them respecting the rights and conduct of merchants, are bottomed on a distinct peculiar code of laws, *which have been established for regulating mercantile proceedings, and have no manner of relation to the conduct of merchants in this country. Thus circumstanced, we must consider this part of the case as standing alone, and decide it on its own intrinsic merits, according to the best of our judgment. To sanction the conduct of Dupont in this instance, we think would be attended with very mischievous consequences indeed. It would be cutting by the roots every degree of confidence between man and man in the mercantile line; no one would consider himself safe for a day, if his partner has the power by the stroke of a pen, without his knowledge or consent to reduce him to a state of ruin. For let us view for a moment how far this mischief is capable of being carried: Suppose A. B. and C. are partners in flourishing trade, in good credit, and in the ordinary course of mercantile dealings, not only competent to the discharge of their debts, but have made profit on their trade—A. by collusion with one or more of the creditors might assign over not only the whole books and securities for money, but stock in trade also of the co-partnership; the creditor might make a forced sale of the latter, which by bringing into market a larger quantity of goods than there is any immediate demand for, they must be bought in by speculators at a very inferior price, and thus what in a regular course of trade would have been more than adequate to the discharge of the whole partnership debts, is swallowed up by one or two creditors, to the ruin of responsible, innocent persons, and perhaps many of the other creditors. The mischief would not end here. So extraordinary a conduct in one partner, might induce a general belief that the others could not have been altogether innocent; the probable consequence would be, that neither of those persons ever could engage in trade again with any prospect of advantage. On the contrary, how often has it happened that when men have merely been unfortunate in trade, and have failed, with the characters of honest men, that even their creditors have joined in re-establishing them in business. Further, would not this be opening a door for the grossest frauds to be prac*ticed? Might not one or two creditors by bribery, induce a man otherwise disposed to be honest, to an act of this kind? Again, suppose another partner to make a similar assignment to another creditor, what a scene of confusion and litigation must necessarily spring out of such a clashing of claims; for who is to determine which of the assignments is to be preferred? It is unnecessary to trace the evil tendency of such power in one partner over the funds of the partnership, to any greater extent; those already pointed out are of such magnitude as to induce every reflecting and honest mind to revolt at the idea of placing within the reach of any one man, so arbitrary, so immoral, and so dangerous a power over the property, the integrity and future welfare of others. But when we view this matter in its public relation, we find ourselves loudly called on to check the evil in its birth; for as a mercantile country, its prosperity will greatly depend on the integrity of its mercantile transactions. To give the smallest countenance then to such an act as that now the subject of our consideration, would be giving a deep wound indeed to the commerce of this country. We are therefore of opinion that the assignment made by Dupont to Nutt, without the privity or consent of the other partner, Jones, independent of the unfavorable situation he was then in, was unwarranted by any law, or usage of merchants, is inequitable and nefarious, and must be set aside. We however think that Nutt ought not to be excluded from coming in as a general creditor on the partnership funds, for so much of his debt as remains unsatisfied by the private estate of Dupont, pari passu, with the other partnership creditors. As to the third point. We must here conform our decision to that of the case of Higginson v. Air [1 Desaus. 427.]; it ought therefore to be referred to the master to report the balance due to Nutt by Dupont, Brewton & Co.

*538

*539

*540

*541

It is therefore decreed, that the report of the master be confirmed, except as to the article respecting the salt, which not being supported by proper evidence must be disallowed. That the assignment made by Dupont to Nutt be set aside. That Nutt be however allowed to *come in as a general creditor on the partnership funds of Dupont, Brewton & Co. pari passu with the other creditors, for so much of his debt as remains unsatisfied out of Dupont's private estate. That the account of Nutt be referred to the master, to state what is due thereon, allowing him the usual interest from the close of his account, until the commencement of the war in April, 1775, and simple interest from the date of the treaty of peace, in 1783: That the balance of £2244 17s. reported to be due to complainant, be admitted in the like order of payment out of the aforesaid funds, with interest on such balance till paid; and that each party pay his own costs.

*542

---

1 Desaus. 542

Case CXVIII.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

SNOW and Others v. CALLUM, Executor of Snow.

(July, 1797.)

[Executors and Administrators ⟸497.]

Travelling expenses and overseer's wages not allowed to an executor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 2118; Dec. Dig. ⟸497.]

[Wills ⟸848.]

Specific legatees bound to contribute proportionably to the payment of testator's debts, on failure of other assets.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 2145; Dec. Dig. ⟸848.]

[Slaves ⟸22.]

A bequest of freedom to a female slave and her issue, after ten years from testator's death —the children are free, though the mother died within the ten years.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Slaves, Cent. Dig. §§ 92–111; Dec. Dig. ⟸22.]

[This case is also cited in Logan v. Logan, 1 McCord, Eq. 5; Jones v. Jones, 39 S. C. 253, 17 S. E. 587, 802, regarding right of executor to allowance for money paid.]

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court.

Upon considering the master's report, and on examination of the defendant's accounts, the court are of opinion that the charges for traveling expenses and overseers wages, which he has allowed to the executor, should be struck out, as they are not warranted by the act of assembly, which regulates the allowance therein given to executors: and this court has uniformly in such cases referred them for recovery of such charges to their actions at law, on a quantum meruit. The account must therefore go back again to the master to be new stated. There can be no doubt on the will of George Snow: that the limitations over are too remote: a variety of cases having been determined on that point in this court. David Snow, the first taker therefore had a good right to dispose of the property bequeathed him by his father; subject however to a contribution out of his legacy in proportion with the other specific legatees to the payment of his father's debts, on a deficiency of other assets of the estate; and as it is alleged that the whole of the legacies of some of the specific legatees, and parts of others have *been sold, and the money applied to the payment of the testator G. Snow's debts; it must be referred back to the master to ascertain the fact, and report specially thereon, and the sums to be paid by those legatees who have hitherto contributed nothing or but little out of their respective legacies towards reimbursing or indemnifying those whose legacies have been disposed of in the manner above mentioned. With respect to the bequest of freedom to the woman slave, Minda and her increase, after ten years from testator's death, his intention is so plain that there can be no doubt but the children were emancipated, though their mother died within the ten years.

*543

NOTE.—The refusal to allow the executors the charge for overseer's wages, is not a prohibition to employ overseers where required, but to prevent their charging overseer's wages for their own services, on the plantation. The statute being express that executors and administrators shall have no other compensation for all their services to the estate, than two and a half per cent. on monies received, and the same sum on monies paid on account of the estate, except in cases of interest money. If an executor claims more for extra services, he must make up an issue, and try it before a jury.

---

1 Desaus. 543

Case CXIX.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

JAMES JACKS and Wife v. GEORGE HENDERSON.

(September, 1797.)

[Wills ⇐80, 81.]

A native of Scotland, enjoying some estate there, being about to come to Carolina, to take possession of an estate there, executed a paper, which has some characteristics of a deed, and some of a will, which was recorded in Scotland by his proctor. This paper had reference to his intended voyage, and the accidents it exposed him to, as the inducements to its execution, in order to prevent disputes in case of his death. He arrived safe in Carolina, lived a number of years, married a lady of some fortune, and died without leaving issue. The court was of opinion that even if the paper was to be considered as a will, the dispositions of it were merely provisional and contingent: and the contingency (to wit, his death before he arrived in Carolina) not having happened, the dispositions of the estate cannot take effect, at least, not to the prejudice of the wife and her rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 200, 201; Dec. Dig. ⇐80, 81.]

The bill states that in the year 1789, the complainant Ann, intermarried with George Wilson, then lately from Great Britain. That she was possessed of a number of negro slaves and other property, of which said Wilson possessed himself, and appropriated to his own use. That sometime in the year 1791, the said Wilson died intestate, leaving no issue or relation in the state. That said Ann being then under age, John Withers, her brother, administered on George Wilson's estate, duly returned an inventory and appraisement, and with permission from the ordinary, sold the same at public auction, and said Ann purchased thereat negroes and other property to the amount of 912*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*

*544

for which, accord*ing to the conditions of sale, said Ann was to give a bond and mortgage: but said administrator having choses in action of said estate to a considerable amount, more than sufficient to pay its debts, and leave a large balance; and knowing that according to law, the said Ann was entitled to one half of the residue, never demanded her bond and mortgage, being willing to leave the same in her hands as part of her distributive share, and accordingly delivered the same to her, debiting her for the amount. That affairs continued thus until the defendant arrived from Great Britain, and produced a writing said to be signed by said George Wilson, under which he pretended to claim said Wilson's whole estate. That said administrator suspecting the authenticity of such paper, applied to counsel, and received for answer, that no court would permit the widow of said Wilson to be ousted of her distributive share, by a paper of so doubtful a complexion; whereupon the said administrator gave defendant notice he would contest his claim. That all he wished was to secure his sister Ann one half of the personalty of said Wilson, and her dower in the real estate. That if the defendant would agree to settle all matters by an equal division of the estate after payment of debts, he would release to him his administratorship. That defendant consented to his offer, and agreed to convey and secure to said Ann one half of the personal estate of said Wilson, and to put her in the same situation as if said Wilson had died intestate: whereupon in order to bind himself to said agreement, said Henderson entered into a certain bond to that effect. That in pursuance of said agreement, the said administrator released to said Henderson the administrator-ship, and made no opposition to his proving said paper as a will, as executor. That said Withers also delivered up to defendant choses in action to a large amount, being the whole of said Wilson's personal estate: and defendant has ever since acted as sole executor, and received divers sums of money which he hath applied to his own use. That at the time or soon after the completion of said settlement, said complainant, Ann executed to defendant a bond for 456*l.* 3s. 9*d.*

*545

being *the amount of half her purchases, and gave a mortgage of sundry negroes as a further security: but charges that the same was given merely for securing one half of the purchases to defendant in case he should not be able to recover so much money on account of said estate; and defendant when she was about to execute said bond promised he would apply one half of the monies he should receive on said estate to the discharge of said bond and mortgage.

The bill charges that defendant hath received divers sums of money of said estate, but instead of applying them to the debts of the estate, and then one half of the balance to satisfy complainant Ann's bond and mortgage, hath placed said mortgage in the hands of the sheriff of C. T. D. to seize said negroes and sell them to satisfy the same.

The bill prays that defendant account for all money received by him for said estate; and if it should appear that he has been guilty of a devastavit, that he may specifically comply with the condition of his said obligation; and after paying the debts of said estate to give credit on the obligation of said Ann for one half of the balance; and to be restrained from selling the negroes under the mortgage. And that the agreement or compromise may be confirmed; and one half the estate be secured to the complainants.

The answer of George Henderson admits the marriage of complainant Ann with said Wilson. That he died at the time mentioned in said bill, but not intestate. He admits the administration and sale by John Withers. Admits his own arrival and production of the paper in bill mentioned (see exhibit A) whereby defendant is made sole heir and executor of said Wilson. Admits that on producing said will, the administrator and complainant Ann, were disposed to give him trouble; and being informed that by law no property after making a will would pass, and thinking it reasonable some provision should be made for the widow, it was agreed, as stated in bill. That the administration of said Withers was revoked—the bond as mentioned in bill given by complain*ant Ann to him, and he qualified as executor. Admits he has placed the mortgage in the sheriff's hands; but previous thereto applied to complainant Jacks for payment of so much of the bond as he was in justice entitled to receive, assuring him that the debts and legacies on the estate were so large as to absorb the whole estate within £400 or £500 and offered to shew him vouchers to prove the same; but said Jacks refused to examine them, and put defendant at defiance, and insisted that defendant should pay out of his moiety, the debt due from said Wilson to his father in Scotland, and also all the legacies; which is unconscionable; as by the operation of the will, the whole personal estate became the property of defendant, inasmuch as said Wilson died before the law took effect which enacted that property acquired after the making of wills, should not pass thereby. Defendant denies he has received large sums of money. On the contrary he has made considerable payments of debts, and is anxious to close the same, and would have done so, had the complainants settled with him. Denies he had any power from the legatees of said Wilson to compromise their rights, or had an idea of relinquishing the smallest part. Believes the claims set up under said will are well founded, and knows of no discount against them; nor that said will was ever revoked. That he has no interest in said legacies; but means to pay them to the utmost, and is ready to come to a fair settlement.

*546

The paper relied upon by the defendant as the will of George Wilson, the first husband of Mrs. Jacks, was executed by him, in Scotland, before he came over to this country and married her. On the face of the recorded copy it is stated, that on the 25th May, in the year of our Lord 1792, James Ross, writer in Perth, proctor for George Wilson, appeared in the presence of David Smyth, esq. advocate, sheriff depute of Perthshire, and gave in a disposition and deed of settlement after inserted. The deed was executed on stamped paper; and he desired the same to be registered in the sheriff's court books, which was done accordingly; whereof the tenor follows. The paper recites that the said George Wilson being the heir *of Dr. James Crockatt of South Carolina; and that having arrived at the age of majority, and proposing to leave Great Britain and reside in Carolina, and take possession of the estate and effects of his late uncle, in Carolina; but that as many accidents might occur to prevent the execution of his design, he resolved by a general deed of settlement to prevent any disputes that might arise concerning the estates heritable and moveable in case of his death; and therefore under the conditions and provisions therein mentioned, he sold and disposed to himself and the heirs of his body, all the lands, debts and sums of money, heritable or moveable, that should belong to him at his death; and particularly (without prejudice of this generality) the balance of the price of the lands of Colholl, sold by him to William Mercer, of Air; and also all the lands in South-Carolina, which belonged to his deceased uncle, Dr. James Crockatt, with the slaves on the plantation, &c.—and all other lands and plantations in that or any other province, country or kingdom that might belong to him at his death, in any manner or way. And on failure of his own issue, he disposed, sold, &c. the said property to his nephew, George Henderson, and his issue; and on their failure with limitations over to other relations. And the said George Wilson in said deed, bound and obliged himself to procure the rights and securities relating to the said lands and subjects thereby disposed of, agreeably to the laws of the country where they lie; and to grant, subscribe and deliver all such writings and securities proper and necessary for vesting the substitutes above mentioned, in case of his death, to be applied for the ends and purposes therein after mentioned, or such other purposes as he might afterwards order by, or write under his hand. And in the first place for the payment of all his just debts—In the second place for making effectual an annuity of £20 during his own life, and the life of his father, and the sum of £50 in case of his death, agreeable to a bond of provision for that purpose by him executed, of that date. And in the third place, for payment of such legacies and provisions as he should make or grant to any friend or relation during *his life; and in the event of said George Henderson succeeding him, he bound and obliged the said George Henderson to pay certain sums of money to certain relations whom he names. And moreover in case of his death without lawful issue, he appointed George Henderson, and failing him, certain others to be his executors and universal legatees—and he made over and conveyed to them successively, in the order set forth, his whole debts, and sums of money, goods and effects that he might die possessed of in Great Britain, or America, or elsewhere. And the said deed is stated on its face to be delivered to the said George Wilson's father, David Wilson, to be kept for the behoof of all concerned—and he consented that the paper should be put on record in Great Britain or America. And he appointed James Ross in Perth, his procurator. In testimony whereof he put his hand and seal, before three witnesses, on stamped paper, on the 4th day of August, 1781.

*547

*548

The following is the substance of the bond mentioned in the foregoing paper:

It recites that George Wilson being about to go to Carolina to take possession of his uncle Dr. J. Crockatt's property; and that his father, David Wilson being living and might by the casualties of life, be deprived of support, he thought it his duty to grant this present deed. He binds himself, his heirs and successors to pay to certain persons (whom he names) as trustees, the sum of 20*l.* per annum, from a day fixed, during the said David Wilson's life. And in the event of his (George Wilson's) death, he binds his heirs and successors (named in the paper purporting to be a will or settlement) succeeding to his estate, to pay a yearly sum of 50*l.* for the use of his said father. It was dated on the 4th August, 1781; and he consented to its registration; and it was put on record in Scotland.

The cause came to a hearing in 1797. It was argued by Mr. Desaussure and Mr. W. Johnson for the complainants, that the paper in question, executed by G. Wilson in Scotland, could not be considered, or made to operate, as a last will and testament. That it was a mere deed, *operating in part immediately; and making a provision for his connexions. It was a family settlement. It has few of the features of a will, and many of a deed. It was executed on stamped paper, which wills were not then required to be in England or Scotland. See William's abridgment. It was put on record, which is never done with wills, before the death of the testator. A paper having a present operation, as this had, in connection with the bond (which mutually refer to each other) cannot be a will. See Swinburne, 55. Dyer, 166. Here was an annuity granted to George Wilson's father to take effect immediately. To make a paper testamentary, it must be ambulatory—for omne testamentum morte consummatum est; et voluntas est ambulatoria usque extremum vitæ exitum. 4 Co. 61b. A will or testament is a declaration of the mind in disposing of an estate, to take place after the death of the testator. See office of executors, 2 vol. p. 7. 5 Bacon, 497. Swinburne, p. 1, § 2 and 4. Carthew, 38. Lea v. Lib. Comyns, 452, 3. 4 Burn's Eccl. Law, 95. 2 Lord Raym. 1282. Powell on devises, 13, 14. The paper having some of the characteristics of a will, cannot change its essential character, which is that of a deed—And it cannot operate both as a deed, and as a will, for the rules of construction applicable to these two kinds of instruments, are entirely different and even incompatible. Now if this be not considered a will, but a deed, then it cannot operate on any property acquired after making the deed; and the personal property of Mrs. Jacks cannot be swept away from her by this deed—She would be entitled to a moiety of the real and personal property of her husband, not disposed of, as there were no children of the marriage. Her claim is very humble, for she asks only for a moiety of that very property which she carried in marriage to her husband George Wilson. But if this really was intended to be, and must be considered as a last will and testament, it is contended for the complainant, that this paper was a mere provisional will, made on a particular occasion, and was contingent, and became inoperative and void afterwards: and also that if it were a good will originally, it was re*voked by subsequent circumstances. This is not a novel idea. In the case of Parsons v. Lanoe, reported in Ambler, 557, and 1 Vesey, sen. 190, it was decided by lord chancellor Hardwicke, that a will made on the eve of a journey abroad, was a contingent will, made on a special occasion, and for a particular purpose, and was avoided by the testator's safe return. The words of the will however were particular—"Imprimis, in case I should die before I return from the journey I intend, God willing, shortly to undertake for Ireland, my will and desire is," &c. &c. The testator was a married man, but had no children—he returned safe from his journey and had children. He afterwards died without revoking this will. Lord Hardwicke in giving his judgment in the case said, that under such circumstances, no court of equity will give any latitude to support such a will, but will take hold of any words they can, to make it conditional and contingent. He accordingly laid hold of the conditional words in the will, and pronounced it contingent, and avoided by the return of the testator. See also 4 Burr, 2165, Wellington v. Wellington. It might also be fairly contended that the subsequent marriage, connected with the other circumstances, ought to induce the court to consider this as a case of implied revocation. It is true that the decided cases, and our statute, have not yet gone so far as to say that the marriage alone of the man, should amount to an implied revocation of a preceding will, as however is the case on a woman's marrying—but the whole doctrine of implied revocations has grown up by degrees. It was a long time before marriage and the birth of children, were allowed to amount to a revocation of testaments, even of personal estate. The reason and justice of the doctrine afterwards induced its adoption, and its extension to wills disposing of real estate. And we see in Lanoe's case how readily the court seized on any words, to get rid of a will of a married man, in favor of after born issue. So we contend that a will made abroad, having direct relation to the property then possessed by the testator, ought not to be allowed to be set up, after the lapse of many years, against a wife, *married in another country, to rob her of all the property she carried in marriage. A woman's will is revoked of course by her subsequent marriage. 4 Co. Rep. 60, 1. Justice requires that the husband's will, under such circumstances as exist here, ought to be considered as revoked. There is no evidence that the original has not been destroyed. It has never been produced: only an official copy from the record in Scotland where it was registered by his proctor. Another point conclusive for the complainant is, that the defendant made a written and formal compromise with Mrs. Jacks, allowing her a moiety of the property she carried in marriage to George Wilson—the other moiety she abandons to him. And he had a right to do so; for he is the first taker under the paper, whether deed or will, executed by George Wilson. He alone is interested to give effect to that instrument; to enlarge its operation, or to limit it. He has done so, and is bound by it. He at least cannot question it. There is no pretence that the property of George Wilson in Scotland, and in this country, inherited from his uncle, is not sufficient to satisfy the provision for the father under the bond he gave him, and to pay his debts.

*549

*550

*551

Mr. Edward Rutledge for the defendant, argued, that the paper was a will. It gives legacies, appoints executors, and is to take effect after death. These are decisive marks of a will. This has been admitted to be a will, and has been proved as a will by the consent of the complainant, in the court of ordinary. The spiritual court is the proper tribunal to decide on the character and validity of papers set up as wills. See 1 Atk. 560. 7 Bro. P. C. 319. And this is the settled course in this country. The act of 1789 expressly gives the probate of wills to the ordinary, with appeal to the courts of law. Then it has been established as a will, and cannot now be shaken—and we can only look to its operation. It is full and complete, and disposes of every thing which the testator then possessed, or might afterwards acquire. And as the marital rights gave the husband the absolute right of all his wife's personal estate reduced to possession, the will attaches upon that property, and disposes of it. As *to the implied revocation, arising from George Wilson's subsequent marriage, no case has ever gone so far. None of the English decisions have been carried to that extent: and that eminent ordinary, Mr. Burrows, of Charleston, decided expressly in Mr. Hugh Wilson's case, that marriage alone, without issue, did not amount to an implied revocation of a prior will. And our statute in providing, that marriage and the birth of issue should amount to a revocation, decides by implication at least, that nothing short of marriage and issue, should have that effect. As to the agreement, the defendant has explained it in his answer; and his answer is not contradicted by any testimony. The compromise cannot affect those in remainder; and G. Wilson's debts are yet to be paid.

*552

The chancellors took time to consider the case, and afterwards Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the following decree of the court:

The bill states, that complainant Ann Jacks, then Ann Withers, in the year 1789 married one George Wilson. That he died in 1791, without having either before or after his marriage, as complainants contend, made a will or leaving any issue or relation in this state. That letters of administration were granted to her brother John Withers, who sold the personal estate by permission of the ordinary—And that she purchased to a considerable amount. That some time afterwards, in the year 1794, defendant arrived from Great Britain, produced a certain writing said to be a will, and signed by the said George Wilson, dated 4th August, 1781; under which he pretended to claim the whole of the estate, real and personal. That defendant having received notice from the said John Withers of his intentions to contest his claim under that paper, unless he would agree to certain proposals made by said Withers; the said defendant agreed to secure to complainant Ann, one half part of the clear residue of the said Wilson's personal estate, after paying his debts; and accordingly executed a bond to that effect and for that purpose; in consequence of which the said John Withers withdrew his opposition, and permitted defendant to qualify as executor, and then gave up to him all *the bonds, notes and other papers, relative to the said estate. That soon after defendant executed the bond abovementioned, complainant Ann signed one to defendant for £456 3s. 9d. being half the amount of her purchase, and gave him a mortgage for securing payment of the said sum. That the said bond and mortgage were given solely for securing payment of one half of the purchase, in case the defendant should not recover so much money on account of the estate as would be equal to the amount of her purchase; and that defendant at the time of executing the bond, promised he would apply one half of all the money he received above the payment of the debts of the said George Wilson, to the discharge of her bond and mortgage. That instead thereof, he had applied the money received to his own use, and placed the mortgage in the sheriff's hands, to seize and sell the negroes. The bill therefore prays an account and injunction. The defendant admits the marriage of G. Wilson with complainant Ann, and his death; but not that he died intestate: on the contrary he exhibits an instrument of writing, which he calls a will, wherein he is made sole heir and executor of the said G. Wilson, chargeable however with payment of his debts and legacies. Defendant admits that complainant Ann being disposed to contest the validity of the will, it was agreed that she should have one half of the clear residue of the personal estate, after payment of all incumbrances—the letters of administration were then revoked, and he qualified on the will. He denies that he had any authority from the legatees to compromise their rights, or that it was his intention to do so; and avers that he fully intended by his contract with complainant to allow her one half of the clear residue of the personal estate, after paying the debts and fulfilling the said G. Wilson's testamentary dispositions, and does not know or believe that the will was ever revoked. It is necessary here to refer to the paper writing mentioned in bill and answer, and state particular facts, before the questions for the determination of the court are stated.

*553

*554

*George Wilson was a single man when he executed this paper. He came over to South-Carolina afterwards; and in 1789 married complainant Ann, with whom he lived until he died in the year 1791, without leaving any issue. It does not appear that he ever made a will in this state, or signed any other writing, disposing of his estate; nor is there any evidence of his having ever spoken to any person about the paper above recited.

Upon this case the general question was, whether under these circumstances, this paper writing was to be considered as a will still subsisting? Under that, two others arise. First, whether this writing is merely a conditional contingent instrument of disposition, depending on the event of G. Wilson's death before he arrived in Carolina, or whether absolute and subsisting in all events? Secondly, supposing it absolute, whether the great alteration in his circumstances by a subsequent marriage seven or eight years after making it, will amount to a revocation thereof, so as not to be subsisting at his death?

For complainant it was contended, that this paper was nothing more than a conditional disposition by deed of the estate, on certain contingencies, which never having happened, it became null. On the other hand it was objected for defendant, that this paper was a will duly executed. That it is not essentially necessary to make use of any particular form of words in drawing wills, provided the intention of testator to dispose of his estate, is evidently and plainly shewn. It was also insisted, that this paper has been proved in the court of ordinary, where its validity as a will, was properly and only determinable. On reading this paper with attention, it is evident that the only words in the whole instrument that give it the smallest resemblance to a will, are those wherein he names and appoints the defendant and several others, successively, sole executors, and universal legatees; for in every other respect, it has the form of a deed. It cannot however be denied, that a man may make his will in any form he pleases, provided he complies with the formalities required by law.

*555

It is equally true, that by long *usage the ecclesiastical court has become the proper, though in this state not the only court wherein a will of personal estate is to be proved, and its validity contested; but this court has a power to set the will aside for fraud. This case is singularly circumstanced. A paper writing, now for the first time called a will, is proved and recorded in Scotland as a deed. The party who is injured by it, has no opportunity of contesting its validity there: and a copy of it some years afterwards is brought here by the person claiming the estate under it, who when he finds that its validity as a will is about to be disputed, makes a compromise with the widow and gives her a bond, agreeing to allow her one half of the clear residue of the personal estate, after payment of debts: he is then permitted without opposition to qualify before the ordinary, who not having investigated the business, in fact has not determined on the validity of the will. We must here observe that the defendant comes with an ill grace to make this objection, after the compromise he has entered into; because it is doubtful whether the ordinary would have granted him letters testamentary, and qualified him as executor under the paper, if the complainant had made opposition: and defendant fearful of this, seems to have made this compromise in order to lull the complainant into a deceptive security, until he had obtained letters testamentary; supposing that the probate being once gained, no other court had the power to set it aside. The paper having been qualified under as a will, before the ordinary, the question for consideration is, whether it is merely a provisional contingent disposition, or absolute and subsisting. Here reference must be had to the instrument itself; from which it is evident that the whole of it, except the clause which provides the annuity for his father, is contingent and eventual; for he sets out with declaring his intention to leave the kingdom and reside in Carolina; but as many accidents might occur to prevent the execution of his design, he made that deed as he calls it to prevent any disputes that might arise about his estate, in case of his death. What those accidents were, he does not mention; but we must presume them to *be such as might befall him and occasion his death before he arrived in Carolina, not contemplating that the paper was to have any efficacy if he should arrive safe. That it was not intended to be absolute is further evident from his reserving the estate to himself and his heirs in the first instance, with the power of making such alterations as he should afterwards order by witnesses under his hand, in giving legacies or making future provision for any friend or relation during his life. The case of Parsons and Lanoe, is very nearly similar to this, but much stronger; for in that the testator, after some pecuniary legacies, gave the rest of his estate to his wife: in this the bequest is unto nephews and nieces. There lord Hardwicke determined the will to be a provisional contingent disposition; and it is observable also that although the testator had two children born after his return from Ireland, yet the lord chancellor would not make that great alteration of circumstances, the ground for his decision, but chose rather to found his decree upon the words of the will. This will then, being so penned, we are of opinion that the disposition is merely provisional and contingent; which not having happened, the disposition of the estate cannot take place: the rather too as it does not appear that he did any act after his arrival here expressive of an intention to confirm it, or even mention to any of his friends in this state the existence of such a paper; and nothing will set it up but some act done by him after that event to republish it, or defeat the condition. Indeed it is presumable from the length of time that elapsed after its execution, that he considered it as a mere nullity, and altogether inoperative—we must either presume that, or that he intended a fraud upon his wife, with whom he lived in harmony for two years after his marriage. As this will therefore was merely contingent and eventual, it is unnecessary to give an opinion upon the second question; but it has never yet been determined that marriage alone will amount to a revocation of a will of personal estate; at least there are no cases in the books, wherein the question has been immediately before the court; for all the cases that we have examined from Lug *and Lug in 1699, to that of Lancashire and Lancashire in 1792, have been on the question of marriage and the birth of children, either in testator's lifetime, or posthumous children; and the judges in the several courts have uniformly declared that marriage simply, and alone, has not yet been held to be a revocation of a will of personalty. The legislature having by law recognised the doctrine in its utmost latitude, that marriage and the birth of issue, is a total revocation of a will, it may be a subject worthy their serious attention to settle the question, whether marriage alone shall be a revocation of a will.

*556

*557

The injunction therefore must be continued until a liquidation of defendant's account by the master, and further order of the court.

1 Desaus. 557

Case CXX.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

CHARLES and THOMAS DRAYTON, Executors of John Drayton, v. GLEN DRAYTON, and M'CREDIE and Others, Creditors of Glen Drayton.

(September, 1797.)

[Executors and Administrators ⇐308, 318; Wills ⇐716.]

Executors who were also residuary legatees, divided their testator's estate among them: except some parts which they sold, and became purchasers. One of them contracted debts and judgments were obtained against him, and he became insolvent. The other executors are solvent: they filed a bill against their co-executor, and his creditors, to subject the estate he had received from his testator's estate to his testator's debts and legacies still unpaid. It was decreed that the assent of the co-executors to their legacies had so far vested the personal property, (though not the real) in the legatees, that the executors could not pursue the assets, and take them from the creditors of the co-executor who was insolvent: but they, the solvent executors, who had assented, were liable to the testator's creditors.—The will of the testator having charged, the whole of his real and personal estate with the payment of his legacies to his minor children: that part of the estate which came into the hands of the insolvent executor as one of the residuary legatees is still liable to those legacies. Executors selling property, and a co-executor purchasing: the property is changed, and is liable to his creditors. The co-executors not requiring bond and mortgage, are liable.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Stallings v. Foreman, 2 Hill, Eq. 405, 407.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1263, 1319; Dec. Dig. ⇐308, 318; Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1709; Dec. Dig. ⇐716.]

This was a bill filed by the complainants under the following circumstances. John Drayton being possessed of very large real and personal estates, made and executed his last will and testament, wherein after giving several legacies to his wife and daughters, he devised and bequeathed certain estates and property to his son John, and on his death, under age, and without issue, to his sons William Henry, Charles, Thomas and Glen. He also devised and bequeathed the remainder of his estates, real and personal to his said last named sons. They all survived the father: William Henry died soon after, leaving issue. John died under age, and unmarried;—and the property bequeathed to him fell to the sons, according to the will. The sons Charles, Thomas and Glen, qualified as executors on their father's will, and possessed themselves of the whole estate, real and personal.—Knowing that the estate was very large, amply sufficient *to pay the debts and legacies, and to leave a considerable estate to them, they divided a good deal of the property among themselves, and sold some of the unproductive lands, of most of which they became purchasers. Glen Drayton, one of the sons and executors, held his share of the estate many years, (as the other sons did,) treated it as his own property: sold some of it to third persons; contracted debts, &c. Some of his creditors brought suits against him, obtained judgments, issued executions, and in some instances levies were made on the property which came to him from his father's estate. His brothers and co-executors being alarmed lest his private creditors should sweep away all the property, and leave nothing to pay his proportion of the father's debts and legacies, (which were considerable,) the payment of which would then devolve on them, filed their bill against him, and several of his judgment creditors, to subject the property to the payment of the debts and legacies of the father, in the first instance. The creditors of Glen Drayton contended that the property had vested in him, and that some of them having obtained judgments against him, and caused levies to be made on the property, have acquired a lien, which cannot be taken away: and that they were all entitled to be paid.

*558

The cause came to a hearing in September, 1797, and was argued by Mr. E. Rutledge, and Mr. J. Parker, for the complainants. They contended that the creditors and legatees of a testator have more than a personal demand on the executors; they have an equitable lien on the very assets of the testator. And this lien, or equitable right, yields only to purchasers who have an equity to rebut such equity. And this right or lien is stronger where the executor is also residuary legatee. His assent to his own legacy cannot prejudice the creditors of the testator, or his other legatees. A creditor may follow the assets into the hands of a legatee, though vested in him by the assent of the executor.—The court will follow the assets as far as possible, unless mischief results to third persons. If the executors are solvent, the court relying on their liability, might not *pursue the assets. But here, Glen Drayton, one of the executors, is insolvent, and his effects cannot pay the whole of his share of his father's and testator's debts.—Where an executor sells assets of his testator to pay his own debts, the creditors of the estate may follow the assets into the hands of the purchaser; especially if he knew that testator's debts were unpaid. 2 Vernon, 616. 1 Atk. 463, 4. All assignments, or sales by an executor, fraudulently made, are void. 3 Atk. 240. And however the court may favor bona fide purchasers from executors or legatees, yet whilst the legacy remains in the hands of the legatee, it is liable to creditors of the testator. See 1 vol. of Cas. in Chanc. 257. To sanction the misconduct and sales and assents to legacies by executors, and to make them liable as on a devastavit, which is a mere personal claim, would be very mischievous to the creditors of the testator. Glen Drayton's own assent would have vested the property bequeathed to him, as much as the assent of the other executors. Their assent therefore was of no importance. If he stood sole executor, would his assent in his own favor as legatee, vest the property in him to the prejudice of the creditors of the estate? Surely not yet this is substantially the case under consideration. A person taking by operation of law, stands on the same footing with the person from whom he takes by such operation. See 1 Vesey, 239, West v. Skip. The creditors then of Glen Drayton, who claim a lien by operation of law, stand in his place; and in his hands the assets of his testator might be followed to pay his debts. The funds of the testator are legally and rightfully bound to pay his debts first; and this right of his creditors to be paid, ought not to be shaken but on the strongest grounds. So in cases of partnership, the joint funds are first liable to pay the joint debts. The conversion or change of them by one partner, shall not deprive the copartnership creditors of the benefit of this rule. The case of Laurens v. the executors of Hawkins, [1 Desaus. 144,] decided in this court, shews the extent of this doctrine. It would be very hard on the executors, that they might be ruined by the act of a co-executor, without any fault on their part. They knew *their testator's estate was large, and could not refuse their brother and co-executor to take his share of it; but surely subject to the testator's debts. What could they have done with the estate? If they had kept it together undivided, it might have been wasted in that way by the operations of the war, by neglect, by various accidents.—The creditors of Glen Drayton must have known that he got his estate from his father, and that it was liable to his father's debts. If they credited him, it was at their own risk. Executors are liable only for their own misconduct, not for that of others. The complainants come before the court as legatees as well as executors; and legatees may come and oblige other legatees to refund or abate. See 2 Eq. Cas. 554. 2 P. Wms. 446. But they come in also for the benefit of the creditors of the testator. If Glen Drayton's creditors are entitled to be paid before the testator's, because his co-executors assented to the legacy, the same may be said as to Charles and Thomas Drayton's creditors, and the father's debts and pecuniary legacies may go wholly unpaid. As to Glen Drayton's return of the property to the tax office, it was unavoidable. A division had been made, and he was in possession. He could not make a special return and say, that he obtained the property from his father, and it remained liable to his debts. This is never done by legatees, or ever by mortgagors or mortgagees. The case of the creditors of Glen Drayton, is not so strong as that of purchasers: a creditor must always take the property of his debtor subject to its equity. Glen Drayton had other property acquired by his wife, to which they might have trusted in crediting him. The equity set up by the creditors of Glen Drayton, who are defendants, is ideal and unfounded. They are neither purchasers nor mortgagees, who would be too strong for the complainants but mere creditors, who trusted to the character and person of Glen Drayton.

*559

*560

The negroes purchased at the sale by Glen Drayton, are still liable—he did not pay for them. His creditors must therefore pay for the property, if they take it.

*561

*Mr. Pringle and Mr. Desaussure argued for the defendants.

Executors cannot make a legatee refund, unless the payment to the legatee was compulsory. 2 Vern. 205.—On a voluntary payment to a legatee, the executors will be personally liable to the creditors. Vinter v. Pix, 1 Chan. Reports, 71, 133. Tilsy v. Throckmorton, 2 Cha. Cas. 132. 1 Vernon, 90, 453, 460. If the deficiency arises from the executor's wasting the assets, the legatee who has recovered his legacy, shall not be compelled to refund. 1 P. Wms. 495. See also Sadler v. Hobbs, 2 Bro. C. C. 114. Scarfield v. Howes, 3 Bro. C. C. 90. And though the rule is, that creditors who are unpaid, and the assets fall short, may compel legatees who have been paid to refund; (1 Vern. 162,) yet executors cannot, if they paid the legacy voluntarily. 2 P. Wms. 296, Coppin v. Coppin; and 2 Vesey, 194, Orr v. Kaimes. Where a party has lain by for a great length of time, and suffered an estate to be distributed, he shall not have an account. See 4 Bro. C. C. 257, and the cases cited. A fortiori, the executors who made the distribution cannot. The executors are liable to the creditors of the testator for the assets, and there is no pretence that they are insolvent. They are men of large property, derived entirely from the testator's estate. Even if the executors had a right to call on the legatees, to whom they made a voluntary payment or delivery to repay, they would stand only as simple contract creditors. But they desire in this case, to be preferred, even to the judgment creditors of Glen Drayton: nay, they even sold and delivered some property of the estate to Glen Drayton, for which they neither took bond nor mortgage; yet they expect to be allowed a priority over his judgment creditors. It is admitted that the executors have abundant assets to pay the creditors, yet they have not paid them: but they ask the court to aid them to compel the application of the estate of a legatee, to whom they voluntarily delivered it, to refund at the expense of his creditors, even of his judgment creditors who have liens.

*562

*By the common law, which was the law applicable to this case, at the time it arose, the executor could sell the assets, and the bona fide purchaser would be protected even against creditors; and even if the executors wasted the money received on the sale. The executors having assented to the legacy, and divided the estate, and delivered Glen Drayton his share, he held it as his property; and third persons, his creditors, have become interested in it. These would be injured, if the assets could be followed. But some of the decided cases say, that the assets can be followed where third persons have obtained an interest in them by purchase, or by obtaining liens on them by way of mortgage or executions.

The parties have slept too long on their rights, if they had any. It is nearly twenty years since testator's death. See 4 Bro. C. C. 125, respecting purchasers from executors. The cases quoted from 1 Atk. 463, 4, and from 3 Atk. 240, for the complainants, are more favorable for the defendants.

Chancellor MATHEWS afterwards delivered the decree of the court.

The first and most material point in this cause is, whether the division of the estate by the executors of J. Drayton, was such an assent by the present complainants, as executors, to the legacy of G. Drayton, as will extinguish any right they might have had under different circumstances, to that relief they have prayed for by their bill? The second point is, how far, if at all, they are liable for any act done by them to the prejudice of the rights of the creditors and other legatees of J. Drayton? It appears on the face of the proceedings that the executors and complainants Charles and T. Drayton, and the defendant G. Drayton, in the year 1779, agreed to make a division of their testator's estate, conformably to the dispositions pointed out by his will, for the reasons by them assigned, previous to their having ascertained or paid their testator's debts and other legacies; on a mutual understanding that each was to be responsible for his proportion of debts and legacies. Glen Drayton having thus drawn out his proportion of his father's estate, and being *in full possession thereof, contracts considerable debts; they have been prosecuted to judgment and execution, and even levies made on some of them; but further proceedings on them have been enjoined by this court, till the hearing of this cause. As to the first question, it being a novel one, great ingenuity has been displayed by the counsel in their arguments on it; and they have referred to a vast variety of cases from the books, for the purpose of establishing certain great standing principles. But no case has been, nor do we think there is any which can be assimilated to the present, which has received a solemn adjudication. It has therefore been necessary for us to trace this truly important question into all its ramifications with great minuteness, and to decide with caution. We already foresee that the conduct of the present complainants, is not alone implicated in the present question, for we have good reason to believe that the same has been the conduct of other executors similarly circumstanced. However, our duty confines us simply to the case before us; and the rules of law, and not policy, must be our guide. There are few principles of law better settled than this: that an executor assenting to, and the legatee being put in possession of his legacy, and alienating the same, it never can be followed as assets of the testator into the hands of the purchaser. But it is contended, that the legacy which went into the hands of Glen Drayton, not having been disposed of by him, and being still in his possession, is in its essence the same as it originally was, and is subject to that legal lien which was attached to it by the testator's will, viz.:—the payment of his debts and legacies in the first instance. And it was further contended, that as an executor, G. Drayton had a right to possess himself of his own legacy without the consent of his co-executors. On the other hand it has been contended, that although there has been no formal alienation by G. Drayton himself, yet the law has made such a disposition of this property, as will as effectually wrest it out of his hands, as if he had disposed of it in ever so formal a manner; for the division of the testator's estate, was an assent of

*563

*564

Charles Drayton and Thomas *Drayton, two of the executors, to the legacy of G. Drayton; and his possessing himself thereof, enabled him to obtain a credit on this visible property, and made it liable to the judgments and executions of his own creditors, and which have created such a legal lien thereon as they cannot be divested of at this time; provided there are assets sufficient of the testator in the hands of those executors who thus assented, to pay his debts and legatees: and that these are sufficient, is not denied. That as to his being an executor himself, and having a right independent of the assent of his co-executors to possess himself of his legacy, that cannot avail the complainants in this case, because they were privy, and assenting to his taking his legacy. It is with reluctance we pronounce the latter argument to be well founded, and must prevail: we say with reluctance, because we think the case of the complainants a very hard one; they must become severe sufferers by their misplaced confidence, and in whom? In a brother. But as it is their misfortune to have done so, they are bound to abide the consequences; and however we may regret the inconvenience resulting to them, a superior duty calls on us to say, that by the division of their testator's estate under their immediate sanction, and their permitting G. Drayton to possess himself of his part thereof, in the unlimited and uncontrolled manner they did, was to every legal intent such an assent on their part as must subject them to all the disadvantages growing out of such incautious and untenable conduct.—In the exercise of the office of an executor, great caution ought to be used; for the law subjects them to such penalties for small deviations from those rules, it prescribes for their conduct, as renders it obligatory on them to act up to its rigid rules, if they wish to avoid after inconveniences. The predicament in which the present complainants stand, verifies the observation; for had they done what the law directed them to do, which was to pay the debts of their testator, before they proceeded to a division of his estate; or if after a division, they had entered into proper mutual engagements for so doing, and made it an act of general notoriety, much might have *been done in their favor; but on the contrary to suffer G. Drayton to possess and incumber that part of the estate he was entitled to in the manner he did, was a degree of negligence, such laches on their part as never can entitle them to that relief, merely as co-executors or co-legatees, which they come here to ask for, to the prejudice of bona fide judgment creditors of Glen Drayton, who, we must presume, had trusted him on the faith of a large visible estate, which for aught they could come to any legal knowledge of, was unincumbered with any other than his own debts.

*565

Our opinion on this point is, that the division of J. Drayton's estate by his executors, was a reciprocal assent of the executors to their taking their several legacies; and that the capacity of the executor sunk from the moment of his receiving his legacy into that of a simple legatee uncontrollable by the co-executors: and in no other point of view can it be taken, for the assent of at least one executor is indispensable to the acceptance of a legatee, and his peaceable enjoyment of his legacy; for should an executor legatee take his own legacy before the debts of his testator are satisfied, might not the other executors, by legal means, compel him to restore the assets of the testator, until his debts are fully ascertained and paid? We think they might. In this case, G. Drayton was for many years in the peaceable enjoyment of his legacy, without any act done by the other executors to intercept him in such his possession. We shall next consider the effects of such possession. It is a well known rule in law, that if a man assigns his property to a creditor for valuable consideration, and the creditor permits him to remain in possession of it, and he afterwards claims a credit on that property, and the creditor is ignorant of such assignment, that the subsequent creditor shall be preferred in the payment of his debt. So here, G. Drayton having obtained a credit on the property in his possession, his creditors unapprised of any other incumbrance, acquire a legal lien thereon by judgment and execution. They certainly cannot, upon any equitable principle, be divested of such lien by the present

*566

com*plainants, merely to save them harmless, for an act of imprudence committed by them to the injury of unoffending bona fide creditors, whose rights are in this court, always favored and protected. As to the second point, it is unnecessary for us to take any particular notice of the claims of G. Drayton's creditors, as to his real estate; as it is too well understood, that the real estate which came to him by his father was not under the control of his executor, they can therefore have done no act which exempts it from the payment of their testator's debts and legacies. G. Drayton's creditors can consequently come in for no greater interest in that part of his estate than he himself had; and as it was liable in the first instance in his hands, for the payment of his testator's debts and legacies, so must it continue under the judgments obtained by his creditors. We must also consider his part of the personal estate as liable for its proportion of the legacies of the minor children; because the testator has by his will expressly charged the whole of his real and personal estate with the payment of his legacies; which will, being recorded in the secretary's office, (where all wills were formerly deposited,) it was incumbent on G. Drayton's creditors, as he derived all his estate from his father, to see whether he possessed it, subject to any conditions or limitations; and if they did not, they must blame themselves for the neglect; and because the executors complainants cannot be charged with any improper or unnecessary delay or neglect, in not raising the legacies of the daughters before G. Drayton had incumbered his part of the estate, for the daughters were not entitled to their legacies until 21, or day of marriage, a contingency, which might or might not happen; but as they are both married, and application has been lately made to this court to have the legacies raised, it has been so decreed; and lastly, because as the executors who are considered as trustees for the legatees, took the whole estate real and personal, burthened with the trust created by testator's will, the creditors of Glen Drayton then standing in his place, must take the personal estate subject to the same trust, and all the equity it was liable to in his *hands. As to G. Drayton's purchase at the sale of his testator's estate, we consider it in the same light as that of any other individual; there is no law which prohibits executors purchasing (without fraud,) any property of his testator at open and public sale; and if his co-executors have been so incautious as not to oblige him to give the security required by the advertisement, but have suffered him to possess the purchased property for a series of years as his own, and have even been privy to his sale of a part of it, and quietly acquiesced until executions had attached upon what was left; it is such an inexcusable laches on their part as this court never can countenance. They have lost that equity which they had, and must submit to the consequences; although if this contest had been immediately between the creditors of John Drayton, and those of G. Drayton, and the executors of J. Drayton were insolvent, this court would support the claim of J. Drayton's creditors, who undoubtedly would have a prior and superior equity to those of G. Drayton's. It is therefore ordered, that the report which has been made by the master in this case, be referred back to him, and that he do state the same conformable to the terms of this decretal order.

*567

---

1 Desaus. 567

Case CXXI.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

THOMAS CAPE and Wife v. B. ADAMS, and Others.

(October, 1797.)

[Husband and Wife ⟸29.]

A man marries a girl of 15 years of age without the consent of her guardian. Previous to the marriage, he executed a deed, by which he agreed that her estate should be limited over to his heirs, upon the death of his wife and himself, without children of the marriage. The deed was executed without the privity of his intended wife or her friends. The executor of her father never assented to the legacy. The husband died without issue, insolvent, without ever having reduced the property to possession. —So too of a distributive share she was entitled to, of a deceased brother's estate. The deed is inoperative; and the wife surviving is entitled to the whole against the representatives and creditors of the husband.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 159; Dec. Dig. ⟸29.]

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court:

This suit is brought by the complainants T. Cape, and Mary his wife, against the executor of N. Adams, her father, and the administrator of her brother N. Adams, to be let into the absolute and unqualified possession of the legacy bequeathed her by her father, and the distributive share of her brother's personal estate; and also against the administrator of her former husband J. Jaffray, who opposes their claim on behalf of the creditors of Jaffray, in consequence of a deed executed by him previous to his *marriage with complainant Mary, whereby her estate is agreed by him to be limited over to his heirs upon the death of the survivors of him and his wife, without children of the marriage: The bill states, and it is admitted, that she married Mr. Jaffray at the age of fifteen years, without the consent of her guardian; that the deed was made by Jaffray without the privity of his wife or her friends, and they are not parties to it. It is also admitted that the executors never assented to the legacy, nor was Jaffray ever in possession of any part of his wife's estate; nor is there any proof in the case that he ever assigned any part of it to any person whatever. Such being the incontrovertible state of facts, the question for consideration is, whether the deed executed by Jaffray previous to his marriage, under all the circumstances of it, shall be obligatory and binding on his wife no way privy or consenting thereto, and transfer her right or interest in her own property to his creditors for payment of debts contracted before their marriage; for it would not admit of any argument, that if he had married without making a settlement, and was obliged to come into this court to get her fortune, he would not have been allowed to receive a shilling unless he had made such a settlement as the court should direct. If then he could not have got the estate without a suitable settlement, is this such an one as the court would have ordered? Certainly not; from the uniform tenor of settlements directed by the court of the wife's fortune, it has been invariably on the issue of her body generally, and not of the present marriage; because it would be both unjust and inequitable to limit the estate of the wife to the issue of the first marriage, in exclusion of those which she might have by a future husband. If therefore Jaffray had come forward to demand his wife's fortune under such a deed as the present, accompanied with all the unfavorable circumstances which attended this transaction, he certainly would not have obtained the aid of this court. His creditors therefore standing in his place, can be in no better situation than he would have been; because they must take the estate, subject to all the incumbrances that it would have *been liable to in his hands. None of the cases respecting the assignees of bankrupts are applicable to the present; because it does not appear that any of Jaffray's creditors have any legal lien upon his estate. The case of Jewson v. Moulson, which is a very strong one, and has very many of the circumstances attending it that this has, does not immediately apply, because there the husband had disposed of the whole of his wife's property for a valuable consideration. In the case before us, there has been no assignment: yet, even in the former case, the lord chancellor obliged the assignee to come to terms. In this case, however, so far from Jaffray's creditors having any lien or claim upon this estate, he himself, by the deed which he executed, has expressly declared that it should be considered as a separate and distinct estate from his own, and no ways liable to the payment of any of his debts: but it is unnecessary to refer to books for authorities in this case, because the determination of this court, in the case of the administrator of Harleston v. Hamilton, [1 Desaus. 244,] furnishes a precedent, and is directly in point. In that case, Harleston, by a marriage bond, agreed to settle half of his wife's fortune upon her; and she became entitled after her marriage to a considerable personal estate under the will of her brother, which was never reduced into possession by Harleston—he died insolvent. His administrators in behalf of creditors, filed a bill in this court against his widow, in order to obtain possession of this property. The court decreed that as Harleston had never reduced it into possession, upon his death, it survived to his wife. So in the present case, as the executors have not only never assented to the legacy to the complainant, but have always objected to the inadequacy of the settlement made by said Jaffray; and as the administrators of N. Adams the younger, never did make any division and settlement of his estate; and as Jaffray, in his lifetime never reduced the estate into his possession, and could not receive it without the assent of the executor or the aid of this court; we are therefore of opinion that the whole of it on his death survived to his wife the complainant Mary. Let the plea be overruled, and refer it *to the master to state the account of the executor and administrator; and as the complainant Mary is still a minor, report a proper settlement to be made by complainant T. Cape. Costs to be paid out of the estate.

*568

*569

*570

---

1 Desaus. 570

Case CXXII.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

SHACKLEFORD and MARY, His Wife, v. BUCHANAN, Executor of Collins.

(October, 1797.)

[Executors and Administrators ⟸298.]

Testator bequeathed £1000 and several slaves to his granddaughter Mary; but if she died before she attained 21 years, the legacy was limited over to others. The daughter is married, but has not attained 21 years. Decreed that the £1000 be paid, and the slaves delivered to complainant, and his wife Mary, on his giving security to refund, in case of his wife's death under 21 years.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1217; Dec. Dig. ⟸298.]

[Trusts ⟸127; Wills ⟸865.]

Testator devised the residue of his real and personal estate to his daughter Eliza; but if she died without leaving a son named J. Collins, he devised over the same to the eldest son of his granddaughter Mary, who should be named J. Collins. The estate must accumulate for the benefit of the person, who should ultimately take. The executors to place the income out at interest, under the direction of the master.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 170; Dec. Dig. ⟸127; Wills, Cent. Dig. § 2197; Dec. Dig. ⟸865.]

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court:

The complainant's bill is for the purpose of obtaining payment of a legacy of £1000 and several negroes bequeathed her by her grandfather, J. Collins, and to be quieted in the possession of the real estate of the testator, as heiress at law; and that they may receive the profits thereof, until the person comes in esse, to whom it is limited on a certain contingency. The defendant, executor of Collins, demurs to the bill for two causes: First, because the complainant Mary is not entitled till she attains twenty-one years, to the legacy; it being limited over, in case she dies before that age, without having issue: And secondly, because the limitation over of the remainder of the real and personal estate (devised and bequeathed to testator's daughter, Eliza Collins, but if she should die without a son who should be named J. Collins, to the eldest son of his granddaughter Mary Collins, one of the complainants, who should be named J. Collins,) although depending upon a possibility, yet not being too remote, is valid and operates to create a trust, both in the real and personal estate, in the executor, to answer the intention of the testator. This cause came on to be argued upon the demurrer. The first cause of demurrer was however but slightly touched upon, the defendant's counsel declaring his client was satisfied to pay over the legacy, and give up the possession of the negroes, if the court thought proper to decree it, on condi*tion that security be given by the complainants, to refund the money and return the negroes, if the complainant Mary did not attain her full age, or leave issue. As the court on a petition preferred some time ago by the father of the complainant, for an allowance to be made her out of the interest of the legacy, for maintenance and education, directed that she should have the whole interest of the £1000 for that purpose, we are of opinion and decree, that the £1000 should be paid, and the possession of the negroes be given up to the complainants, Mr. Shackleford and Mary his wife, on his giving security to be approved by the master, to refund the money and return the negroes, if it should be so directed at a future day, by the decree of this court. Upon arguing the second cause of demurrer, the merits of the case have been fully gone into, and the doctrine of executory devises and contingent remainders elaborately discussed: but we think that it would be premature to determine in this case, the question whether this is an executory devise, or a contingent remainder; because the rights of persons would be implicated, in such determination, who are not before the court. The only point therefore that we think proper for consideration on the present occasion is, what is to become of the profits of the real and personal estate, till the person who is to take the principal, on the limitation over, is known; it being contended on the part of complainants that the descent of the real estate is cast by operation of law, on the complainant Mary, who is now the heir at law, at least by necessary implication; no person being designated by the will to take in the mean time. Upon reference to the will, although it is somewhat obscurely worded, in the devise to his daughter E. Collins, and also in the limitations over to the eldest son of his granddaughter Mary Collins, it is nevertheless sufficiently plain and clear, to shew that the testator did not intend that his granddaughter should take any part of the remainder of his real and personal estate, in any event whatsoever. In one clause he has made what we suppose he thought an ample provision for her, in the bequest of the £1000 and six negroes; and in the imme*diate subsequent clause, he devised to his daughter, who was his heir at law, all the remainder of his real and personal estate, to her and the heirs of her body for ever, with a proviso, that if she should die leaving no lawful heir or heirs of her body, then he gave the said remainder of his estate real and personal, to his granddaughter Mary's eldest son, who shall be named J. Collins. The testator having made provision for his granddaughter in a former clause of his will, and passed her by in this, it is evident he did not intend that she should ever take any part of this remainder of his estate, because he absolutely disposed of the whole of it: and to whom? In the first instance to his heir at law, who would undoubtedly be entitled to the rents and profits. If the heir at law dies without lawful heirs of her body, the testator has devised all the remainder of his real and personal estate to the eldest son of his granddaughter who should be named J. Collins. The testator having then by his will disposed of his whole interest in the estate to the heirs, there is nothing remaining to descend to the person who accidentally might become his heir at law, on the death of the residuary devisee, in which event the limitation over was to take place. By a plain and necessary construction of the will therefore, the intermediate profits of the real and personal estate so devised on contingency, must go to the person who will take the remainder of the estate; and the court will extend the trust which the executor has in the whole of the testator's real and personal estate, and which was created in him for the purpose of paying debts and legacies, in order to effectuate the intent of the testator, and carry it into execution, which would otherwise be defeated.

*571

*572

It is therefore ordered, that the demurrer in this cause so far as relates to the income of the real and personal estate be sustained; and that complainants do forthwith deliver up the possession thereof to the defendant, for the purposes aforesaid. And the said defendant is hereby ordered and decreed to account for the profits of the said estate, which he has heretofore received; and likewise to account annually before the master for the *profits which he shall hereafter receive; and that he do place the monies arising therefrom at interest, on security to be approved by the master, for the benefit of such person or persons, as may eventually be entitled to the principal of the said real and personal estate. The complainant to pay his own costs, and the defendant's to be paid out of the estate.

*573

---

1 Desaus. 573

Case CXXIII.

Present—Chancellors Mathews and Rutledge.

WAINWRIGHT v. READ, DUPONT, and WARING.

(November, 1797.)

[Equity ⇐339.]

The answer and evidence of a defendant who has no interest, receivable to explain the terms of sale, notwithstanding the objection that it is parol evidence, contradicting the advertisement and the deed. It is explanatory, not contradictory.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 691; Dec. Dig. ⇐339.]

[Auctions and Auctioneers ⇐7.]

A diminution of 171 acres of high land out of 662 acres of high and swamp land, is not such a deterioration as entitles the complainant to a recision: especially as notice was given at the sale that a claim existed, and that if it succeeded a proportional deduction would be made: and especially as the purchaser had voluntarily renewed the bond in part to a third person several years after the purchase: and the renewed bond has been assigned to another person for valuable consideration. The purchaser is entitled to a deduction for the land taken away: but it must be out of the original bond.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Auctions and Auctioneers, Cent. Dig. § 21; Dec. Dig. ⇐7.]

[Vendor and Purchaser ⇐172.]

Interest also deducted till there was a resurvey made by the vender.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 349; Dec. Dig. ⇐172.]

[Evidence ⇐415.]

[Where the purchaser of confiscated lands seeks relief by injunction against the bond given for the purchase price and a judgment rendered thereon, on the ground that there is a deficiency in the land occasioned by the claim of a certain person, testimony of one of the commissioners that at the time of the sale it was publicly declared that such person had set up a claim to part of the land, and that, if she established the same, a proportionate deduction would be made from the purchase money, is admissible, notwithstanding the objection that it is parol evidence varying the printed advertisement of sale, which did not mention the claim of such person, and also as contrary to the written entry in the sale book, which states a certain number of acres as sold.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1867; Dec. Dig. ⇐415.]

The case was as follows: The estate of Gideon Dupont was confiscated by an act of the legislature for his adherence to the British government during the revolution. A sale of his lands was made at public auction, at Charleston, on the 18th October, 1784, by the commissioners of confiscated estates, to be paid for by instalments in specie. The lands were situated on Deer Creek, and consisted of two tracts, one of swamp, and one of high land. They were divided into two tracts, nearly equal, so that each division might contain proportions of high land and swamp. One tract was sold to Mr. W. Glover, at £3 15s. per acre. This tract was supposed to contain 350 acres of high land, and 312 acres of swamp. The other tract supposed to contain as much swamp and high land as that sold to Mr. Glover, was knocked off to Mr. Daniel Wilson at £2 1s. per acre; but he transferred his purchase to Mr. Wainwright, who assumed the purchase, accepted the conveyances from the commissioners, and gave his bonds for the purchase money.—This tract contained the buildings. It was declared verbally at the sale by the commissioners, that Mrs. Elliott had a claim on part of this tract, which, if substantiated, would induce a proportional deduction of price.

On the 22d of March, 1786, the legislature passed an act to authorize the commissioners of the treasury to assign over to Mrs.

*574

Jane Villeponteux, the sum of £462 *17s. 7d. out of the bonds of Mr. Wainwright, payable in specie, that were lodged in the treasury for the payment of the debts of the above named G. Dupont, who stood indebted in that sum to his sister Mrs. Villeponteux, for a legacy due to her. See the Public Acts, p. 433. In conformity to this act, the commissioners procured from R. Wainwright a bond, dated the 9th of May, 1787, to Cornelius Dupont, in trust for Mrs. Jane Villeponteux, "payable agreeably to the conditions of his bond to the treasurers in October, 1784."—for which a receipt was endorsed on his original bond in the treasury office, in these words; "Received 12th May, 1797, from Mr. R. Wainwright, his bond, payable to Cornelius Dupont, in trust for Jane Villeponteux, for £499 11s. 10d.—which bond, when paid, will be in part of the within bond; and until paid, stands secured equally with this by a mortgage of land. (Signed) P. Bouquet. This bond was afterwards assigned by Mrs. V. and her husband, and Mr. C. Dupont the trustee, to Mr. John Reid, the defendant, for a valuable consideration. No payments having been made on Mr. Wainwright's bond, Mr. Reid placed it in suit, and obtained judgment on it on the 16th of November, 1789; which was afterwards revived, and execution lodged on the 3d of October, 1791. Mr. Wainwright set up no plea in the suit at law to prevent the judgment; but he filed a bill in equity on the 18th February, 1793, to obtain an injunction and relief against the bond and judgment, on the ground that there was a deficiency in the land which he had purchased, and for which he had given his bond, occasioned by the claim and title of Mrs. Sabina Elliott; and that he was entitled to a rescission of the contract, or a deduction of the price. To the bill of complaint, Mr. Waring, the surviving commissioner of confiscated estates, put in an answer, stating that at the time of the sale, it was publicly stated that it was supposed that Mrs. Elliott had a claim on some part of the land, but how much was unknown; and that if she established her claim, a proportionate deduction would be made to the purchaser.

*575

*Mr. C. Dupont put in an answer, stating that he was merely a trustee for Mrs. Villeponteux, and had with her consent and for her use assigned Mr. Wainwright's bond which he held in trust to Mr. Reid the defendant, for valuable consideration.

Mr. Reid, in his answer stated, that he knew none of the early transactions of the case; and that he obtained an assignment of the bond abovementioned for valuable consideration; and after some time placed the same in suit against the obligor Mr. Wainwright, and recovered judgment on the same on the 16th November, 1789, which was afterwards revived, and execution lodged on the 3d October, 1791—no defence having been made by the said Wainwright against the recovery of the debt.

The cause was heard and argued before the chancellors; but it appearing to them that an issue at law was necessary. An issue was accordingly directed to try the title of Mrs. Elliott to a part of the land in question; and also to ascertain the quantity which might be deficient, and its value. That issue was tried, and a verdict was returned unfavorable to Mrs. Elliott's claim to any part of the land. But upon a new trial being ordered, the cause was tried a second time, and upon fuller evidence, a verdict was returned establishing Mrs. Elliott's claim, (then devised to Col. Lewis Morris, and others) to 171 acres of the high land, sold by the commissioners to Mr. Wainwright, which the jury valued at 41s. per acre.

The cause came to a hearing in the court of equity.—Mr. Thomas Waring, one of the commissioners of confiscated estates (who is made a defendant in this case for form sake, having no interest therein) had been examined at the trial of the issue at law, and was again examined in this court. He proved that the commissioners advertised the land for sale generally, without specifying quantities, at so much per acre; and that at the sale it was publicly declared that Mrs. Elliott had set up a claim to part of the high lands, and if she established the same, a proportionate deduction should be made from the purchase money; that a resurvey was promised, and the purchaser called for it once or twice:

*576

but it was some time *before it was made. He understood and believed the purchaser took possession of the land soon after the sale.—Mr. Purcell and Mr. Glover had also proved that the taking away of 171 acres of the high land out of 350 acres, was a great deterioration of the value of the whole tract sold; that being the principal wood land.

It was contended for the complainant Mr. Wainwright, that the evidence and answer of Mr. Waring, a co-defendant ought not to be received in this court, on the ground that it would be admitting parol evidence to vary the printed advertisement of sale, which did not mention the claim of Mrs. Elliott; and also contrary to the written entry in the sale book, which states the number of acres sold at 662. The verbal declaration said to have been made at the sale, that Mrs. Elliott had a claim which might diminish the quantity, is parol evidence to contradict the written entry, which is inadmissible. See Powell on Contracts, 431. 2 Atk. 384. The cases cited by defendant's counsel, are cases of resulting trusts, which are expressly excepted out of the statute; or fraud and imposition, or palpable mistakes in the deed, contrary to the declared sense of the parties; or executory cases.

For the defendants, it was argued that the evidence and the answer of Mr. Waring were admissible evidence on this point—that Mr. Waring was a competent witness, having no manner of interest in the cause, but being made a defendant merely pro forma, because he as a public officer had sold the land. That this was not one of the cases where parol evidence was introduced to contradict a deed or written paper: that the advertisement in fact contained no particulars, and stated that the terms would be declared at the time of sale, which was accordingly done; and the declaration of the terms at the sale, announcing the claim of Mrs. Elliott, and that a deduction would be made from the purchase money if she established her claim, were the essential terms of the sale, and were receivable in evidence; and that the parol evidence went not to contradict the written advertisement, or the deed by the commissioners to Mr. Wainwright, but to explain and shew what were the real terms of sale; and that such *evidence was receivable. The following cases were cited 1 Atk. 447, Hutchins v. Lee. 2 Atk. 98, Walker v. Walker. 3 Atk. 77. Rosewell v. Bennet. 1 Vern. 366. 2 Vern. 252, 506. Cases Temp. Talbot, 78, Mallabar v. Mallabar. 3. Atk. 788. Joynes v. Statham. 3 Bro. C. C. 201, Clinton v. Hooper. 4 Bro. C. C. 472, Cripps v. Jee and al. 1 Fonbl. 188, and the cases there cited. Espinasse, 420. 780. 7 Douglas, 30. Wilson, 313.

*577

The chancellors decided that the evidence of Mr. Waring was receivable, for the reasons given in their decree.

On the merits of the case it was argued by Mr. Pringle and Mr. Parker, for the complainant, that the contract ought to be wholly rescinded; because of the great and important diminution in the land sold, by the establishment of Mrs. Elliott's title to 171 acres of the land. That the loss of so great a part of the high land and wood land, occasioned such a deterioration in the value of the whole tract as could not be satisfied by a simple proportional deduction from the whole price: and therefore the complainant was entitled to an entire dissolution of the contract. And if so, then the bonds given for the purchase money are void, and must be given up, and the injunction perpetuated. The deficiency found by the jury on the issue, is 171 acres, which is nearly half the high land, and great part of the wood-land; without which the tract is of little value. The resurvey, which ought to have been made speedily by the commissioners, was not made for four years after the sale. Till that was done the purchaser could not take full possession and enjoy the whole tract, as the extent of Mrs. Elliott's claim was not known. And until the deficiency was established, the complainant could not file a bill of injunction, for relief against the bond. Therefore there was no improper delay imputable to Mr. Wainwright. The delay in the survey was the fault of the seller; and it was a great disadvantage to the purchaser, as he could neither improve nor sell, from the uncertainty of the title, and of how much Mrs. Elliott's claim might take off. The jury have by their verdict found a diminution of 171 acres, taken *away by Mrs. Elliott's better title; but they have not found the relative value of these 171 acres to the whole tract: only the proportionate value of the land taken away to that left, having reference merely to the price originally given, to wit, 41s. per acre. But the court is at liberty to look at the relative value, and to declare whether it is not so material as to authorize a rescission of the contract. The doctrine that a deficiency which is material, and affects the enjoyment even of the remaining land, will authorise and induce a rescission of the contract, is founded in reason, is supported by the civil law doctrines, and is warranted by the decisions in our own courts, both of law and equity. 2 Bro. C. C. 118; Pool v. Shergold. Espinasse's Ni. Pri. Rep. 150. 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 357, c. 8. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 685, c. 9. 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 678, c. 1. Glover's case, decided by this court, is similar to this: He bought the other half of Dupont's lands,—the deficiency was only sixty-four acres,—yet the court rescinded the contract, because the highland comprehended all the woodland. It was also argued for the complainant, that if the court would rescind the contract, or deduct from the price, in relation to the vendor, Mr. Reid, who holds the bond in question, and holds it merely as an assignee, cannot stand on better ground. He has no more equity against Mr. Wainwright the obligor, than the state. The assignee takes the bond with all the equity attached to it in the hands of the assignor. 2 Vern. 764. 2 Vern. Coles v. Coles. Mr. Wainwright's new bond, carved out of the old one, stands upon the same footing as the original. But if the court should not think fit to rescind the contract, the deduction made by the loss of the land recovered under Mrs. Elliott's claim ought to be made out of the principal: and interest should be deducted from the whole purchase money, till the quantity of land was finally ascertained by the trial; because the purchaser could not fully use or enjoy the estate, till that was ascertained. See 3 Atk. 637.

*578

Mr. Desaussure, Mr. Ford and Mr. W. Johnson argued for the defendant Reid, that the contract was binding on Mr. Wainwright.

*579

That the declaration at *the sale, of the existence of a claim to part of the land, and that the purchaser should have a proportionate deduction, in case that claim should be established, formed part of the terms of sale. And he doubtless got the land much cheaper for this notice of a claim on it; for the land was knocked off at 41s. per acre; whereas the adjoining tract of the same quantity and quality brought, 75s. per acre. He could claim nothing more than the proportional deduction, even if the land taken away had been more material to the enjoyment of the tract than it appeared to be. But that in reality the deterioration was not such as would justify a rescission of the contract. That the conduct of Mr. Wainwright prevented his setting up any alleged equity against Reid; for he had consented to give a new bond, as late as 1787, several years after the purchase, for part of the purchase money, for the benefit of Mrs. Villeponteux, who was a creditor of Mr. Dupont, when he well knew that there existed a claim which might take away part of the land. This bond was assigned for a valuable consideration to Mr. Reid, who brought a suit on the bond, and recovered judgment on it, so late as November, 1789, without any objection or plea being set up against it, though a resurvey had been made as early as December, 1788. It is too late therefore for the complainant to set up such a claim now. He acquiesced in all these arrangements; and shall not now be allowed to set up such a defense to the prejudice of a third person. See 2 Eq. Cas. abr. 43, 668, § 8. 4 Bro. C. C. 265, 2 Bro. C. C. 118, 330, 3 Atk. 238.

The chancellors took time to deliberate, and chancellor MATHEWS afterwards delivered the decree of the court:

This cause had been pretty fully argued some time ago, but it then appearing necessary to direct an issue at law to try the right of Mrs. Elliott to a part of the tract of land in question, and also to ascertain the quantity which might be deficient, and its value; that issue was accordingly directed, has been tried, under the verdict now brought up. The cause has undergone a second and very full argument at the bar, and now rests for the final decision of this court.

*580

*In opening the cause the counsel for the complainant has thrown a stumbling block at the very threshold, viz. a pointed objection to the admission of the answers of Waring, one of the defendants, as evidence in the cause, as it tends to contradict a deed; the admissibility of which kind of evidence, is expressly provided against by the statute of frauds. Our first inquiry then must be, whether the objection is well founded. That the statute of frauds does make the provision here alluded to, there can be no doubt, but whether it is to be taken in the extent, and in the unqualified manner now contended for, we think very questionable. This, like all other general rules, is liable to exceptions; and it is well known that exceptions in a great variety of instances have been admitted; for were all cases brought into this court to be decided on the strict letter of that statute, its tendency would be to promote as much as to prevent fraud; and this is not the first time that this court has found it necessary to make this observation. We will now examine the nature of this evidence, and see whether it will come within those rules of exception which are allowed of. How came Waring into this court? Was he not brought here by the complainant? He was—for he is expressly charged by complainant's bill, as having acted improperly; and he was obliged to come forward with his answer to defend himself: but as it is discovered that his answer goes to such an explanation of the circumstances of the transaction, as might probably lessen or defeat the objects contemplated by the bill, it is now called that kind of parol evidence, which ought not to be admitted to explain away or contradict his own deed. We have known instances when persons have been made defendants in this court, and who upon the coming in of their answers have been found to be no ways interested in the suit, their answers have been allowed to be withdrawn; but it is the first instance we have ever known, of an application to set aside the answer of a defendant, where it is material in the suit; for in what light is Waring's answer to be taken? He is not the only defendant; nor is it against him that the suit is particularly pointed: it is against another of the defendants, *Reid, who having obtained a judgment at law, has been enjoined from proceeding thereon, by this court: and the question now is, whether the complainant has so much equity in his case, as to induce this court to perpetuate the injunction. And to this point of equity, Waring's evidence particularly applies. We cannot garble a defendant's answer, and admit one part, and reject another: he is bound to answer fully; and if he does not, he can be compelled to do so. Having done so, it remains for us only to say, how far it is material, or not; and what weight is to be given to it, when it is before us. Waring swears by his answer, that previous to the land in bill mentioned, being set up at public auction, he explicitly declared, that it was sold subject to a claim of Mrs. Elliott, to some part of the high land; and that the purchaser was to take it subject to that claim. That a proportionate deduction was to be accordingly made out of the purchase money, for what might be afterwards found deficient. That another tract, the moiety of this tract, purchased by Mr. Glover, on which there were no buildings, brought a much higher price than the tract now in question, although there was no difference in the then supposed quantity or quality of the land; that it was necessary to sell some quantity of land; and the quantity named was, to the best of his information the real quantity. And that the commissioners of confiscated estates made it a general rule at all their sales, and particularly at this, to declare that the quantity of land named was to be restricted by the words more or less. To this evidence, it has been particularly objected, that a declaration of the terms of sale, at the time of the sale was improper. That a purchaser is bound by no other terms than those contained in the printed public advertisement. That if such declarations were made at the time of the sale, the complainant neither heard nor otherwise knew of them; and consequently cannot be bound by them. That the original entry in the sale book of the commissioners of confiscated estates, as well as the titles given him by virtue of his purchase, are contradictory thereto; as the quantity of 662 acres are in both instances mentioned to be *sold, and conveyed to him; but whereas by the survey made, it appears that the commissioners had at the time of sale no pretensions to sell more than 456 acres; and that the verdict of the jury before the court, has now decided the fact to be so. That the quantity of high land, viz. 171 acres thus severed from the tract purchased, containing all the timber and woodland, this loss is such a deterioration of the land, as will entitle him to a rescission of the original contract. As to the printed advertisements relative to this sale, it appears from that, no quantity of land was therein specified; and that the terms of sale were not to be declared till the day of sale. Whence then are we to seek for the terms of sale, if not from the evidence of Waring the commissioner, declaring what they were? Is there any other before us? There is not. Does it go to contradict the deed? It does: but sub modo only; for we must take the evidence altogether, or reject it altogether. In what predicament should we then leave the complainant? Why just where we found him. But take Waring's evidence altogether, it ought with much more propriety to be considered as explanatory of, than contradicting the deed; for he declares that the quantity of acres inserted therein was intended rather to fill up the chasm (we suppose he meant in the advertisement) than to define the precise quantity sold; as some quantity was necessary to be mentioned: but the real quantity was to be ascertained at a future day, and deduction to be made for any deficiency of the quantity then sold. That the commissioners made it a general rule at all their sales, and particularly at this, to declare that the quantity of land named was to be restricted by the words, more or less. Thus a transaction which would be enveloped in perplexity, is clearly and unequivocally elucidated. Is it reasonable then, or did even the statute of frauds, which is a remedial statute, contemplate the rejection of such kind of evidence? Its title will answer the question, which is "to prevent fraud." Can any fraud be attached to the letting in of this evidence? We can see none. On the contrary, we think it very proper for the explanation of a transaction.

*581

*582

*583

which would otherwise be *inexplicable. But it is contended that notwithstanding all this may be true, yet as the complainant was not made acquainted with these circumstances, he ought not to be bound by them. It is immaterial whether he was acquainted with them or not. Wilson who was the real purchaser, and in whose shoes he now stands, must have been acquainted with them; for is it at all probable that a man will at a public auction, bid for property then under the hammer, without knowing the conditions under which it is to be sold? Such a degree of irrationality we will impute to no man. Does cash or credit make no difference to purchasers? Does short or long credit make no difference? Daily instances inform us, that both causes have a powerful influence. There is another ground for us to conclude that the terms mentioned by Waring, were known; for the moiety of the tract purchased by Wilson, although equal in every respect to that immediately before purchased by Glover, was sold for little more than half the price. Why then should there have been such a depreciation of this tract, unless it was from the uncertainty of what the purchaser was to get by his purchase? But as he at the same time was apprised that he was to pay for no more than he was really to possess, it was an inducement to purchase. If it was to be admitted as a legitimate excuse, that a purchaser did not know the terms of sale at the time he purchased, no man could ever be certain that he had sold his property, which would be productive of such a scene of confusion as would be attended with the most serious inconveniences. The words more or less, we think in this case, ought to carry more weight with them than they are usually entitled to. Custom will in many transactions be taken as a governing rule. In this case, Mr. Waring says it was a general rule of the commissioners of confiscated estates to declare at all their sales, and particularly at this, that the quantity of land named was to be restricted by these words. We think the regulation a very provident and proper one, under their circumstances; for as it was the decided interest of every person whose property was to be thus sold, to keep them as much in the dark as they possibly could, *they must necessarily have had numberless difficulties to encounter, to come at even an uncertain knowledge of the nature of, and incumbrances on, such property: certainly in few, if in any instances, was it to be expected. To restrict the words, more or less, to rules adopted in general cases, would be wrong. Indeed there is no precise rule; the words are generally limited or extended, to suit the circumstances of the case; and in this case we think they ought, when connected with other circumstances, to be considered as ingredients of considerable weight in the decision of the cause. We will now turn our attention to that part of the cause in which the defendant Reid is immediately interested. He is brought here by an injunction against his proceeding at law, on a bond of complainant, as assignee thereof, for a valuable consideration. It appears that this bond was for a part of the purchase money of the land, and was given three years after the purchase was made; after complainant was aware of some deficiency in the quantity of land, though uncertain what. It was given voluntarily; and why is it now required to be cancelled? Because it is said the land for which it was given, is so deteriorated as to become inadequate to the purposes for which it was purchased. Ought not the complainant then to have used the precaution to have this clearly ascertained, before he gave this bond? His not having done this, but executing this deed in the deliberate manner he did, without any kind of reservation, is a striking instance that he at that time had no other view, than that of an abatement of price in the purchase. Is the case so materially altered since, as to entitle him to a total rescission of the contract? We think not; for although the land, by the loss of the wood, might be considerably lessened in value, yet when it is considered that a very trifling part of the swamp is deficient, which is by far the most valuable part of a rice plantation, and the deduction to be made for the wood-land being high land, is equal in price to the swamp—when we consider that a bona fide assignee of a bond, will be materially injured by such a decision—when we consider that this bond was given three years after the purchase was made; *that no objection appears to have been made to its validity, until a judgment at law was obtained on it, nor was any defence ever there set up, in order to rescind the contract, (which might have been done with great propriety, as it was contended by complainant's counsel that such a defence had been frequently admitted in the court of common pleas) although the deficiency was then fully ascertained; nor did the complainant apply to this court for an injunction, till February, 1793, upwards of three years after the judgment; and that the purchase was made subject to a defalcation in some part of the high land, we cannot consistently with our duty grant the prayer of the complainant, in the extent prayed for. This case has been assimilated to that of Glover's case [1 Desaus. 433, 1 Am. Dec. 687,] decided in this court. We think the two cases materially different. In that of Glover's, there was no notice of any deficiency; the contract was never carried into complete execution, as he uniformly resisted the contract; there was no third person implicated in the manner the defendant Reid is in this case; and there was no building of any kind on the part purchased by Glover; therefore this case has no pretensions to a similar decision with that of Glover's. But as we think the commissioners of confiscation were very remiss in one part of this transaction, which was in not having a proper survey made of the land for upwards of four years after the sale was made, their principals must answer for their laches: because though the complainant might at his own risk, have taken possession of and cultivated the land, yet as he did not choose to run the risk of incurring an action to be brought against him as a trespasser, we cannot blame him: but this excuse cannot avail him after the fact was ascertained by a regular survey, which was returned in 1788. On the whole of the case we are of opinion that the complainant is entitled to a deduction of £350 11s. conformable to the verdict of the jury, and the further sum of £71 15s. for the thirty-five acres of swamp which is also deficient, to be deducted from the original bond given by him to the commissioners of confiscation; and no inte*rest to be allowed on the balance, but from the day of the date of the survey made and returned by Trotti. That the injunction granted against the bond, in the hands of the defendant Reid, be dissolved, except as to the interest appearing due thereon, prior to the date of the survey abovementioned, which must be deducted therefrom. The reason for the distinction made between the bond originally given, and that held by Reid, is, that the latter was a special grant by act of the legislature to Mrs. Villeponteux, prior to the act of assignment to the creditors of G. Dupont. The legislature having therefore parted with so much of the property over which they had a control, they could by their subsequent act, give no more than the remainder that was due on the original contract, after releasing the purchaser from the payment of as much as was overcharged him, agreeable to the contract made by their agents with the purchaser at the time of sale. The bill must therefore be dismissed with costs.

*584

*585

*586

Chancellor Matthews having resigned in November, 1797, the legislature did not fill up the vacancy; and there then remaining but one chancellor, in office, he could not (under the act of 1784) proceed to try causes, and pronounce final decrees. The court remained in that situation, until December, 1799, when Aedanus Burke and William Marshall were elected chancellors.

---

1 Desaus. *587

*Case CXXIV.

At Chambers, March 1800. Present—Judges H. Rutledge, Burke, and Marshall.

Case of WM. HAZEL GIBBES, Master in Chancery.

(March, 1800.)

[Constitutional Law ⇐140; Equity ⇐393.]

The master in chancery for Charleston, was appointed to his office in 1784. The constitution of 1778, was then in force, by which all judicial officers were to hold their commissions during good behavior. Upon a new modification of the districts of the courts of equity in 1799 the governor supposing that the right of the master to his office was extinct, appointed another person to the office. The chancellors decided that the old officer holding his commission during good behavior, could not be so displaced. The new appointment is void.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State ex rel. Huckabee v. Hough, 103 S. C. 87, 87 S. E. 436.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 357; Dec. Dig. ⇐140; Equity, Cent. Dig. § 852; Dec. Dig. ⇐393.]

The Lieutenant Governor (Drayton,) acting as governor, on the demise of Governor Edward Rutledge, appointed Mr. W. Lee as commissioner and register in equity for Charleston, Colleton and Beaufort districts, (making one equity district,) under the idea that the office of master in equity, (held by W. H. Gibbes,) was abolished by the new judiciary law. The question respecting the validity of the new appointment was argued upon a rule taken out, for him to shew cause why he continued to act in this office after the new appointment.

Mr. Gibbes was elected to the office of master in equity by the legislature in 1784, under the constitution of 1778—by which all judicial officers were to be commissioned during good behavior. The office of master is partly judicial and partly ministerial: he holds his office during good behavior. After the first meeting of the legislature in 1791, after the formation of the present constitution, the court of equity was established (or re-organized) by law, and the master in equity is therein expressly recognized, notwithstanding commissioners and registers in equity were to be appointed for the upper districts. There was no re-election of any of the judicial officers, and Mr. Gibbes has continued to hold the office to this time. Two of the judges, Rutledge and Burke, were of opinion, that only the second clause of the law of 1791, is repealed by the judiciary law (lately passed;) but the rest of the law is substantially confirmed, inasmuch as it declares that the commissioners and registers shall be appointed in the manner prescribed by the act of 1791. That Mr. Gibbes having been legally appointed, (and constitutionally,) he has a freehold in the office, holding it during good behavior; and cannot be displa*ced by any other mode but that pointed out by the constitution, which is by impeachment.

*588

The duties of the master remain the same as established by the act of 1791: The judiciary law has only subdivided the districts.

If the bare changing of the name, and not the duty of the officer was sufficient to deprive him of his office, the legislature might thus get rid of any officer, and thereby render the clause in the constitution respecting impeachments a mere nullity. It would by a mere strained construction, and by implication, deprive an officer of his place secured to him by the constitution. This would be contrary to the constitution, which declares that no man shall be deprived of his freehold but by the law of the land, or the judgment of his peers. Upon the whole the new appointment is null and void, and Mr. Gibbes is entitled to hold his office. He accordingly held the office, and Mr. Lee gave up his pretensions under Lieut. Governor Drayton's appointment.

NOTE.—See the following cases on this subject. 1 Shower, Justice Archer's case. 1 Shower's P. C. 161, 158, 426, 456. Lord Raym. 161, 12 Mod. 4, 199. 1 Bay, 365, 390. 2 Bay, 59. 1 Cranch, 137, Marbury v. Madison; 6 Cranch, 135, Fletcher v. Peck; 1 Brevard's Digest. p. 476, 7, 8, in note. 6 Bacon, 307.

The lex terræ, means the common law, and the statutes to the time of Edward II.

---

1 Desaus. 588

Case CXXV.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Burke and Marshall.

BOONE and Others v. Executor of DURAND.

(May, 1800.)

[Executors and Administrators ⇐314.]

The court of law has no jurisdiction in cases of legacies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1274–1297; Dec. Dig. ⇐314.]

[Equity ⇐339.]

The defendant's answer, stating that he has paid a legacy, is not sufficient to establish the payment. The executor must prove the payment by other evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 685, 686, 688–696, 703–705, 710, 714; Dec. Dig. ⇐339.]

[Executors and Administrators ⇐308.]

An executor is a trustee for the legatee; and if he pays a legacy prematurely, when directed by the will to keep it in his hands till a certain event, he is liable to be obliged to pay it over, if the legatee has not had the full benefit of it.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Rosborough v. Rutland, 2 S. C. 384.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1257; Dec. Dig. ⇐308.]

The plea in bar in this case, having been solemnly argued and overruled by the court at a former hearing, it ought not again to have been brought into view; but the cause should have been taken up on the bill and answer only—in which case it became necessary for the defendant to prove his answer, as the verdict and judgment were entirely out of the question. This court having de*termined that the court of law had no jurisdiction in cases of legacies, the question for the consideration of the court then is, whether the legacy has been paid by the executor? And if it has, whether it was agreeable to the direction of testator's will? No proof has been adduced to support the defendant's answer, respecting the payment of the legacy; and without such proof, the court cannot take the facts as stated therein to be true; especially as the defendant in his answer is swearing to the act and deed of another person, and not his own, which renders it still more necessary for him to substantiate his answer by other testimony, than his own oath. Admitting for a moment it had been proved that the legacy was paid, the court will consider whether it was conformably to the directions of testator, and under the peculiar circumstances of this case, whether the executor ought not to be obliged to pay over again.

*589

Executors are always considered as trustees for the legatees; and therefore this court, whose peculiar province it is to guard the interests of legatees, particularly those of women and children, will take care that the trusts are faithfully and properly executed. In the case before us, the executor is expressly created a trustee for the legatee, by testator himself—for he positively orders him to keep the legacy in his possession until certain events happened; paying the interest half yearly to the legatee. Whether the legacy be vested or contingent, makes no difference in the case. He was not compellable to pay more than the interest, until the events took place mentioned in the will. It evidently appears the testator intended the legacy as a provision for his niece whenever she should marry; because he gave her no more than the interest until that event, with a power of disposing of it by will, if she died unmarried. If the executor paid the money before she married, he was guilty of a flagrant breach of trust; and therefore should be decreed to pay it over again. And there is a reason, and a very strong one, why the executors under the peculiar circumstances should be obliged to pay it again. It is that the funds out of which the legacy was to be raised, were lands and *negroes which were not subject to depreciation: and this legacy, if paid, was paid in paper money, when almost at the last stage of depreciation—a circumstance extremely unfavorable to the executor, who held the funds as residuary legatee undepreciated, and paid with paper not worth a shilling in the pound, a legacy, which he was not only at that time not compellable to pay, but expressly ordered to retain in his hands. Referred to master to ascertain the amount of principal and interest on the legacy, and report.

*590

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court.

---

1 Desaus. 590

Case CXXVI.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Burke and Marshall.

T. LOWNDES and Wife v. E. LEMPRIRE.

(June, 1800.)

[Wills ⟸565.]

A bequest of ten negro slaves under the age of 15 years must be complied with, and choice made for the legatee of that number under that age out of the whole estate, as well what the testatrix had originally, as what she acquired on the death of her brother.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1233; Dec. Dig. ⟸565.]

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree.

It is evident that testatrix intended to give complainant ten negroes under the age of fifteen years, and in doing so, probably contemplated the tender age of complainant herself. Testatrix certainly counted upon some of the negroes being taken from those she was entitled to from her brother's estate, as she had but three of her own under that age. It is clear from the last codicil that she intended complainant should have ten at all events, by giving the choice out of her estate at large. It is also clear that another of her nieces was equally the object of her bounty, by the manner of wording the bequest to her "of six young negro women slaves." The other bequests are in general terms, and left in a great measure to the discretion of the executors.

Upon viewing the list of the negroes belonging to the estate, it appears that the intentions of testatrix may be fully complied with, because there are more than ten negroes who were under fifteen years of age when she became entitled to them, that may be chosen for complainant; and a sufficient number of women who were young when the testatrix died, that may be allotted by the executor to the other legatee. It is ordered and decreed *that ten negroes, agreeable to the bequest of testatrix, be chosen for complainant, and if it should happen that any of them have died since the list filed, others shall be chosen as nearly of the age of those who are dead as will make up the ten out of the estate at large; and that it be referred to the master to liquidate the account of defendant, and report thereon.

*591

---

1 Desaus. 591

Case CXXVII.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Burke and Marshall.

PEIGNE v. SNOWDEN.

(June, 1800.)

[Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸95.]

A married man cannot convey property of which he was the absolute owner, in trust for his wife, to the prejudice of a creditor, to whom he was indebted before he executed the deed. There was no evidence that she was a sole dealer, and that the property was purchased with her earnings. The pretense of a small debt to the wife would not support the conveyance of a large property in trust for her, to the prejudice of creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 285; Dec. Dig. ⟸95.]

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree.

The single question in this case is, whether the deed of settlement of 30th June, 1796, is to be considered as fraudulent or not, with respect to defendant, to whom Peigne was indebted, previous to making the deed. From the records of the conveyance for the lots which Peigne settled in trust for his wife, it appears plainly that he was the absolute owner of the property, with regard to one lot (and which was the most valuable) so long as Jan. 1792; and as to the other from April, 1794. That he exercised every act of ownership over it that a person could do, by leasing one lot and mortgaging another. And although he recorded the paper writing which he calls a settlement in July, 1793, he does not seem to have contemplated a settlement, until upwards of four years after the purchase of the first lot; more than two years after the purchase of the second lot; and not until after he had contracted the debt with the defendant, which are strong symptoms of a fraudulent intention. We lay no stress on the receipt being given for the money in her name: The bonds were her husbands, and the court must presume the money to have been his also. It appears from the testimony of one of complainant's evidences, that she did not keep a store till 1794, so that the first lot which he purchased in 1792, could not have been bought with the money gained by her earnings. There *is no evidence of her being a sole dealer till he constituted her one by deed (not that a deed is absolutely necessary) but in the present case there has nothing come out in evidence to warrant a conclusion that she was. Another strong circumstance to induce a presumption that the settlement was made with a fraudulent intention is, that it constituted the whole of Peigne's property, amounting, as complainant Snowden states, to upwards of 2000*l* for the purpose of securing to her so small a sum as 3000 florins, the value of which is not above 270*l* or 280*l*. Complainant in her bill has charged that her husband contracted that debt with defendant subsequent to the execution of the deed of trust. That charge has been fully contradicted by defendant's oath, by the evidence of his books, and by the testimony of one of his clerks.

*592

Upon the whole of this case, the complainant does not stand in so fair a point of view as to entitle her to the relief prayed for. The injunction therefore must be dissolved and the bill dismissed, with costs.

---

1 Desaus. 592

Case CXXVIII.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Burke and Marshall.

JOHN TALBIRD and ELIZABETH, His Wife, v. JOHN MARK VERDIER and JOHN M'KEE, Executors of Thomas Bell.

(November, 1797.)

[Descent and Distribution ⟸47.]

A posthumous child unprovided for by the father's will, is entitled to an equal share with the other children, in proportion to their respective proportions under the will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. § 128; Dec. Dig. ⟸ 47.]

The bill states that the complainant, Elizabeth's father, Thomas Bell, deceased, duly executed his last will, dated 16th August, 1795, and died on the 7th September, 1795. That by the said will he bequeathed to his wife Sarah Bell, a number of negro slaves named therein, and some other personal estate for her widowhood, and afterwards to be divided among the testator's then surviving children. That he also bequeathed to the complainant Elizabeth, being one of his daughters, half of a tract of land of 250 acres, one fifth of all his negroes, (including the increase of those bequeathed to his wife) *also one fifth of all his horses, and one sixth of all his cattle, &c. The estate to be divided upon complainant's marriage, or coming of age. That the testator also further disposed of the rest of his estate equally among his several children, and directed that upon the death of any of them without leaving lawful issue, their portion should be divided among the survivors: of which will the testator appointed John M. Verdier and John M'Kee, to be executors; and they qualified and possessed themselves of the estate of the testator, and received the profits thereof for the use of the children of the testator.

*593

The complainants further shew, that the family of the testator at his death, consisted of his wife, the complainant Elizabeth, also two other daughters, Mary and Sarah Bell, and two sons, Thomas and John Bell. That complainant's mother, eight months after the death of the testator, bore a son, for whom no provision was made by the will, which child would remain unprovided for, if the law did not relieve it. And the complainants further shew, that Sarah Bell, one of the testator's daughters died in about thirteen months after the testator; and her share of the estate became by the said will, divisible among the surviving children. That the complainants have since intermarried on the 10th of May, 1799; and have since often desired of the said executors, an account of the testator's estate, with its profits, and their application; and also the payment of whatever should, upon a balance of accounts appear to be due to them. That they have also applied for a division of the personal estate, and their share as well of that as of the real estate; which the said executors have refused to comply with.

The bill further prays an answer account, division, and statement of the said estate; and also for a writ of subpœna.

The defendants in their answer, admit the will of the late Thomas Bell, as stated in the bill; and also that they proved it in the court of ordinary for Beaufort District, on the 14th October, 1795, and qualified under it, as executors. The defendants also admit the intermarriage of the complainants, and their application for an account of *the profits of the said estate, and for the payment of their proportion, and for a division, conformable to the said will, which applications the defendants declined complying with, because the wife of the testator was enseint at his decease, and has since borne a son, for whom no provision is made by the will, but who is entitled by the law to a certain proportion of the estate; and because one of the daughters and legatees died on the 29th of August, 1796, unmarried and intestate, whose share of the estate is by will divisible among her brothers and sisters; but in what proportions defendants cannot determine without the intervention of the court.

*594

The defendants further admit that under his will, they did possess themselves of the estate of the testator, and that the complainants are entitled to an account and proportion of the estate consistently with the said will, and with the rights of the posthumous child, and other children of the said Thomas Bell. The defendants offer to do as they shall be directed by the court, being indemnified therein: and the defendants crave leave to refer the court to the accounts of the said estate, herewith filed and marked A and B.

There was no point of litigation in this case, but to determine the rights of the posthumous child. By the statute of the 13th March, 1789, section 8, it is enacted, "that if no provision shall be made by the will of the testator for any child or children that may be born, after his death, such child or children shall be entitled to an equal share of all real and personal estate given to the other child or children, who shall contribute to make up such share or shares, according to their respective interests, or portions derived to them, under such will."

The court said that the provisions of the statute are too clear to admit dispute.

1st. The court decreed the delivery to John Talbird and Elizabeth his wife, of the tract of land devised. 2d. The delivery to John Talbird and Elizabeth his wife, of one sixth part of the personal estate of the testator, instead of one fifth part bequeathed to Elizabeth: this arises from the birth of a posthumous child, after the *decease of the testator. 3d. The delivery to John Talbird and Elizabeth his wife, of one fifth part of the personal estate, bequeathed to Sarah, a daughter of the testator, who died since his death, and after the birth of the posthumous child. Commissioners to be appointed to divide the personal estate agreeably to the act for abolishing the rights of primogeniture. The real and personal estate delivered to John Talbird and Elizabeth, to stand charged with raising a sum of 100*l.* for the posthumous child, as their proportion to be contributed as an equivalent to the land devised specifically to the other children: and also to remain chargeable with their proportion of the posthumous child's one fifth part of the 400*l.* directed to be raised by the devisees of the land, for Sarah Bell, one of the legatees, who hath since died. And that the following persons (A. B. C. D. E.) be commissioners for dividing the estate agreeably to the act for abolishing the rights of primogeniture.

*595

---

1 Desaus. 595

Case CXXIX.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Burke and Marshall.

Legatee and Executrix of WM. JOHNSON, Jun., v. the Executor of WM. JOHNSON, Sen.

(November, 1800.)

[Bastards ⇐3.]

The court will presume the legitimacy of a child, on slight proof, after the lapse of thirty years and after the death of the father and child.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Dinkins v. Samuel, 10 Rich. 70; In re Robb's Estate, 37 S. C. 33, 38, 16 S. E. 241.

For other cases, see Bastards, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. ⇐3.]

The only question in this case, related to the legitimacy of William Johnson, junior. His father, William Johnson, senior, in his will, used an expression which created a doubt on the legitimacy of his son's birth. Some testimony was given on the subject. One of the witnesses testified that William Johnson, senior, and the mother of William Johnson, junior, had lived together, as husband and wife, and were so considered in the neighborhood.

The court in delivering its decree, said, that the evidence of legitimacy was very slight; but that the court would presume a marriage, after the lapse of thirty years; especially as all the parties were dead; and if a contrary presumption should prevail, it would have the effect of *baztardizing a person after his death, which would be contrary to every principle of law, justice and equity. And the court said, it would act the more readily on the presumption, as there was no legal heir of Wm. Johnson, senior, to contest the legitimacy of Wm. Johnson junior. And it was decreed accordingly.

*596

---

1 Desaus. 596

Case CXXX.

Present—Chancellors Rutledge, Burke and Marshall.

RADFORD and Wife v. Executrix of J. WESTCOTT.

(November, 1800.)

[Wills ⇐562.]

A devise of lands to the wife for life, does not pass a toll causey and bridges, running through part of the land, but held by grant of the legislature for a term of years; especially as the testator directs part of the income from the toll to be applied to support his wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1225; Dec. Dig. ⇐562.]

[Infants ⇐47.]

A minor is not bound by a purchase which is disadvantageous to him, though he may hold a beneficial one.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. § 99; Dec. Dig. ⇐47.]

[Executors and Administrators ⇐348.]

A sale made under an order of the ordinary, which he had previously revoked, is void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1448; Dec. Dig. ⇐348.]

[Executors and Administrators ⇐348.]

[It being essential to a court of inferior jurisdiction that it have power to revise and correct its proceedings before they are finally completed and decided on by the superior court, an ordinary has authority to revoke permission to an executor to sell real estate made under a mistake of facts.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1448; Dec. Dig. ⇐348.]

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court:

There are several questions in this case. First. Whether the devise of the tract, of land of one hundred and sixty acres, to testator's wife, for life, and after her death to his sons in fee, includes an important toll causey, adjacent to and going over part of the tract of one hundred and sixty acres, held under grant of the legislature for a term of years? The court is of opinion that though the testator devises to his wife that part of his lands on which the turnpike lies, he uses those words merely as descriptive of the land intended to be given; for he goes on and says, that the income of the causey is to be applied to the payment of his debt; except so much as was essential to her support.

Secondly and thirdly. Whether the purchases made by Joshua a son of the testator, should not be set aside? It was argued that as the contracts of infants when injurious to them, are not binding on them, and as Joshua was a minor, (and died so) he and his representatives ought not to be at liberty to retain those which are beneficial, as was the case with his purchases of negroes. The court said that it was true the courts protected infants, and the rules of law and equity would not permit them to be bound by acts prejudicial to them. But equity will support such as are beneficial, more especially as in this instance the defendant (and also one of the *heirs) had made equally advantageous purchases at sales of the estate.

*597

Fourthly. Whether the re-sale, made by the executor, of the causey, ought not to be set aside as void? The court said there could be no doubt it must be set aside. The will did not give power to sell it. There was a necessity then to have the ordinary's permission. It was obtained in the first instance, but upon his being afterwards satisfied that he had been misinformed, and that the necessities of the estate did not require a sale, he rescinded it. It was however argued, that the ordinary having once exercised his authority and granted permission to sell, he cannot revoke the same—and that the re-sale made by the executor, in spite of such revocation by the ordinary was regular even though he bought it himself. This is not correct. It is essential to the existence of a court of inferior jurisdiction, that it should have the power to revise and correct any error or mistake in its proceedings, before they are finally completed, and decided on by the superior courts; and especially to revoke orders obtained by misrepresentation or mistake. It is true the ordinary could not punish this contempt of his authority (by a sale contrary to his order rescinding the permission to sell) other than by ecclesiastical censures which would not now be much regarded. But this court will interpose, and though it will not punish the contempt, it will correct the offence by setting aside the sale.

Decree made accordingly. Costs out of the estate.

APPENDIX

1 Desaus. *599

*The COMMISSIONERS OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS v. Creditors of PETER BOQUET.

(August, 1795.)

(Vide ante, p. 450.)

At the time this important case was prepared for the press, the reporter possessed few and those very imperfect notes relative thereto. By the aid of T. Ford, Esq. an eminent member of the bar, full notes have since been obtained, from which the following statement and argument of counsel have been drawn up by that gentleman, with his usual fulness and accuracy. It is believed that this improvement of the report will be acceptable to the profession.

Peter Boquet was for several years commissioner of the treasury of this state. He was first appointed by the governor in May, 1784, upon the occasion of a vacancy occurring in the recess of the legislature. On this occasion he gave a bond to the state, which was recorded in the office of the secretary of state, conditioned for the due and faithful performance of the duties of his said office. At the next session of the legislature, to wit on the 4th of February, 1785, he was elected treasurer of the state, for the term of two years; and again on the 2d of March, 1787, he was elected for the further term of two years. On the occasions of these elections by the legislature, Boquet gave no new bonds. The treasury department as well as the finances of the state being greatly deranged, a board of commissioners was constituted by the legislature in the year 1791, to examine and settle the accounts of all former commissioners of the treasury, and all other persons having accounts with the state. Large powers were committed to this board, and they were authorised to commence suit against all who were in any wise indebted to the state, and to prosecute the same to judgment and execution. In the course of the investigations, about the year 1793, the accounts of Peter Boquet fell under their review, and from statements made, the board concluded he would be very considerably indebted to the state for sums of money that were received by him as treasurer, and were unaccounted for. Before this conclusion was arrived at, P. Boquet died, and no person qualified as administrator or executor on his estate. He had been out of office several years, had incurred large debts to individuals, and had encumbered his real and personal estate by mortgages to several creditors, and there were many judgments against him upon which executions had been issued, and the sheriff had levied upon his real and personal estate; and after his death the creditors were pressing their remedies under their mortgages and executions. The claim of the state was for an unliquidated debt arising from his defaults in office; the sum was uncertain; but it appeared that his defaults had chiefly been incurred during the periods of office, while he held under *the legislative appointment, during which time he had not given any bond. The commissioners of public accounts filed their bill, alleging that Boquet was largely indebted to the state: that his estate was insufficient to pay the public, if his private creditors were allowed to appropriate a sufficiency to pay their demands; that the public was entitled to a preference, as well by that branch of the royal prerogative which before the revolution gave the king the preference, and which it was contended was transferred to and vested in the sovereignty of this state; as also by the 26th clause of an act of 1789, directing the manner of granting probates and wills and letters of administration, &c. which says "the debts due by any testator or intestate shall be paid by executors and administrators in the order following:—Personal and other expenses of the last sickness, charges of probate of will or of letters of administration; next debts due to the public," &c. And the bill prayed that the defendants, who were creditors by mortgage, judgments and execution, should be restrained from selling or appropriating the estate of the deceased until the claims of the state should be liquidated and satisfied.

*600

The defendants in their answers, (without admitting that P. Boquet was a debtor to the state, and contending that as there was no executor or administrator there were not parties before the court to enable that point to be judicially investigated and settled,) rested their principal defence upon the ground that the branch of royal prerogative which gave a preference to the king was not of force in the state; that even if it should be construed to be of force, it does not cover this case; and that the clause of the statute of 1789, being only directory to executors and administrators, has no application in a case like this; that the debt due to the state, if any, was not a debt of record, nor even a bond debt, as the defalcations of Boquet did not occur during the term of office, for which alone he gave a bond. The defendants insisted on their rights at law, and that the sheriff might be permitted to proceed with the levies he had made on the property by which the title was evicted out of Boquet, and that they might be dismissed.

It was argued by Mr. Pringle, attorney-general, for the state, that the branch of prerogative whereby the debt of the king was preferred when it came in conflict with the debt of a subject, of right became vested in the sovereignty of this state at the revolution; that it was annexed to the sovereignty by the common law originally, though modified by statutes; and was given to the king in his representative capacity as the head of the nation, whose right it was; that the reasons assigned by the law are equally applicable to our situation as a state. Every citizen has a common interest in it, for maintaining the public revenue of the country, and guarding it against the practices or collusion of individuals; that though no act of assembly since the revolution has expressly asserted this right in the state, yet as it was incorporated in the body of our laws, as part of the system, which were carried over by the revolution into the new sovereignty, it abides, like all other laws, of full force until by some legislative act it should be qualified, abridged or abolished; that the legislature have not only passed no law for this *purpose, but have in some of their acts, and especially in the act of 1789, plainly supposed its existence. In this they have enjoined on executors and administrators to regard the priority of the state in the administration of assets, and declared that that law shall attach upon the estates of testators and intestates. This court is now called upon to carry the positive injunctions of this law into effect upon the estate of Boquet, whose debt to the state is not on a mere general contract, but arises upon his defaults as a receiver of the public monies intrusted to his hands, which gives a peculiar energy to the claims of the state in this respect. And as there is no executor or administrator of his estate, there is a peculiar propriety for the extraordinary jurisdiction of this court to be interposed, to prevent a failure of justice. Where private creditors are the claimants on an estate so circumstanced, they have a legal remedy at hand; for a creditor may take out letters of administration. But the state cannot become an administrator, and therefore can have no other remedy but in the interposition of this court, which always moulds its relief to the exigency of the particular case, and supplies the accidental defects of the law.

*601

For the creditors it was argued by Mr. T. Ford, 1st, on the principle of prerogative; 2, on the act of 1789. The counsel contended that the doctrine of prerogativa regis, was not of force in this state. They endeavored to show by a variety of elementary principles that it was inconsistent with the improved plans of government and doctrines of common right on which the revolution was founded and these new republics constituted, and inferred that the courts ought to lean strongly against any constructive adoption, more especially as this royal preference was only a branch from that luxuriant stock which had even in England always been regarded with jealousy, and sometimes threatened the subversion of civil liberty. And if one branch were adopted, it might be a precedent for adopting another, and perhaps eventually the whole might be transplanted into our free country. That this preference of the king over a subject does depend exclusively on prerogative, as laid down in all the books. See Off. of Executors 133; 2 Bac. abr. 198; 2 Ventr. 268, where it is said, detur digniori. "The etymology of the word is from præ and rogare, and it extends to all powers pre-eminences and privileges, which the law giveth to the crown." Co. Lit. 90. Blackstone declares it to be a pre-eminence which the king hath over and above all other persons, and out of the ordinary course of the common law, in right of his royal dignity." 1 Black. 239. Barrington says it is founded on the French law. B. on the Sta. p. 20. All which shews how little pretensions this doctrine has to be constructively embraced by us, as a part of the common law. There have been many acts of parliament passed on the subject of prerogative, which have never been adopted and made of force here. The Stat. de prerogative regis, 17th Edw. 2 St. 1, is not of force. The St. 33, Hen. 8, C. 39. "The king shall be preferred to others in suit and execution," is not of force. The Stat. 9 H. 3 C. 18, is made of force, which relates to the goods of a deceased debtor, and prescribes that they shall first be answerable to the king, "if the sheriff or bailiff do shew the letters patent, or summons for debt." We have no such instruments with us as those here called *letters patent, and as to "summons for debt," whether it apply to our capias ad respondendum, or to any species of execution, the statute, if of force, has no application to this case; for the state hath never brought any kind of suit against Boquet in his lifetime, nor against his estate since his death. But supposing the rights of prerogative to be in the fullest force in this state, as much so as in England, this is not a case in which those rights can attach and be effective; for the two conflicting rights must meet at the same time, as is stated in the Stat. 9 H. 3, already cited. The rule is laid down in 9 Coke, "where the king's title and the title of a subject concur in the beginning, the king shall have the preference. 9 Co. rep. 55. Also, 9 Co. rep. 129 the same rule is thus laid down: "Et quando jus domini regis et subditi insimul concurrent, jus regis præferri debet." See also 4 Bac. 198, Co. Lit. 306. It is manifest from these authorities that the king's title depends upon the insimul. Thus if there had been a judgment entered up by the state against Boquet on the same day with the judgments of these defendants, that co-incidence of right would have occurred. But the state has no judgment, never having brought any suit. On the other hand the claims of these defendants are by judgments, executions and mortgages; and by the statute of frauds the lands are bound from the time of the judgment, and the personal estate from the delivery of the writ of execution. 2 Bac. abr. 352. So completely are the goods bound, that the sheriff may levy on them in the hands of the executors or administrators. 2 Bac. 352; Cro. Eliz. 181, Raym. 695. And execution is an entire thing, and once it is begun, (as by levy of goods) it cannot be superceded. Salk. 322. But this question is most ably argued and luminously decided in the case of Rourke v. Dayrell, 4 T. R. 402, in which all the necessary learning on this subject is embodied, and the counsel relied on this case and the case of Rex v. Holcrift, Parker 262; 2dly, the act of 1789 has been relied upon, not merely as matter of positive institution, but as implying the existence of this branch of prerogative. But in neither view ought it to have any effect in this case. All the arguments that apply with so much force against putting the royal prerogative constructively into execution, apply with equal force against drawing such an inference from the act of 1789, which was professedly made for another purpose. It was long ago in effect decided by the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas that the nullum tempus branch of prerogative is not of force in this state, and they allowed presumption of a grant to be inferred from mere possession. Lessee of Alston v. Sanders, 1 Bay. The legislature have had full opportunity of asserting the principle directly if they saw fit; but have not done it; and it is incongruous that the courts of justice should do it by mere construction. It is a fit subject of legislation only, and that direct and positive, and ought not to be implied in an act which professes only to prescribe and regulate the duties of executors and administrators. This act ought to be restrained to its scope and purview. It can apply only to the case of the administration of legal assets in their hands. Now none of the property here implicated could come under that description. 1. Because there are no executors or administrators in this case to be directed; 2. If there were, the lands would not be assets to be administered; and *as to the personal estate the property was evicted by levies thereon, in the lifetime of P. Boquet, by which a special property was vested in the sheriff; and the creditors have no need to come into this court to have assets marshalled, or to effect their remedy; but being in pursuit of their legal rights at law, and now interfered with by this bill, they are entitled to be dismissed.

*602

*603

[Vide ante, p. 450, for the decree of the court.]

1 Desaus. 603

THOMAS LEGARE and ANN ELIZA, His Wife, v. Mr. ASH and the Children of GEORGE BARKSDALE.

(August, 1795.)

(Vide ante, p. 457, 8.)

The bill in this case stated that Mrs. Ann Berwick had made and duly executed her last will and testament, in the presence of three witnesses, on the 10th day of May, 1786, by which she disposed of her whole estate real and personal, to her daughter Ann Eliza Berwick, her heirs and assigns forever; but if she died under age, and without having issue, then to the testatrix's other children. That the original of said will is in the possession of Edward Rutledge, the friend of the testatrix, who drew it. That afterwards the said Ann Berwick being desirous to alter her said will in some respects, drew up and signed, on the 10th of November, 1790, minutes of another will, and left them with her counsel, Mr. E. Rutledge, to draw up one accordingly. But before it was drawn, the testatrix's daughter Ann Eliza Berwick, intermarried with the complainant, Thomas Legare, with the consent of her mother; and the said Ann Berwick, afterwards and some time in the year 1793, directed her said counsel to draw up a new will, which was accordingly drawn and executed by her in the presence of three witnesses, Keating Simons, junior, Henry Rutledge and —— Dunlap. That by this last will, the testatrix, after some pecuniary legacies to particular friends, devised and bequeathed her real and personal estate to her daughter Ann Eliza Legare, during her life, and to the complainant Thomas Legare, during his life; and after death to their children, and in case there should be no children, and the complainant Thomas should survive the complainant Ann Eliza, then to him absolutely. The complainants further stated that the said Ann Berwick died leaving the said last will in full force and virtue; but that the same has been mislaid or lost; but full proof exists of its execution by the said Ann Berwick, and of the contents thereof, and of her speaking of the same as her last will, to the day of her death. And complainants submitted whether under all the circumstances, the said last mentioned will, ought not to be esteemed and set up as the last will of the said Ann Berwick, and the property to be vested accordingly. The bill further charged that John Ash, the son of the testatrix by her first husband, was so well convinced of the due execution of said will, and of the intentions of *his deceased mother, that he executed a deed on the 6th day of August, 1794, declaring his acquiescence therein, and his renunciation of all claims on his mother's estate, as one of her heirs. But that the other defendants, grand children of the testatrix, and who would be entitled to part of said estate in right of their deceased mother, in the event of the said will not being set up, oppose the same, and require proof thereof. The bill prays that the evidence respecting the said last will might be perpetuated; and that the will may be established by the court, directly, or by an issue devisavit vel non, in the usual manner. The bill prays for a subpœna.

*604

The defendants, (who are minors, answering by their guardian,) admit that their grand-mother Ann Berwick made and executed the last will stated in the bill of complaint, in the year 1786, and that afterwards in the year 1790, she executed another writing, which the defendants deny to have been a mere memorandum from which her will was to have been drawn in order to be duly executed, but insist that on the face of it, it bears the strongest proofs of her having intended it to be her last will and testament. They also contend that as the said last mentioned writing (of the year 1790,) contains a clause revoking all former wills, the said former will of 1786 is effectually revoked as to real property; and as the complainants allege no republication of the first will, the operation of the said former will cannot be revived; but as the will or paper of the year 1790, was not attested by three subscribing witnesses, it cannot operate as a devise of real estate. The defendants further say that as far as relates to any other last will and testament which is alleged to have been made by their grand-mother, subsequent to the two former, (in 1786 and 1790,) they are totally ignorant; and being infants they hope the Court will take care of their interests, and will not set up or establish such last will and testament, without the addition of the strongest and most complete testimony; as it would strip them of all share in their grand-mother's estate, to a part of which they conceive themselves to have a just claim as the complainants. The defendants insist their rights cannot be affected by the renunciation and release of John Ash, the half brother of complainant.

The cause coming to a hearing in Chancery, on the 1st July, 1795, and the bill and answer being read, five witnesses were examined viva voce in open court, and their testimony reduced to writing in memoriam rei perpetuam.

Mr. Edward Rutledge testified, that the first will of Mrs. Ann Berwick was drawn and duly executed in May, 1786, which is still in existence. That in pursuance of her directions in writing, he drew another will for her in November, 1790. But the same was not executed. He afterwards drew a third will for Mrs. Berwick, subsequent to the marriage of her daughter Ann Eliza Berwick with Mr. Thomas Legare, in which last will the testatrix devised and bequeathed all her real and personal estates, (after a few pecuniary legacies mentioned in the said will,) to her said daughter for life; to her daughter's husband for life, and to the children of the marriage absolutely; and in case there should be no child, and the husband survived his wife, then to him absolutely. The will was duly executed in the witnesses' office; but he was not a *subscribing witness, being nominated an executor therein, together with Mr. Thomas Jones and Mr. Thomas Legare. He thinks she took the will away with her.

*605

Mr. Keating Simons, jun. proved that he was a subscribing witness with two other persons to a will drawn by Mr. Rutledge and executed by Mrs. Ann Berwick; but he does not recollect the exact time of the execution. He never witnessed but one will executed by her. Mrs. Berwick after the execution of the will took it away with her.

Mr. Thomas Jones proved that Mrs. Berwick on or about the 14th of May, 1794, (on her death bed,) requested the witness, as one of her executors, to pay some small legacies which she had omitted in her will. That the witness requested her to mention her wishes to Mr. Thomas Legare, as he supposed Mr. Legare would have a particular interest in her estate. Mr. Legare was accordingly called in, and she informed him of what she had wished. Thence the witness concluded the will was in favor of Mr. Legare and his wife.

Mr. John Ash proved that Mrs. Berwick, his mother, had informed him, before the marriage of her daughter with Mr. Legare, that she had made a will and left everything to her daughter, the present Mrs. Legare, and after the marriage, she told him she had left everything to her daughter, Mrs. Legare.

Dr. M'Calla proved that Mrs. Berwick told him in the autumn of 1793, that she was going on that day to Mr. Edward Rutledge's to execute her will; and she went from his house, as he supposed, for that purpose. He understood from Mrs. Berwick, that she had given her whole estate to her daughter, Mrs. Legare.

Upon this an issue was directed to be tried at law, devisavit vel non. The jury found the verdict in favor of the will, which was certified up to the Court of Chancery, and the verdict approved, and the will established.

Vide 1 vol. of Bay's Rep. 457. And vide ante 455, 457, 8.

C. C. Pinckney, for complainants.

W. Johnson, for defendants.

REPORTS OF CASES

ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE

COURT OF CHANCERY OF THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA

FROM THE REVOLUTION TO DECEMBER, 1813, INCLUSIVE

IN THREE VOLUMES

BY

HENRY WILLIAM DESAUSSURE

SENIOR JUDGE OF THE COURT OF EQUITY, AND PRESIDING JUDGE OF THE COURT OF APPEALS IN EQUITY IN THE SAID STATE

VOLUME II

Justitia est velle omnibus quod æquum est.
The duties of life are more than life.—Bacon's Works, Vol. VI.

COLUMBIA, (S. C.)
PRINTED BY DANIEL & J. J. FAUST
1817

ANNOTATED EDITION

ST. PAUL
WEST PUBLISHING CO.
1917

District of South-Carolina.

Be it Remembered, that on the twenty-fifth day of April, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, and in the forty-first year of the Independence of the United States of America, the Honorable Henry William Desaussure deposited in this Office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as author and proprietor, in the words following, to wit:

"Reports of Cases, argued and determined in the Court of Chancery of the State of South Carolina, from the Revolution to December, 1813, inclusive, in three volumes, by Henry William Desaussure, senior Judge of the Court of Equity, and presiding Judge in the Court of Appeals in Equity in the said State."

"Justitia est velle omnibus quod æquum est."

"The duties of life are more than life."—Bacon's Works, vol. 6.

In conformity to the act of Congress of the United States, entitled "An act for the encouragement of learning by securing the copies of Maps, Charts and Books to the Authors and Proprietors of such copies during the times therein mentioned;" and also, an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning by securing the copies of Maps, Charts and Books to the Authors and Proprietors of such copies during the times therein mentioned,' and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving and etching historical and other prints."

JAMES JERVEY, Clerk of South-Carolina District.

TO MAJ. GEN. CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY

DEAR SIR,

I avail myself of this opportunity of placing your name at the head of a volume of Reports of Cases, decided in our Court of Chancery. Your acknowledged eminence in the profession, when in the practice, renders this mark of respect highly proper.

But permit me to add a more personal motive. It is a peculiar gratification to me to put on record a memorial that I have long enjoyed your friendship; an honor to which your character gives a value of no ordinary kind.

At your advanced age, and retirement from all public stations, I have only to pray to the Almighty Disposer of events, that the sana mens in corpore sano, which you have possessed in a degree, and to a period beyond the ordinary lot of men, may be long continued to you, for your own comfort, as well as for the delight and instruction of your friends.

Accept the assurances of the perfect respect and esteem of your sincere friend, and obedient servant,

HENRY W. DESAUSSURE.

NAMES OF THE CHANCELLORS

AND OTHER LAW OFFICERS, IN THE TIME COMPREHENDED WITHIN THE PRESENT VOLUME.

CHANCELLORS.

Hugh Rutledge—Elected in February, 1791.
Ædanus Burke—Elected in December, 1799.
William Marshall—Elected in December, 1799.
William Dobein James—Elected in December, 1802, in the place of Ædanus Burke, deceased.
Waddy Thompson—Elected in December, 1805, in the place of William Marshall, deceased.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

John Julius Pringle.

SOLICITORS-GENERAL.

William Dobein James—succeeded by Samuel Wilds; and he was succeeded by James Irvin.
David R. Evans—succeeded by David Johnson.
Charles J. Colcock—succeeded by Robert Stark.
John Taylor, (of Pendleton.)

MASTER IN CHANCERY.

Charleston.—W. H. Gibbes.

REGISTER.

James Ryan.

REGISTERS AND COMMISSIONERS.

Georgetown.—Robert Heriot.
Cheraws.—Josiah J. Evans—succeeded by G. Bruce.
Camden.—B. Bineham.
Orangeburgh.—Samuel P. Jones.
Ninety-Six.—Richard A. Rapley.
Washington.—John Garlington.
Pinckney.—B. Birdsong.

TABLE OF CASES REPORTED

	Page
Alexander v. Muirhead's Ex'rs	162
Anonymous	198
Anonymous	304
Anonymous	333
Askew's Representatives v. Poyas	145
Bague's Ex'x v. Blacklock	602
Brailsford v. Heyward	18
Brailsford v. Heyward	290
Buist v. Adams' Adm'r	214
Butler v. Hamilton	226
Cannon v. Mitchell	320
Carnes v. Smith	299
Cochran v. Cochran	521
Coit v. Owen	456
Combe v. Brazier	431
Cruger v. Heyward	94
Cruger v. Heyward	422
Doughty v. Bacot	546
Drayton v. Drayton, note	250
Duncan v. Fisher	369
Ellis' Ex'rs v. Ellis' Widow	556
Ewing v. Ewing	451
Fenwicke v. Gibbes	629
Foltz v. Pourie	40
Forrest v. Warrington	254
Fraser v. Hamilton	573
Gist v. Cattell's Heirs	53
Givens v. Calder	171
Gregorie v. Duncan	636
Hamilton v. Peace	79
Hart v. Hart's Ex'rs	57
Hattier v. Etinaud	570
Henderson v. Laurens	170
Horry v. Horry	115
Inglis' Ex'r v. Nutt	623
Izard v. Izard's Ex'rs	308
James v. Bremar	560
Jelineau v. Jelineau	45
Karwon v. Lowndes	210
Kennedy v. Gibbes	380
Kerr v. Butler	279
Kerr v. Hill's Ex'r	279
Lining v. Peyton	375
Lloyd v. Cannon's Ex'x	232
McCauly v. McFarlane	239
McDowall v. Peyton	313
Mackie v. Alston	362
Maine v. Dickinson's Adm'r	191
Menude v. Delaire	564
Menude v. Polony's Ex'r	564
O'Driscoll v. Koger	295
Palmer v. Mikell	342
Parker v. Kennedy	37
Peace v. Spierin	460
Peyre v. Ashby's Adm'r	419
Peyre v. Jervey	221
Peyre v. Karwon	419
Picton's Adm'r v. Graham	592
Power v. Lynah	52
Pringle v. McPherson	524
Ramsay v. Brailsford	582
Ramsay v. Deas	233
Read v. Gaillard	552
Read v. Simons' Adm'r	552
Richardson v. Sinkler	127
Richardson's Ex'rs v. Wyatt	471
Rutledge v. Greenwood	389
Shoolbred v. Drayton	246
Shubrick v. Fisher	148
Shubrick v. Guerard	616
Sinkler's Ex'r v. Sinkler's Legatees	127
Skirving v. Neufville	194
Smelie's Ex'r v. Reynolds	66
Smith v. Fisher	275
Smith v. Poyas	65
Somers' Adm'rs v. Smyth	214
State v. Penman	1
Telfair v. Telfair	271
Tunno v. Bethune	285
Tunno v. Trezevant	264
Vaigneur v. Kirk	640
Vermonet v. Delaire	323
Walter v. Radcliffe	577
Webb v. Bellinger	482
Wightman v. Reside	578
Wrigg's Representatives v. Comptroller-General	509
Wright v. Wright	242
Zylstra v. Keith	140

REPORTS OF CASES

ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE

COURT OF CHANCERY OF THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA

2 Desaus. *1

*Case I.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Burke and Marshall.]

THE STATE v. EDWARD PENMAN and Others.†

(May, 1800.)

[Witnesses ⊂⊃99.]

A partner in a company is not an admissible witness to prove that another person is a member, especially where there are written articles.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 371–377; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃99.]

[Principal and Surety ⊂⊃89.]

A defendant denying in his answer that he was a partner in a company, and there being no proof that he was, shall not be presumed to be so from equivocal circumstances, nor shall he be presumed to know that a public agent was loaning public funds, of which there is no proof, and which he denies in his answer. A surety to a bond shall have the benefit of a release fairly obtained, though the bond is afterwards assigned to the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. §§ 133, 133½, 136–139; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃89.]

[Attorney General ⊂⊃6.]

[The attorney general loaned indents, belonging to the state, to a person having no notice of the property of the state in the indents, to be applied to a particular purpose specified in the bond given for the repayment, and afterwards assigned the bond to the state. Held, that a release given to the obligor in the bond, by the attorney general, upon the misapplication of the indents by persons connected with him, was binding upon the state.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney General, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃6.]

[States ⊂⊃124.]

[The attorney general loaned indents belonging to the state to a person having no notice of the property of the state therein to be applied to a purpose specified in the bond given for their repayment, and afterwards assigned the bond to the state. Held, that under the bond the state claimed as assignee only, and not as original obligee.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 123; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃124.]

This was a bill filed by the attorney-general against Edward Penman, to recover the amount of a bond dated 17 February, 1790, executed by Isaac Huger, Thomas Washington, Jacob Weed, Alexander Inglis, Alexander M'Gillivary, William Clay Snipes, and Edward Penman, to Alexander Moultrie, conditioned for the payment of £21310. 4s. 1d. in general indents of this state. The bill charged that at the time this bond was given, Alexander Moultrie was attorney-general, in which capacity he had recovered large sums from the public debtors, which had *been paid to him in indents, and being in default at the close of his office, and having taken the benefit of the insolvent debtors act, he had turned this bond over to the state. It was stated and alleged in the bill, that the indents which he advanced at the time the above bond was signed, were the property of the state. The indents had been sold by col. Moultrie for £2,700. sterling, and £2,500. of the money committed to J. Weed, one of the signers of the bond; who had squandered the money. The bond contained nothing on its face implying that fact, but was conditioned to pay to the said Alex. Moultrie, his executors, administrators or assigns, (like other common bonds) general indents of this state, to the same amount, "and to save him harmless from any alteration in the nature of such indents," with a clause expressing, that "for such indents, Alexander Moultrie was to be accountable to the South-Carolina Yazoo Company at their present rate of value;" and another clause expressing, "that this obligation is given by us in behalf of ourselves, and the rest of the members of the said company." It was admitted on all hands, that those indents were advanced by col. Moultrie, who was a zealous member of the Yazoo Company, to enable them to make a present payment to the state of Georgia, conformable to the terms, and at the period prescribed by their law for issuing to the Yazoo Company, a grant for a large tract of land; which grant it was expected would soon be obtained, and large funds realized by the Company from sales. The principal points on which the case made in the bill was bottomed, were that the defendant was a partner in the Yazoo Company; that he knew that the indents that had been borrowed from col. Moultrie, for the use of that company, were the property of the state; and that col. Moultrie held them only as its officer and trustee; and that the defendant ought to be considered as contracting with the state, when he contracted with its public officer, and should be charged with the trust of which he was so connusant.

*2

† This case was intended to be inserted in the preceding volume, but could not be prepared in time.

On the 28th June, 1790, (about 4 months after the giv*ing of the bond) col. Moultrie executed a deed of release to Edward Penman, "releasing and discharging him from all obligations to him prior to that day, and especially one dated 17th day of February last, for furnishing a sum in indents." On the same day, the said Alexander Moultrie gave a certificate which he signed as director of the Yazoo Company, setting forth, "that the said Edward Penman was not then a member of the company, nor was he at any time interested therein, except only that he had been offered a part of a share, (of about 150,000 acres of land), for some friendly services he was to procure to be done for the Company in London, and which offer Mr. Penman had declined." When col. Moultrie gave these instruments, he observed to the witness, J. Gairdiner, who attested the execution, that Mr. Penman had refused to accept of a large present of land." One object of the bill in this case was to set aside the above release and certificate, as having been unduly and improperly obtained through great solicitations and pathetic appeals to the feelings of a man of an easy nature, and by representing that the public impression of defendants having a connexion in that business, would destroy his credit in England, and ruin himself and family.

*3

The defendant in his answer, denied that he ever was a member of the above Company. He also denied a knowledge that the indents loaned by col. Moultrie, were the property of the state; and he did not admit the fact to be so. That had he known he was incurring any responsibility to the state, he never would have signed the bond. That on the urgent solicitations of all the parties, and col. Moultrie himself, (all of whom represented that it was only a temporary thing, to enable the company to make the cash payment, and get their grant, which would speedily reimburse the sum,) and on the express stipulation by col. Moultrie, that the sum would be so applied, and the grant obtained with the money, and immediately reimbursed from the sales of lands, the defendant was prevailed upon to sign the bond. That his principal inducement to facilitate *their acquisition of the grant was the expectation that some of the company who owed money to himself and friends would be enabled to pay their debts, and particularly Alexander Inglis, who was not only one of the debtors, but also one for whose interest and prosperity the defendant took a friendly concern. But the defendant had no share or agency in the concerns or plans of the company, or the application of the funds so borrowed. The defendant farther insisted in his answer, that as soon as he found that the indents, instead of being faithfully applied to the purchase of the grant, had been sold, and the money confided to J. Weed, who had squandered it, he called on col. M. and demanded to have his name taken from the bond, as the express condition on which he signed it was broken, and that col. M. readily admitted the fact, and requested, that instead of erasing the name of the defendant, which would mutilate the deed and might destroy its effect upon the other parties who were of the company, the defendant would accept of a distinct release, which the defendant agreed to, provided col. M. would give him something to counteract the effect of those words in the bond, which implied his being a partner in the Yazoo Company.

*4

To prove that the defendant was a member of the company, the attorney-general relied on the before cited clauses of the bond. He also produced evidence from the records to shew that col. Moultrie was overwhelmed by judgments and mortgages, and that his affairs were so greatly embarrassed at that time as necessarily to suggest the fact that so large a sum in general indents in his hands, must have been the property of the state, and held by col. M. as such, of which the defendant could not but be sensible. The attorney general also produced long lists of judgments and executions against the other parties named in the bond, with returns of nulla bona, to prove their insolvency. And the attorney-general also offered to call col. Moultrie himself, as a witness to prove that the defendant was a partner in the company.

*5

and the circumstan*ces under which the indents were loaned, and also the occasion and inducements for his giving the release and certificate before mentioned.

The court, on argument over ruled this species of testimony, on the ground that there was a written charter of association signed by the parties thereto, which was the highest evidence; and col. M.'s evidence was refused on the additional ground that he was directly interested, to fix the liability of the defendant, who being the only solvent party in this bond, was the only source from whence reimbursement can be obtained, and col. M. shielded from being hereafter sued for those indents by the state. For although he also had before this time taken the benefit of the insolvent debtors act, the state was not then a suing creditor, nor had they taken any dividend under the assignment; and therefore were not barred from suing him after a year and a day.

The defendant laid before the court a printed pamphlet, published by the Yazoo Company, which contained proof that the company was constituted under a deed of association, and the individual names subscribed thereto; and having given notice to produce it, now called for the said deed. The deed was produced, and the name of "Thomas Washington for Edward Penman," subscribed thereto by Thomas Washington. †† The defendant having proved that he was in England at the date of this signature, and no authority for Washington or Welsh to sign defendant's name being produced, he called James Gairdiner as a witness, who proved that he was the sole and lawful attorney of the defendant while he was absent, and the power was produced. That he knew nothing of the transaction, and did not give to Washington, alias Welsh, or any other person, authority or instruction to put defendant's name to the Yazoo associa*tion. Defendant further proved that he arrived from England about the close of January, 1790; that on the 28th February following, Washington, alias Welsh, having arrived from Savannah, (being a director of the company) wrote a letter to the defendant, which was produced, inquiring if it was true, as he had heard, that he (the defendant) had resolved to decline the offer of being a member of the company; that the company was to meet that evening, and he wished Mr. Penman's answer, that he might let the company know it. On the reverse of this letter, was a copy of the answer, of the same date, in the most unqualified manner, disavowing all connexion with the company.

*6

It was contended by Mr. Pringle, the attorney general, on behalf of the state, that although by the form in which this bond was taken, and has been transferred to the state, she appears to hold as assignee, and stand in a derivative capacity, yet that the circumstances that are developed entitle her to claim in an original right; and if so, that no acts subsequent to the signing of this bond can prejudice her claim. That the office of attorney general conferred no power to release the just and lawful claims of the state by matter in pais; and therefore that col. Moultrie's release, (he being then attorney general) though under his seal, and might bind him individually, provided it were properly obtained, could not bar the right of the state.—That it is now admitted on all hands that the large sum of public indents which col. M. advanced on the security of this bond, was the property of the state, paid into the hands of their attorney by the public debtors, and ought to have been cancelled in the treasury as obligations paid off by the state. For although these obligations of the state were a species of circulating medium, yet they carried in them, inherently, the quality of all obligations, that their obligatory force would be destroyed upon being paid off by the obligor. That to issue them again into circulation, and give them the second time an efficacy against the state, by *the officer or agent who was intrusted with the possession of them as instruments equitably cancelled, was a breach of trust, and all parties engaged therein must be affected thereby.

*7

As to the defendant's knowledge that the indents which col. M. offered to advance were the property of the state whose officer he was, it is inferrable from all the circumstances. col. M. was before and at that time in most embarrassed circumstances, greatly pressed by his creditors, whose multiplied suits, judgments and executions against him were public and notorious.

In these circumstances it was impossible to suppose that he had then in his own right so large a command of effective funds; and they being of that species which were usually payable for dues to the state, in whose behalf he was the suing officer; the conclusion was obvious and unavoidable, that they were the property of the state. This was also more than implied by the circumstances of taking this bond and the terms used in it. Abundant security was to be taken by col. M. not for paying the indents over to any of the obligors, but for his "becoming accountable to the Yazoo Company for the indents at their present rate of value"—that is, he was to convert indents that were then in his hands to the use of the company, and the penalty of the bond was stated in indents specifically, and the condition of the bond was not only to repay the precise sum in indents, with no reservation of intermediate interest, but "to save him harmless from any alteration in the nature of such indents." To what could this clause allude, but to the idea that these indents were quasi cancelled and withdrawn by the state from circulation, and now about to be re-issued? That their negotiable nature had ceased in fact—but were now about to be altered in that respect, and to commence a new course of negotiability? There is nothing in the case that furnishes any other construction to this clause of the bond. The importunity by which the defendant states in his answer, he was prevailed upon to sign the bond, and that too by col. Moultrie himself, in a *case too in which his own interests as a principal member of the company were to be advanced, proves that his personal indemnity was the prominent condition on which only he could be induced to depart from the official obligations of duty, and violate the trust under which he held those indents.

*8

†† This was a noted speculator, who had impudently assumed the above name while in Georgia; his real name was Welsh. He came to this state in 1790, where he exercised his pernicious talents for a time, and in the year 1791, was executed for forging the state indents. Vide, 1 Bay's Reports [1 Am. Dec. 601]. The State v. Washington.

If the defendant did not therefore know by direct formal information the concern the state had in these indents, the fact was sufficiently manifest to put him on enquiry—and there are many cases in this court to shew that to be sufficient to affect the party, and be equivalent to notice of a trust. As to the grounds on which the defendant afterwards sought to be discharged from the obligatory effect of the bond, they were not well founded. It is true that Col. M. intrusted them to an agent, who instead of applying them to the uses of the company, sold them and squandered the money. But supposing that agent not to have been one agreed upon by all the parties, and employed to use the fund for the purpose of obtaining the grant (which is highly presumable from all circumstances) yet the stipulation by col. M. in the bond was, that he was to be accountable, not to the defendant, but to the "South-Carolina Yazoo Company." To that company he was still accountable, and the defendant, in common with the other signers of the bond, had the remedy. The release therefore was demanded on fallacious grounds; and it was yielded to the intreaties of the defendant improperly and ought not to stand—more especially too as the release operates in law as effectually to discharge the other co-obligors as though the name of the defendant had been erased as he required. So that the reason given for substituting the release was equally fallacious. It ought therefore to be regarded as a collusive instrument to defeat a responsibility already incurred to the state, the consideration of which was past and gone —beyond the possibility of recall. As to the defendant's not being a member of the Yazoo Company, he cannot be permitted to aver against his own deed which expressly says,

*9

"this obligation is given by us *in behalf of ourselves and the rest of the members of the said company." This was a strong affirmation that all the signers then were members—and each is estopped to deny it. The defendant might be a dormant partner, and it might suit his purposes and views to remain such, and therefore his not subscribing the association or articles of partnership was not repugnant to such a connexion: a person who is interested in a concern for profit and loss, according to a well known rule of law, is equally chargeable as a partner, with those who do formally subscribe the articles of partnership. And the certificate of Col. M. an insolvent partner, surely ought not to be set up against the creditors of the concern, after the responsibility has once attached. Authorities cited. 2 Foubl. 155. 2 Vern. 271. 1 Atk. 490. Amb. 313. 2 P. Wms. 414.

Mr. Ford defendant's counsel stated that he would in the first place review the transactions between the parties, as they appear of themselves unconnected with extraneous circumstances. 2d. State what is necessary to be made out in order to connect them with the state, and produce a responsibility to her. 3d. Examine how the facts and the law so necessary, have been made out and proved.

Here we have a simple bond given to Alexander Moultrie, dated 17th February, 1790, in the penal sum of £21310. in indents payable on demand: conditioned to pay to the said A. M. his executors, administrators, or assigns, general indents of this state to the like amount; and save him harmless from any alteration in the nature of such indents —with a clause expressing that for such indents, "the said A. M. was to be accountable to the South Carolina Yazoo Company at their present rate of value;" and another clause, "that this obligation is given by us on behalf of ourselves and the rest of the members of the said company." This instrument purports on its face to be a mere private transaction; and by its terms implies nothing more than the plain matter expressed—intimating no interests except those of the parties. The attorney general has erected an ingenious construction on the clause of in*demnity to col. Moultrie, "to save him harmless from any alteration in the nature of the indents." But a more obvious construction, and doubtless the true one, will be found in the fluctuating value of that species of paper. This is well known —and from this circumstance indents were as much a subject of speculation as any other commodity in the market. Col. M. advanced them "at the present rate of value" —if when they came to be repaid him, they should have fallen from that value, he would have been a loser had not this clause been provided to make good the difference. The release given 28th June, 1790, sealed by A. Moultrie to the defendant, imports also to be a private transaction between individuals, no less than the bond.—We see neither the attorney general nor the state in the one or the other: and as to the certificate that is given, it is subscribed expressly "as director of the Yazoo Company." The release is expressed on its face to be for consideration. The bill states that this release was given in consequence of great importunity and pathetic representation—but it does not charge fraud. That this release and certificate were so obtained, is however not admitted in the answer, nor proved by the state, and therefore forms no feature of the case. Yet were it even true, mere importunity is not sufficient to set aside a deed if attended with no fraud no circumvention. If the facts alleged in the answer were true, that the very condition of the whole transaction was that the grant should be obtained with the indents, there was on the part of Col. M. a moral obligation, upon that purpose being frustrated, to give the release—most probably it would have been decreed in this court—and therefore importunity and pathetic representations were just and proper. And as to the certificate of the defendant's not being a member of the company, we have no need of its aid—for it is charged in the bill and denied in the answer, and by the rules of this court that denial stands good and conclusive, until it shall be encountered at least by the testimony of one positive credible witness, and his attestation fortified by strong corroborating circum*stances. 1 Vern. 161. 2 Atk. 19, 140. 3 Atk. 649.—The state has not produced even one witness—the attorney general has rested on circumstances only. But surely the door was not open for the proof by circumstances, until the effect of the defendant's answer on oath was neutralized by the oath of one credible witness. This is stumbling at the threshold. Yet if the circumstances apart from the answer be considered, they preponderate in favor of the defendant. It is proved that the company was formed by a written instrument to which the names of the members were subscribed. This was the highest evidence of who constituted the company—and being called for was produced. It is true the name of the defendant was found at the bottom of the instrument; but instead of proving him to be a party, the very history of that signature proved that he was not a party. It was officiously placed there by Washington (or Welsh) who we have proved had no authority; and whose correspondence with the defendant at an after period, in effect admitted fully that he had no authority. This signature, and the great pains taken by that same person, and by all the other parties, to get the defendant's name signed to this bond, with the insidious clause attached at the end of it, "for ourselves and the rest of the members of the Yazoo Company," savours rather of a desire to obtain by an indirect means what they had failed to accomplish by the consent of the defendant. The words used by Col. M. to the witness when he executed the certificate, "Mr. Penman refuses to accept of a large present of land"—shews that their obtaining his association in their plans, had been a matter of trial and experiment. As to those words of the bond, they ought to be restrained to those signers who are confessedly members of the company. As the bond was not made for the purpose of specifying who were members, that clause is to be regarded as res inter alios acta. 1 P. Wms. 683. And an ancient maxim saith, "if many join in one act, the law saith it is the act of him who could best do it." Noy Max. p. 33. Thus the answer, which by the rules of *this court was entitled to stand conclusive, instead of being encountered, is strongly confirmed by all the attendant circumstances. And so stands the question as between the original parties. And this brings us to consider secondly, what is necessary to be made out, in order to connect these transactions with the state, & induce a responsibility to her. The attorney general, with his usual discrimination, has seen the danger of predicating the claim of the state upon the footing of an assignment of the bond by Col. Moultrie, knowing that by all the established rules, the bond would pass to the state, charged with all the original equity. For an assignment of a bond "is an agreement, only that the assignee shall have all the fair and equitable benefit that the assignor was himself entitled to." 1 P. W. 498. 1 Vern. 240, 348, 475. 2 Vern. 499, 588. 2 Ves. 375. 1 Bro. C. R. 543. The bill therefore seeks to place the state in an original relation, either by an actual or constructive privity. It is charged that the indents which were the subject of the contract, were the property of the state—that they were known to be so by the defendant—that they were advanced for the benefit of the Yazoo Company—that the defendant was a member of it—that these indents being subject to a trust in the hands of Col. M. the defendant is affected by actual or constructive notice, and therefore a trust results to the state. If these points have been made out, the liability of the defendant must follow—but it is necessary they should be made out by confession, or by proof. And this leads to the consideration, Thirdly, how far these grounds are made out.

*10

*11

*12

That the indents did in fact belong to the state, has been assumed—but is neither confessed in the answer nor proven. No witness has sworn it—no document has established it. Individual persuasion has been adopted for legal proof—but for the sake of experiment, let that fact be assumed. The next point is, that the indents were advanced for the benefit of the company. This is an indispensible link, because the very bond given to col. Moultrie ex*pressly makes him a trustee for so applying the indents. Therefore, if he diverted or allowed them to be otherwise applied, or used them, the very substratum of the contract would fail, even at law, and far less would equity set up and enforce it. But it is in proof that Col. Moultrie did not so apply the indents, but they were sold and the money squandered—and so this ground would fail. But if this point should be conceded or surmounted, the next point, "that the defendant did know that the indents belonged to the state, remains to be considered. And were we still to overlook the defect of proof, in regard to the principal fact, that they did so belong—what proof have we that the defendant knew it at the time? There is no proof, and it is denied in the answer; and if more were needed, even probability is against it—for if Col. M. was in fact committing a gross breach of trust, in converting & disposing of the public funds in his hands, he must have felt the strongest inducements to conceal it from every body; and there was no circumstance attending this transaction, prompting the disclosure of such a fact. Then the law of this court, before adduced to another point, is conclusive on this. But it is argued that because Col. M. was much in debt, and pressed by his creditors, the defendant ought to have presumed that the indents could not be his own. This ground is very broad indeed, and would go to convict any one of a legal indiscretion, who carried on dealings with a man who was in debt. It goes farther—it imposes an obligation to make an offensive scrutiny into the funds of a man in debt, to ascertain whether the monies in his hands were truly his own, to guard one against becoming constructively a confederate in a breach of trust. It is said the circumstances of col. M. were sufficient to put the defendant on enquiry. From whom else could he have enquired, but from col. M. himself? And the answer he would have given, (had not the indecorum of the enquiry prevented any answer at all) is sufficiently manifest from what the bond itself implies. He proffered them as his own indents—disposed of them *as his own—and took bond, payable to himself, his executors, administrators and assigns. Then the answer denies knowledge of the fact, if it existed, (which is not proved) and the enquiry of the defendant, if the court could exact from men a precaution so extraordinary, would have conducted to the same result. Indents were a species of circulating medium, payable to bearer. They passed from hand to hand like cash; and like money, having no ear mark, it was equally impossible to distinguish the owner from the possessor. The authorities cited and urged for the complainant, have therefore no application, "as where a party will take a thing, knowing of a use or trust, he shall be construed a trustee, for then he is particeps criminis et dolus and fraus nemini patrocinantur," cited from 2 Fonb. 155; and 2 Vern. 271. Also, "that constructive notice shall be held sufficient, for whatever is sufficient, to put a party upon enquiry, is good notice in equity." 1 Atk. 490. Ambl. 313. And that where a purchase is made with trust money by a trustee, and the conveyance taken to himself, a trust will result. 2 P. W. 414. All these authorities, good and true in themselves, fail of application here, for want of the facts on which they arise. The defendant was no trustee—had no notice actual or constructive, of this being a trust fund, and was not particeps criminis of any fraud on the state; and having already been shewn to be no member of the company, and being released from this bond by the obligor, before it was assigned or transferred, he is on no ground whatever liable to the state. The bill therefore ought to be dismissed.

*13

*14

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the Decree of the Court.

This is altogether a bill of discovery. There is no fraud charged on defendants. The allegations of the bill are intended to draw from defendants a discovery whether they are not associated in the company called the Yazoo Company; whether they did not apply to Mr. Moultrie to loan them a sum of money in indents, and *did not know at the time of obtaining them that they were the property of the state, and could not be lent to them by him as his private property; but merely as the agent or trustee of the state, and that the bond they gave, was to secure the re-payment of them to the state. The defendant Penman in his answer explicitly denies that he was ever associated with that company; nor did he know that Moultrie had judgments in his hands, belonging to the state; nor did he apply to him to loan them. That no explanation was ever made by Moultrie, & defendant supposed they were his own, as he offered to loan them, and took the obligation in his own name, and to his own use. That had he known they belonged to the state, he would not have signed the bond. The proposed loan came from M. and so far from defendant's seeking it, great pains were taken by Moultrie and other defendants, to get his name to the bond. That he never signed the association; and some short time after he returned from Europe, finding his name had been set down by Washington, alias Welch, he immediately applied to him to know by what authority he had done it, and insisted on its being erased. He then assigns his reasons for signing the bond to Moultrie, and that it was on the express conditions declared at the time to the obligee and the others, and acceded to by them, that the grant should be immediately obtained with the indents so loaned, and that he signed on that condition only; and if the grant was not obtained, he would not be bound. That when they failed, he applied to Moultrie to be released agreeably to his stipulations, who refused to take his name from the bond, in as much as the others were still liable, but gave him a release, and also a certificate, declaring defendant was not, nor had he ever been associated with them in the company. Counsel for complainant, to prove Penman a member of the Yazoo Company, produced the bond above referred to, which in the concluding part, declared that the obligation was given by them in behalf of themselves, and the rest of the members of the company. A list of judgments against Moultrie, the *obligee, and mortgages to a considerable amount, were also produced; whence an inference was drawn, that Penman could not but have known Moultrie's embarrassed situation, and that it was not in Moultrie's power to have furnished them with indents to so large an amount out of his own funds. And to prove by circumstantial evidence, that Penman was the person who principally induced the loan, a list of judgments was also produced against Huger and Snipes, two of the co-obligors. Opposed to this evidence, is the defendant's answer, pointedly denying his ever being associated with the company, corroborated by the deed of association, signed in 1789, when defendant was in England; signed indeed by Washington on his behalf, but without any authority; as Mr. J. Gairdiner, who was sworn, declared he was the only attorney of defendant, authorized to act for him. Next, Washington's letter to Penman, in March, 1790, requests to know if it was true that he had refused being a member; with Penman's answer, declining it. Then the certificate of the obligee in the bond, and director of the company, declaring Penman was not, nor had he ever been a member of the company, together with the release, under hand and seal of the obligee, at a very early period after the bond was signed.

*15

*16

It was objected to the release, that it was provisional; that the other obligors should still be bound, or it was not to have effect. The release does not purport any thing of the kind; it is absolute, and the obligee must have known it would have the effect to release them all. As to the idea that the release was to be kept secret, and the co-obligors made responsible, it was absurd, because, if the bond was ever put in suit, defendant Penman, must have been sued with the others, & his pleading the release, would be an effectual bar to a recovery against them all. It was known at the time the bond was given up, and stated in the bill, that the release existed. The state took the bond from the obligee subject to that release, and would not allow it in Moultrie's account, as a payment; but held it merely as a *collateral security, which plainly shews they did not consider it as a bond taken by him for their use. Nor indeed has it been attempted to be proved, that the indents loaned were the property of the state. There is a provision in the bond, specifying that for such indents to be paid, the obligee should be accountable to the company. There is no proof before the Court, that he ever accounted for them to the company. On the contrary, it was proved that he sold some of them, and gave others to one of the obligors, who dissipated them. If defendant received nothing, and the company for whose use they were loaned never received them from obligee, (and if they had, it is presumed that might have been proved,) the bond was given without consideration, and the obligee might have fairly released it.

*17

It is a maxim in this Court, that he who would have equity must do equity. It is hard that the state should suffer so great a loss by the improvident conduct of one of its confidential officers; it would be still harder, that the defendant should make good that loss, when it is evident that he did not contribute to it, or even received a single farthing of the money; and the obligee, who induced him to sign the bond, was so conscious of his innocence, that he gave him the release and certificate before mentioned. It were to be wished that the rules of evidence had permitted the obligee to be examined; it is very probable the defendant's case would have appeared in a still more favorable light. But we can judge of it only from what appears to us. Upon the whole, the answer of defendant on oath, positively denying the allegations in the bill, supoprted by the variety of testimony above mentioned, cannot but make so strong an impression on the mind, as to leave no doubt, that he ought, in this Court to have the full benefit of the release pleaded, and therefore the bill should be dismissed.

Pringle for the complainant. Ford for the defendant.

---

2 Desaus. *18

*Case II.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Burke and Marshall.]

WILLIAM BRAILSFORD and MARIA, His Wife, Devisee and Legatee of Daniel Heyward, Deceased, v. THOMAS HEYWARD, Executor of Daniel Heyward, Deceased.

(November, 1800.)

[Wills ⇐684.]

The testator devised certain real and personal estates to trustees, to hold to the use of his wife during her life, and at her death, to the youngest child of testator, who should attain 21 years of age. The wife died, and also the two youngest children, under 21 years of age. The next child, having attained 21, claimed the estates, and the intermediate rents and profits. The court decreed that she was entitled to the rents and profits (which alone were in contest) against the claims of the heir at law, and of the residuary devisees and legatees.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Gage v. Rogers, 1 Strob. Eq. 374; Drayton v. Rose, 7 Rich. Eq. 339, 64 Am. Dec. 731.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1615; Dec. Dig. ⇐684.]

[This case is also cited in Hinson v. Pickett, 2 Hill, Eq. 354, on question of rehearing.]

The complainant's bill states, that Daniel Heyward, being seized and possessed of a considerable real and personal estate, duly made his will, dated 7th June, 1776, and thereby devised to his son Thomas, and in trust for the testator's wife, (in lieu of dower) during life, his plantation called Rose Hill, together with all the slaves, stock, and plantation utensils thereto belonging, and at her death, he gave the same to his youngest child that should attain the age of 21 years, and his or her lawful issue. That said plantation, slaves, &c. were, by virtue of said will, in the possession of said widow, until her death in the spring of 1788.

Testator also devised and bequeathed to his wife, for life, his house and lot in Charleston, with furniture, servants, &c. and at her death, to his next youngest child, who should attain 21 years of age, and to the lawful issue.

That testator also bequeathed as follows, "I will to my sons Thomas and William, in trust for the use of my daughter Elizabeth, during her natural life, the following lands, slaves, stock, &c. thereon, and appurtenances thereunto belonging; and at her death, I give the land to the male heir of her body lawfully begotten, when he *shall attain to the age of 21 years, and for want of such, to the eldest female that shall attain to that age, or her lawful issue, if she should leave such before she attains that age, and the slaves, &c. to be divided between the heirs as above mentioned; and in case of no such heirs, then I give the land and slaves to my youngest child that shall attain to the age of 21 years, viz:—my plantation or tract of land, on Portroyal Island, containing 526 acres; two tracts of land, originally granted to John Linder, near O'Ketty creek—one containing 450, and the other 150 acres—one negro lad Scipio, the carpenter, and one girl Eliza."

*19

The testator also devised the remainder of his estate, real and personal, to his sons James and Nathaniel, to be divided between them. And he also gave his executors full power to act, do with, and dispose of the yearly product of his estate, for the benefit of his heirs, mentioned in his will.

That the testator died some time about the 11th of Oct. 1777, leaving said will in force, (except as the same is altered by two codicils, neither of which relate to the said devises); and did nominate his sons Thomas, Daniel, and William, and Mr. Keating Simons, as executors.—That Thomas and William only qualified.

That defendant Thomas Heyward, took upon himself the execution of said will, and possessed himself of all the testator's estate, and particularly that part given to his daughter Elizabeth, and also after the death of the widow, of that given to her for life.

That said Elizabeth Heyward died some time in the year 1780, without issue, and never having attained 21.

That Benjamin, the youngest child of said testator, also died some time in Sept. 1796, under 21, and without issue. That by the death of said Elizabeth and Benjamin, complainant Maria, (being the youngest child, who has attained 21) is entitled to said Rose-Hill plantation, slaves, &c. and to the plantations, stock, slaves, &c. left to *said Elizabeth, and to the crops, profits, and emoluments, since they came in possession of defendant.

*20

That at the death of testator, there were on Portroyal plantation, besides cattle, hogs, and sheep, 53 negroes, named in the bill, as appears by the inventory. On Rose-Hill plantation, there were also at the death of testator, exclusive of cattle, hogs, and sheep, forty-one negroes also named, as appears by the inventory.

Complainant William saith, that he hath married the complainant Maria, whereby in right of his wife, he became entitled to said devised property.

That complainants applied to defendant for an account of the crops, profits, and emoluments arising from the cultivation of said plantations, and from the labor of the slaves, and for an account of the application thereof, and for payment of the balance, and for an assignment of such part as consists in securities.

The bill charges that complainants are entitled to said crops. That said crops never belonged to said Benjamin, and could not be spent for his use, as he never arrived at the age of 21, and the estate could not therefore vest in him. That the fund arising from the Callewashie plantation, specifically devised to said Benjamin, was the proper one for his support.

That the accounts of the funds claimed, ought to have been kept separate from the property of said Benjamin, as they were the property of complainant Maria, or of her brothers, as Benjamin could not have been the devisee contemplated, not being in existence when the will was made; but even if the negroes have worked together, it cannot be difficult to ascertain the relative proportions. The bill further charges that considerable crops have been made on these estates, to which complainants are entitled, and for which the defendant ought to account.

That though defendant in a letter of the 24th December, 1796, admitted the right of complainants to the estates in question, he has since refused to give them possession.

*21

*The bill charges, that defendant has never rendered any account in the ordinary's office, though by law he is bound to do it annually.

That on Cole's Island, belonging to the estate of said testator, there were about thirty negroes: that neither Cole's Island nor the negroes thereon, are mentioned in said will, nor do complainants know to whom they belonged. That for some particular reasons, said land and negroes were conveyed in trust, and were in case of Benjamin's death, to be divided among the testator's children; but whether among the whole, or among part only, complainants cannot say. That defendant has, since the death of Benjamin and James Heyward, divided said land and negroes among the children of his brother William Heyward, deceased, Nathaniel Heyward, and himself, and utterly excluded complainants.

The bill charges, that complainants are entitled to an equal proportion of said land and negroes.

The bill prays that defendant may account for all the crops which have been made on Portroyal plantation, as also on Cole's Island, since testator's death, and for all the crops on Rose-Hill place, since the death of the widow.

That he may pay interest on the monies (arising from such crops and labor) which have come to his hands, or received for his use, and that he may pay complainants what shall appear to be due.

That he may discover under what trust Cole's Island, and the negroes thereon were held, and produce the trust deed; and should complainants be entitled to any part thereof, that he may be directed to put the same in their possession.

That complainants may be let into possession of the real estate, negroes and personal property, which they (in right of complainant Maria, as the youngest child, who has arrived at 21) are entitled to ——— and for general relief.

The defendant, in his answer, admitted that his father Mr. Daniel Heyward, made, and duly executed the will *set forth in part by the complainants, and departed this life, leaving the same in full force, except so far as the same was modified by a codicil, executed afterwards, wherein and whereby he provides for a child, with whom his wife was then pregnant, who was born after the execution of the said codicil, and being a son, was named Benjamin. After the birth of Benjamin, the testator added another codicil to his will, by which he devised the Callewashie estate to Benjamin, and his heirs, but if he died under age, &c. it was devised over to testator's grand-son, Daniel Heyward.

*22

The defendant admits, that at the death of the testator, in the year 1777, Elizabeth and Benjamin were his two youngest children, and that Elizabeth died in the year 1780, under age, unmarried, and without issue. That the widow of the testator died in 1788, and Benjamin died in the month of September, 1796, under age, unmarried, and without issue, and that the complainants thereupon became entitled under the will of the testator, to the Rose Hill and Portroyal estates; the complainant, Maria, being the youngest child of the testator, who had attained 21 years of age.

The defendant denies the right of the complainants to the crops and emoluments of those estates, till the death of Benjamin, the youngest child, in the year 1796. For as he answered the description of the youngest child, he had the best right to them, until his death.

The defendant states, that with respect to Cole's Island, it was devised by the testator, in the codicil to his will, to his son Daniel. But he also executed a deed, conveying Cole's Island to trustees, in trust for testator's son Benjamin, in case he lived; but if he died, the same should go according to the codicil. The defendant submits that upon the death of Benjamin, under age, and without issue, the deed was cancelled, and that Cole's Island went according to the directions of the codicil, to the said Daniel. But he being dead, without issue, before the abolition of the rights of primogeniture, Cole's Island became the pro*perty of his two brothers, of the whole blood, William and the defendant Thomas. But that if the deed should be considered valid and operative, the property would be divisible among Benjamin's legal representatives.

*23

The defendant requests of the court that the complainant William Brailsford may be required to make a settlement of the estates of Rose Hill and Portroyal, on his wife Maria and her children.

The testator devised to his sons James and Nathaniel, the remainder of his estate, real and personal, to be divided between them. And he gave his executors, "full power to act, do with, and dispose of the yearly product of his estate, for the benefit of his heirs abovementioned."

Mr. Parker and Mr. Gaillard argued for the complainants.

The right of the complainants to the property is not questioned. The answer admits their right. But the intermediate profits, from the death of the testator to the death of the son Benjamin, under age, when the estates vested in the complainant Maria, are denied to belong to the complainants.

It is admitted that this depends upon the intention of the testator, and that if that intention is not clear, to pass the profits, they must go to the residuary devisees and legatees, or to the heir at law. But the intention is clear in this case, that the intermediate profits should go to the person who should ultimately answer the description of the youngest child who should attain 21 years of age, and be thus entitled to the estate itself.

It is manifest that the testator meant to dispose of his whole estate, for he says, "as to all my worldly estate," I give, &c. See Cowper, 356. The devise is to trustees for his wife; and at her death, to the youngest child, who should attain 21 years. This is a contingent remainder, in the hands of the trustees, of a trust estate, co-extensive with the objects of the devise. The devise to the executors in trust does not contain words of inheritance to them. But as it was to support an inheritable estate, it must be *co-extensive, to answer the purposes of the creation of the trust. The trust goes with the estate, however worded, till the contingency happened, on which it was to determine. The court would even add words to make the trust co-extensive with the estate. A trust may be in fee without the word heirs, or other words of inheritance. See 2 Stra. 798. 3 Burr. 1684. Even if a trustee be not named, the heir would be made a trustee by the court, to give effect to the intention.

*24

But if it were not so, there was such a devise to the executors, as gave them at least a life estate; and the executor, Thomas Heyward, surviving the contingency, kept up the trust, till the estate vested in Maria Heyward, on the happening of the contingency. That this was a contingent remainder is clear. See Fearne on remain. p. 3, 5th edition. See also, p. 230, 4th edition. The rule is, that the devise cannot be construed to be an executory devise, if it can take effect, as a contingent remainder. See Fonb. 97. In this case the free-hold having vested in the trustee, it has taken effect as a contingent remainder.

The youth of the children, intended to be provided for, seems to have required that the trustee should take the legal estate for life, or until the contingency happened, when the estate was to vest.

The estate did not vest in the son and devisee, Benjamin; for when the remainder is limited to a person not ascertained, it cannot vest. See Fearne 458, 5th edition, and 467, 9. The estate was contingent, till it should be ascertained whether Benjamin should attain 21 years of age. He did not attain it, and the estate never vested in him.

The whole interest was transferred to the trustee, for the benefit of the person who should be entitled to take the estate. The produce therefore must follow it.

If the profits be not given to the youngest child, who attained 21 years, the will of the testator will be defeated; for they were the peculiar objects of the concern of the *testator in the devises under consideration. The residuary devisees and legatees were not at all in view. They were abundantly provided for in the will, and the residuary clause in their favor, was to carry any small undisposed parts of testator's estate, but not such a very large portion of the estate as this.

*25

The last clause in the testator's will authorising the executors to dispose of the profits of the estate for the benefit of the devisees, shews the intent, that the intermediate profits should be improved for the benefit of the devisees, ultimately entitled to take under the will. The hæredes facti, were intended to be benefited, and not the heir at law, or the residuary devisees and legatees. It is true there is no express devise of the profits to them; but that is not necessary. If used, it would have been only evidence of intention to give, and when the intention can be collected without express words of bequest, it will take effect. It was so determined in the case of John Drayton and others, vs. the executors of Drayton, decided in this court; † in which the intention of the testator was collected from circumstances, and did not require words of gift. So in Smith and Motte v. Smith and others, determined in this court.

There is a difference between the real and personal estate, and complainants will be entitled, at all events to the profits at least of the personal estate, in case it be decided, that there was no disposition of them by the will. See 3 P. Wm's. 300 note, Studholme v. Hodson.

Mr. Desaussure and Mr. Ward, for the defendant:

It is agreed that the intention of the testator must prevail; but it is to be collected from the expressions on the face of the will, or from the circumstances at the time of making the will; not from subsequent events. It is also agreed, that where an estate is given, and a charge is made on it, the court will presume an intention to give a fee to the devisee so charged, though there be no direct and express words giving a fee.

*26

*But there is no appearance of intention in the will under consideration, to give the intermediate rents and profits to the complainant Maria. Examine all the clauses, and no such intent is discernible.

It has been labored to shew that the court will enlarge the trust estate, to support the remainders. Allow this, but it does not decide any thing on the point now discussing; for it does not follow that the court will enlarge the estate to be supported.

As to supplying defective words and provisions, the court will be cautious of exercising such a high act of power. The defect must be apparent, and the intention plain. See 2 Bla. Rep. 1159. 3 Burr. 1626.

If the testator did not provide for the disposition of the rents and profits, on the death of the youngest child, before attaining 21 years of age, this court will not presume an intent and supply the defect, without clear evidence of such intent. Now there is no such evidence in this case; the court will therefore permit the profits to go where the law would carry them, to the residuary legatees, or to the heir at law.

† See 1st Vol. of the Reports in Chancery in S. Carolina [Desaus.], p. 324, 325.

On the death of the testator's widow, to whom the estate in question was given for life, there was no person entitled to take the estate—none of the younger children had attained 21 years of age—the estate then could not vest.—Could the profits then pass? Certainly not.

When did Mrs. Brailsford's right to the estate accrue and vest? On her becoming the youngest child (by the death of others,) and on her attaining 21 years of age. Until the estate vested in her, she had no right to the rents and profits.

If implication be resorted to, in whose favor would the court raise it. Surely in favor of the youngest child Benjamin, who had the potentia propinqua, and not of Mrs. Brailsford, who had, only potentia remotissima—for she was the third youngest child at the death of testator; and richly provided for by direct devises to her. She has by accident become the youngest child, who has attained 21 *years of age; and in that character takes most of the estates devised to Elizabeth and Benjamin. Shall she also have a presumed intention, a voluntary implication raised for her, to give her the intermediate rents and profits, and place her above all the children? It would not be reasonable to do so.

*27

Benjamin lived to nearly the age of 21 years. He surely, whilst he answered the description of youngest child, was better entitled to the rents and profits than Mrs. Brailsford. It was necessary for his subsistence and education—for though he had another estate devised to him, that also was limited over; and the remainder man claims the rents and profits of that estate also: so that Benjamin might have perished in the midst of abundance.

It has been contended that this is a case of contingent remainder; but we insist that it is an executory devise.—It comes precisely within the definition of an executory devise. The particular estate on which it was grafted was determined by the death of the widow, before the youngest child attained 21 years; consequently before the estate could vest—there was nothing to support the remainder—it must be considered an executory devise; and if not vested, what could give a right to the rents and profits to the ultimate devisee.

It was argued that the clause in the will, directing the executors to make use of the rents and profits for the benefit of the heirs mentioned in the will, furnishes evidence of the testator's intention, that the rents should accumulate in this instance, for the benefit of the ultimate devisees. But the clause will not support this exposition. It is simply a power to the executors to improve the income of the estate, for the benefit of those respectively interested, according to their several interests. It is nothing more.

We must then enquire how the law disposes of the rents and profits, not disposed of by the testator, of an estate which is contingent, and cannot vest for many years. And it is insisted that the rents and profits so undis-posed *of, descend to the heir at law. See 1 Vesey, senr. 268, 9. Hopkins v. Hopkins. 1 Atk. 598. 2 P. Wms. 471, Papillon v. Voice. Cases Temp. Talbot, 44, 51. In the case of Bullock v. Stones, 2 Vesey, senr. 521, 2, it was decided that where there was a devise of real and personal estate, to the first son of A. when he shall attain 21 years of age, this was a good executory devise of the real estate; but that the mesne profits descend to the heir at law—the profits of the personal estate accumulate. See also the cases of Carrick v. Errington, 2 P. Wms. 361, 2, 3, 4. Also Carter v. Barnardistone, 1 P. Wms. 505. Harris v. Barns, 4 Burr, 2157. Gore v. Gore, 2 P. Wms. 28. Heyward v. Stillingfleet, 1 Atk. 422.

*28

Where there is even a preceding estate limited, with an executory devise over of the real estates, the intermediate profits (between the determination of the first estate, and the vesting of the limitation over) will go to the heir at law, if not otherwise disposed of. Fearne on devises, 434, 512. 1 Atk. 581.

Where a testator devised his real and personal estate to trustees, and willed that the first son of A. should have the estate when he attained 21 years, and his heirs; and that he should be well educated: A. had no son at testator's death. Lord Chancellor Hardwicke decided that the intermediate rents and profits of the real estate, belonged to the testator's heir at law; but that the heir's interest would determine on the birth of A.'s son; because the education of that son was to be paid for out of the rents. Fearne on devises, 435, 513.

It is obvious then, that if the provision for the application of the rents to the special purpose of education, which amounted to a disposal of them, had not been made, the mesne profits would have gone to the heir. There is no such disposition of them in the case under discussion.

These cases go very strongly to shew that the mesne profits of real estate, go in such cases to the heir at law, or residuary devisee. But it was contended that the rule was different as to the personal estate, the interest of which *would accumulate for the benefit of the person ultimately entitled. There is doubtless a distinction in general cases—but the personal estate is so blended with the real in this case; the negro slaves are so essential to the productiveness of the real estate, that it is impossible to separate them; and the whole mesne profits must go, according to the rule as to real estate. But in fact, the residuary clause in the will under consideration, puts an end to all these difficulties—for that clause carries with it all the property, real and personal of the testator, not otherwise well disposed of. See Fearne 515, 516, 517. Cases Temp. Talbot, 228, 145. 1 Vesey, senr. 485, 490, 1. 2 Vesey, senr. 122, 3.

*29

It seems quite settled that the interest of a contingent legacy, between the death of tenant for life, and the contingency happening, falls into the residuum, and goes to the residuary devisees and legatees. See 2 P. Wms. 330, 489; also, 2 Atk. 473, Green v. Ekins. 3 Bro. C. C. 58, Wyndham v. Wyndham; 4 Bro. C. C. 144, 152, Shaw v. Cunliffe; 3 Atk. 101, Heath v. Perry.

With respect to the settlement, which the defendant, the brother of Mrs. Brailsford, requires to be made, there can be no doubt that the court will order it to be made. It is the course of the court, whenever a wife becomes entitled to new property, to require a new settlement, in whole or in part, according to the circumstances. And there is no reason for departing from that course in this case. See 2 P. Wms. 202, 639; 1 Fonbl. 88; 3 P. Wms. 12; 1 Vesey, senr. 558; 2 Atk. 420; 3 Atk. 20.

In ex parte Higham, 2 Vesey, 579, Lord Chancellor Hardwicke refused to order the whole of the wife's property to be paid to the husband, though she was in court and desired it. So in cases Temp. Talb. 43; though there are some cases to the contrary, see 2 Atk. 67.

One of the reasons given for the courts of law not exercising jurisdiction over legacies is, because they have not power to compel settlements as the Court of Chancery can. 5, Term. Rep. 690, Deeks v. Strutt.

*30

*Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the Court.

The case before us is upon the construction of the following clauses in the will of the testator, D. Heyward, who was the father both of Mrs. Brailsford, the complainant, and the defendant.

"I will to my son Thomas, and my brother-in-law, J. Gignilliat, in trust for my wife during her natural life, in lieu of her dower, the use of my house and lot in Charleston, with all the furniture, &c. belonging, to the same; my house wenches, Rose and Precilla, &c. my plantation or tract of land, called Sandy Hill, containing 764 acres, together with all the slaves, stock and plantation utensils, thereto belonging; and at her death, I give the plantation, with the negroes, stock, &c. thereon, to my youngest child, that shall attain to the age of 21 years, and his or her heirs for ever; and my house and lot, slaves, &c. to the next youngest child, that shall attain to that age; and in case my youngest children die before they attain that age, if they should leave lawful issue, they shall inherit; also one mulatto carpenter boy, named Will; and the above legacy to be clear of any incumbrance of my debts."

"I will to my sons, T. & W. in trust for the use of my daughter Eliza, during her natural life, the following lands, slaves, stock, &c. (described in the will,) and appurtenances thereto belonging; and at her death, I give the land to the male heirs of her body, &c. and in case of no such heirs, then I give the lands and slaves to my youngest child, that shall attain to the age of 21 years."

The testator died some time after making his will, leaving five children in minority, viz. James, Nathaniel, the complainant Maria, Elizabeth and Benjamin.

This widow died in 1788, Elizabeth died soon after him, (the testator) under age, and without issue. Benjamin is also dead under age, and without issue, whereby the plantation, negroes, &c. devised to testator's wife, for life, and the estate devised to Elizabeth, became the property of the complainant Maria, by the devise thereof in *the above recited clauses, she being the youngest child who has attained the age of 21 years.

*31

For complainant, it was contended, that by virtue of the trust estate given to the defendant in the first instance for the life of the first taker, the estate limited to the child who should first take, should be construed a contingent remainder, and the trustee considered as holding the estate, together with the rents and profits, for the benefit of such child, until the estate vested: but that admitting such limitation not to be a contingent remainder, but an executory devise, yet the complainant was entitled to the profits, it being evidently the intent of the testator, and might be collected from the will, that they should accumulate for the benefit of the devisee, in whom the estate should ultimately vest. On the other hand, it was insisted for defendant that this was an executory devise. That the trustee had only an estate for the life of the first takers; and upon their deaths (if it were not for the residuary clause) the profits of the real estate would descend to the heirs at law, until the contingency happened, and the profits of the personal estate would accumulate and be an undisposed part of the estate, to be divided according to the statute. But that by virtue of the residuary clause, the residuary legatees must take the whole, it being therein given to them. In support of this doctrine, a number of cases were cited by defendant's counsel, which were not controverted; but in reply, it was insisted, that the intent of the testator must prevail.

To whom the profits of the estate belong, since the death of testator's widow and his daughter Elizabeth, is the single question to be considered.—With regard to the defendant, it is of little consequence; his interest is no way concerned in the determination; for if they do not belong to the complainant, they will go to the residuary devisees and legatees, Nathaniel and James Heyward.

The governing rule of construction in the case of wills, is the intent of the testator; and that intent must be *collected from the whole will, ex visceribus testamenti, so as to leave the mind quite satisfied about what the testator meant; and to construe conformably thereto, so far as it is possible, consistent with the rules of law. When sentences are doubtful or ambiguous the exposition must be made according to the testator's intent, which lord Coke calls the pole star, to guide judges in their determinations. In some cases equity will construe a will against express words, to make it take effect according to testator's intent; and will reject inconsistent or contradictory words. How far a devisee or legatee, who is not entitled immediately to the estate, or thing devised, shall have the profits or interest in the mean time, depends upon particular circumstances. Lord Hardwicke observes, most of them depend on the particular penning of wills; and hardly one case can be cited as a precedent for another. But if it be the case of a child to whom the testator gives the estate, the court will be astute to find out the testator's intent, to give it effect.

*32

This being premised, we shall proceed to consider the will of the testator. To shew that he meant to dispose of all his estate, he begins with declaring, that as to such worldly goods as God had been pleased to put in his hands, &c. &c. he gave, devised and bequeathed to certain trustees for his wife's life, and to other trustees for Elizabeth's life, the estate in question; and at their deaths, (if Elizabeth should die under age, and without issue) the lands, slaves, &c. to his youngest child, that should attain the age of 21 years. The testator having amply provided for all his children in his will, but particularly his sons, and his two youngest children, who were the complainant, Maria and daughter Eliza, (for Benjamin was not then in esse) they appear, by the clauses under consideration, to have been the peculiar objects of his care, and to have been principally in his view; although by the singular manner of wording the first clause, Nathaniel has become entitled to the house and lot, &c.; and it is more than probable, testator did not contemplate that either James or Natha*niel would take any share of the estate devised in these clauses; for, after having made a disposition of a very large fortune among his children, lest he may have omitted something, which was not improbable, he inserts the clause, giving to his sons James and Nathaniel, the remainder of his estate, real and personal, to be divided between them. The profits of the estate, which he had specifically devised, could not be considered as any part of the residue; for that can only apply to such estates as he had at the time of making his will, and were not therein particularly disposed of. The whole property, lands, negroes, &c. being blended and united together, and given to the respective devisees under certain limitations, the profits as naturally follow and belong to such devisees as the shadow follows the substance. If however there remained on the mind a scintilla of doubt respecting the testator's intent, the last clause would remove it completely; for where he appoints his executors, whom he also nominates guardians of his children, he gives them full power to act, do with and dispose of the yearly produce of his estate, as they should think proper for the benefit of his heirs above mentioned. To effect the testator's intentions, the word heirs must be construed children; for in the legal sense of the word, a man's eldest son is his heir, and it is evident he could not mean him; neither could he mean his residuary legatees, because they were not his heirs. The heirs then to whom he refers, can be no other than his children, the devisees respectively named in his will, for whose respective benefit, the produce of the estate he had given to each of them should be appropriated. Suppose the son Benjamin had lived to the age of 21 years, would it be contended that he would not have been entitled to the profits of these estates, which are now in dispute? Surely not. Nothing is more evident, that the defendant did not view the question formerly in the light it is now contended, than the circumstance of his giving up the house and lot, &c. to complainant and his wife, on the death of testator's widow; judging as he did very naturally and justly, that she having *an interest, although at that time contingent, would be in equity entitled to receive the profits, when the estate should vest. In most of the cases cited the testator disposed of a part of the profits of the estates devised, particularly in Hopkins's case. In the case before us, the testator is silent, as to the profits, but has devised the lands, slaves, &c. in general terms, which according to lord Coke's notion of an &c. would be sufficient to convey every thing; and in the present case, we are of opinion, even without the aid of the last clause, would warrant the court in decreeing the profits of the estate to complainants. But that is so full, comprehensive and explicit, that we cannot hesitate to decree, and it is hereby ordered and decreed, that the defendant do account for the profits of the estates devised in the will from the death of the respective devisees, Mrs. Heyward and the testator's daughter Elizabeth.

*33

*34

A petition was afterwards presented to the court for a re-hearing, and the same being granted, a re-hearing took place, and the cause was again fully argued. Chancellor RUTLEDGE afterwards delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The defendant having applied for a re-hearing on the point respecting the right of complainants to call upon him for an account of the profits of the estate, to which they became entitled on the death of Benjamin Heyward, (son of the testator,) or that if held accountable, he might be allowed all advances made by him for Benjamin, over and above the income of Calleswashee, (which was the estate devised absolutely to Benjamin,) to be deducted out of the income of the other estates; that point not having been particularly urged at the former hearing; the court thought it reasonable and equitable to grant such re-hearing, (notwithstanding the decree to account,) in order to give the defendant an opportunity of making as full a defence on that point, as on those his counsel had made on the other questions in the cause. A re-hearing has accordingly been had, and the ingenuity of counsel has been *exhausted, to evince that Benjamin was entitled to the income of those estates, from the death of the respective devisees, or at any rate to so much as was necessary for his maintenance over and above the income of the estate, specifically devised to him. In support of their arguments, a variety of cases were adduced, which though very good law, were not applicable to the present case, because they were either cases of vested legacies, or where parents had given legacies to children, payable at 21, without making provision for their maintenance in the meantime. There is indeed one case, that of Bourne and Tynte,† where the whole interest of the legacy was given the legatee, though not a vested legacy. In that case, however, it was a bequest by the father for an unborn child, and he directed that £80. part of the interest should be paid to his wife, for the education of such child. The lord chancellor allowed the whole interest, and declared that it was never the intent of the testator that the defendant should have any benefit of the legacy, if a child should be born; which had happened. In most of the cases which have been determined here, provision was made by the court for the education and maintenance of the legatees, out of the estates devised to them; because the parents had not the means of supporting and educating them suitable to the estate they would be entitled to. In the case of Woodberry, the father was altogether unable to do it. In the present case, the testator, it is true, has made no particular provision for the maintenance of any of his children: he has, however, made specific devises to each of them; out of the profits of which, he certainly intended they should be maintained. The very estate now in contest, being particularly devised to his wife and daughter during life, and that to the daughter and to her issue afterwards, shews most manifestly that he did not contemplate that the child or children, who might thereafter become entitled to the estate, on the devise over taking effect, should be maintained out of those funds, because it was altogether uncertain when the persons to whom the estates were immediately *devised, would die. To be sure, if there had been no provision at all made for Benjamin, and if he had been left destitute, the court on the death of the first devisees would have made a hard shift as the book expresses it, to make provision for him, and do what the father was bound to do, and ought to have done, which was to provide necessaries for him: and therefore would have allowed somewhat out of the said estate for his maintenance. But because the court in such a case might have exercised their discretion, rather than that the child should have wanted bread, we do not think this case would warrant the exercise of such discretion, because the provision made for Benjamin by testator, (we must presume) he thought fully sufficient at that time; and could only have intended the devise of the estates in question, as an additional bounty to the youngest child, whomsoever it might be that arrived to the age of 21, in the event of the death of the first devisees, (the latter of them without issue.) Upon the whole, we are of opinion, that the decree is correct as it now stands. It will undoubtedly be a very hard case, if the defendant should eventually be injured; and it is a misfortune which the court may lament, but have it not in their power to redress; not being warranted therein by precedents; and there being no intention of the testator expressed in his will, sufficiently apparent to authorize the court to decree either the profits, or a maintenance to Benjamin out of these estates. As to the question whether Benjamin had not an absolute estate in the negroes specifically bequeathed, and therefore, (as was suggested by complainant's counsel,) defendant might be made whole out of that property, we give no opinion, it having been mentioned that a suit is now depending in this court on that subject.

*35

*36

Holmes and Parker, for complainants.
Desaussure and Ford, for defendant.

The defendant afterwards accounted with the complainants conformably to the decree of the court before the master.

† See 1 P. Wm's 786.

*37

*The principal question before the master was, as to the allowance of interest on the annual balances in the hands of the executor, which the master reported to be due. Exception was taken to this part of the report, but was overruled.

---

2 Desaus. 37

Case III.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Burke and Marshall.]

GEORGE PARKER v. JAMES KENNEDY.

(May, 1801.)

[Discovery ⟸22.]

The defendant denying by his answer the allegations of the bill, which was filed for a discovery, and the answer not being contradicted sufficiently distinctly, or positively, by evidence and by circumstances, the bill was dismissed with costs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Discovery, Cent. Dig. § 33; Dec. Dig. ⟸22.]

The bill charged that the defendant assigned and delivered to the complainant by a blank endorsement, a bond executed by Benjamin Singleton, and dated the 12th Dec. 1786, conditioned to pay £486. with interest, at a discount of 50 per cent.; that the consideration was 212,500, bricks which he has delivered.

That the complainant took the bond on the express terms that Kennedy should guarantee the payment of the bond, which he promised to do. That at that time it was the general opinion of the counsel at the bar that a blank endorsement of a bond, imported a guarantee of the debt. That the complainant instituted a suit on the bond, against the obligor, and obtained judgment and issued execution; on which the sheriff made a return of nulla bona, Singleton being insolvent.

That the complainant then sued Kennedy on the endorsement, and the jury decided under the direction of the court, that a blank endorsement on a bond does not import a guarantee of the debt, and found a verdict for the defendant Kennedy. (On motion for a new trial, the then chief justice John Rutledge, and the justices Burke and Grimke thought the verdict right, and refused to grant a new *trial. The justices Waties and Bay, were of a different opinion. See 1 Bay's reports, p. 398.)

*38

That Kennedy is suing the complainant at law on another bond, for the sum of £236. and is urging the same to judgment.

The bill prays for a discovery, whether the defendant Kennedy did not agree at the time of the assignment of Singleton's bond, in blank, to guarantee the payment of the bond to the complainant, and whether he did not in consequence thereof retain some funds of Singleton, (arising from the sale of lands) to secure himself. The bill also prays relief by having the guarantee established, and to have the amount discounted against the bond of complainant put in suit by Kennedy at law.

The defendant in his answer admitted that he assigned the bond of Singleton to the complainant, in blank, at 50 per cent. discount, as stated in the bill. But he denies positively that he agreed to guarantee the bond; on the contrary that he refused to do so; and he denies that he retained any funds of Singleton's in his hands to secure himself, but avers that he has paid them all over to those who are entitled to them. The defendant relies on the verdict and judgment at law, on the question of the guarantee; and he admits that he has sued the complainant on another bond, and intends to recover the money due thereon.

At the hearing of the cause, Mr. Lance gave evidence, that Mr. Kennedy, (to whom he applied on the part of Mr. Parker, on the subject of the Singleton's bond, after the insolvency of Singleton,) informed him he had funds in his hands to secure himself.

John Parker corroborated this testimony.

The cause was fully argued, and Chancellor RUTLEDGE afterwards delivered the decree of court.

The intent of this bill is to oblige the defendant to discover whether he did not at the time of transferring Singleton's bond to the complainant, agree to guarantee it? *And whether in consequence of such agreement, he has not retained in his hands the purchase money of a plantation which was sold on Singleton's account? And having done so, that he should be considered in the light of a trustee for complainant, and be obliged to account with him for the said bonds.

*39

The defendant in his answer positively swears that he never agreed to guarantee the bond, nor did he ever consider himself responsible on failure of the obligor, to pay it. He also denies that he has not accounted for the net sales of the plantation, and avers that he has paid the same to those who were entitled to receive it; nor had he ever any idea of retaining the money to indemnify him against the said Singleton's bond.

In an action at law which was brought by complainant against defendant to recover the money from him as guarantee of the bond, by virtue of a blank endorsement, Singleton having failed to pay it, and become insolvent, the court determined on solemn argument, that a blank indorsement on a bond, did not make the indorser responsible on failure of the obligor, to pay the money. As that question did not decide the particular merits of complainant's claim, to wit, the agreement to guarantee, he should have brought the action of assumpsit against defendant, in order to bring the whole merits before a jury, the question being properly triable at law. He has thought fit however rather to bring this suit, in order to search the conscience of the defendant. In doing so, he has got a most positive and unequivocal answer denying both the guarantee and the retaining the purchase money of the plantation. It was attempted to be proved that the defendant had acknowledged funds of Singleton in his hands, and that he had said he purchased the plantation to secure himself for this particular debt; but the proof by no means came up to it. It amounted to no more substantially, than that he had first purchased to secure himself for his engagements against Singleton's debts, and it is no proof on the part of defendant, that he has paid several debts on Singleton's account. *It may be a hard case on the complainant, but instances of this kind have occurred, and will happen again, so long as persons are so extremely incautious in making their contracts. It appears to have been a speculation altogether on the part of complainant, for he got the bond from defendant, at a discount of fifty per cent. If Singleton had been solvent, (and he was not known to be otherwise at that time) complainant would have received the whole debt, and been very well contented. This court does not assess damages; it is the peculiar province of a jury.—Complainant might, and ought to have brought his action to have had his damages assessed. He did not. He has slept upon his rights, and if eventually he suffers by it, the inconvenience will have been occasioned altogether by his own laches. The court sees no propriety in directing an issue, because the complainant may, if he pleases, bring his action without the sanction of the court. Ordered therefore, that the injunction be dissolved, and the bill be dismissed with costs.

*40

---

2 Desaus. 40

Case IV.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Burke and Marshall.]

FOLTZ v. POURIE & DAWSON.

(June, 1801.)

[Discovery ⟸5; Partnership ⟸286.]

One copartner cannot bind the concern, by giving notes in the copartnership's name, after the dissolution of the partnership. On a trial at law on such notes, the verdict was in favor of the defendant.—The holder of the notes then filed a bill to discover whether the notes had not been given by one partner, with the knowledge or consent of the other partner. The answer denying the charge, and there being no proofs against the answer, the bill must be dismissed with costs.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Fisher's Ex'rs v. Representatives of Tucker, 1 McCord, Eq. 173; Heckheimer v. Allen, 89 S. C. 454, 71 S. E. 1033.

For other cases, see Discovery, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. ⟸5; Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 647; Dec. Dig. ⟸286.]

[Judgment ⟸405.]

[A court of equity will not grant a new trial in an action of law, when it does not appear that any motion for a new trial was made, and no excuse for such neglect is shown.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 767; Dec. Dig. ⟸405.]

Mr. Foltz had brought a suit at law, on certain notes of hand, given by Mr. Pourie, in the name of the commercial house of Pourie & Dawson. Mr. Dawson resisted the payment, on the ground that these notes were given by *Mr. Pourie for his own private purposes, and subsequent to the dissolution of the copartnership.

*41

On a trial at law, the jury found a verdict for the defendants.

Mr. Foltz then filed his bill in this court, to compel a discovery, whether the notes were not given by Pourie in the regular course of the transactions of Pourie & Dawson, or with the privity of Dawson. The defendant Dawson denied any knowledge or privity in the transaction, or that the notes were given in the regular course of the commercial affairs of Pourie & Dawson. The case came to a hearing, and some evidence was given, which was referred to, and noticed in the decree.

The cause was fully argued, and Chancellor RUTLEDGE afterwards delivered the decree of the court:

This suit is brought for the purpose of obtaining a discovery from the defendant Dawson, of the following charges: Whether he did not know or was not privy to Pourie's giving the two first notes in the bill mentioned, during the partnership? Whether the two notes last mentioned, with the partnership signature, were not drawn by Pourie, after its dissolution with Dawson's privity; and whether they were not renewals of the first notes, and antedated? And whether there was not a mistake in the dates? The bill states that these facts were only in the knowledge of the parties interested in the transaction, and particularly of the defendant Dawson; but could not be made to appear on the trial at law; otherwise the jury would have found a verdict for the plaintiff instead of defendant. (The bill prayed a discovery and relief.) The defendant in his answer positively denies being in any manner privy to, or having any knowledge of the first note having been given by Pourie, till after the dissolution of the partnership: and with respect to the two last mentioned renewals, he is equally ignorant of the transaction, as they were given after the dissolution of the partnership, without his knowledge or consent, and without his being consulted. Cantor acknowledged to Huger, that the de*fendant Dawson knew nothing of the renewal, and corroborates the answer.

*42

This case has been very fully discussed, but it lies in a small compass: the single question is, whether any new light has been thrown upon the subject by Dawson's answer, which should induce the court to order a new trial, under an idea that another jury would give a different verdict.

The defendant Dawson, has sworn so fully and pointedly, with respect to his want of knowledge, or being in any manner privy to this transaction, from first to last, as to leave no doubt on the mind about the business. He has placed the conduct of the parties in a stronger and more unfavorable point of view, than it could possibly have appeared in the trial at law.

The whole of this transaction is extremely mysterious, and attended with many suspicious, if not absolutely fraudulent circumstances. One very strong one that we shall notice is, the charge in bill, that complainant was possessed of the original notes, and in January, 1797, delivered one to Cantor for collection; that being unpaid on the 15th of February, they were protested. It must be remembered that at this time the partnership was dissolved.—From defendant Dawson's answer, it appears that the complainant had then other notes in his possession of Pourie and Dawson's; that he applied to the defendant Dawson for payment or renewal of those, and never said any thing to him about the notes in question, although defendant Dawson had previously given public notice in the Gazette of the dissolution of the partnership, and that he alone was authorized to settle the debts of the company. During this time, Cantor is the ostensible owner of the first notes, and has them protested. He afterwards colleagues with Pourie to renew them, (the partnership being dissolved) in their name, notwithstanding the notice in the Gazette, without applying to Dawson. When the two notes became due, they were protested. An action is then brought in his name, and on the trial, a verdict is given in favor of *the defendant. From the protests, it appears that the different applications, by the notary for payment, were all made to Pourie. After the verdict, notice is given of a motion intended to be made for a new trial, which, however, was never brought forward, although it is stated in the bill that the opinion of the judge who tried the case, was in his favor. From February, 1797, when the first notes became due, till August, 1800, Cantor appears to be the owner of the notes, and complainant's name is never mentioned. Eighteen months after the verdict, and several months after the death of Huger, who was a material witness for defendant, then for the first time, complainant comes forward, files this bill, and claims these notes as his property. If they really and bona fide belonged to complainant, and he had actually paid a good and valuable consideration for them previous to their being dishonored, why did he not then come forth and bring the action in his own name. Cantor, the broker, could have been a witness for him; but that it seems was not convenient, for on his examination, his deceptive conduct with Pourie, in receiving the notes after the dissolution of the partnership, antedating them, and extending the time of payment, without any consideration, would all have come out in evidence, if he had declared the whole truth, (which it must be presumed he would have done,) and he would have been condemned from his own mouth. The truth was, however, partially disclosed from the testimony of Mr. H. so far as relates to the defendant Dawson's ignorance of the renewal of the notes on which he was sued; and it is more than probable, that the clandestine surreptitious conduct of Pourie and Cantor, which was laid open by H.'s evidence, was the cause of the jury finding the verdict they did.

*43

The law is clear that every partner is bound by the acts of the other, if it be in the course of trade, and during the existence of the partnership, but not after; and as a note drawn or endorsed by the defendant Dawson, in the name of the partnership after its dissolution, though for a partnership debt, and although he was authorized to settle all *the debts, would not have been binding on Pourie, to make him liable for payment, a fortiori, a note renewed by Pourie after dissolution of the partnership in their name, when he had nothing to do with the concerns of it, ought not to make defendant liable. Cantor's conduct in this business, was extremely reprehensible; Pourie's most unwarrantable from first to last: we lay his answer entirely aside; for if noticed at all, we should be obliged to animadvert on it in the severest terms. By reason of the intimate connexion that subsists between partners, and for the sake of commerce, the acts of one partner shall bind the rest; therefore the conduct of Pourie cannot, strictly speaking, be construed a fraud; yet, in a moral point of view, it savours very strongly of one, and Cantor's conduct is materially implicated in it. In such cases, the court will be extremely cautious of affording relief, when the party applying does not make out a very clear case. This case, as far as we can discover, has been fairly and impartially tried at law, before a jury who were fully competent to decide upon and judge of all its circumstances: they have done so, and given a verdict in favor of the defendant. The complainant, or his agent, if he was so, (by whose acts he must be bound,) let slip his opportunity of applying for a new trial, notwithstanding he had given notice of an intended motion for that purpose, and has assigned no reason for not making it. It is very seldom, and must be under very special circumstances, that this court will interpose, and order a new trial, when the party has neglected the opportunity of applying for it in the court below. Upon a full and attentive review of the case, and consideration of the answer of the defendant Dawson, we do not see sufficient grounds from the circumstances shewn on the part of the complainant to direct a new trial, or to entertain the suit, and therefore it is ordered and decreed that the bill be dismissed with costs.

*44

---

2 Desaus. *45

*Case V.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Burke and Marshall.]

ELIZABETH F. JELINEAU per Prochein Amie v. FRANCIS JELINEAU.

(June, 1801.)

[Husband and Wife ⟸283.]

The Court interfered to protect and relieve a wife who was ill used, degraded and insulted by her husband; altho' he had not absolutely beaten her, nor forced her out of his house; she having retired to avoid a repetition of ill usage; and altho' the husband made an offer to receive her back again, to avoid maintaining her separately, and to elude the justice of the court.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Anonymous, 4 Desaus. 100; Rhame v. Rhame, 1 McCord, Eq. 206, 16 Am. Dec. 597; Hair v. Hair, 10 Rich. Eq. 172; Wise v. Wise, 60 S. C. 431, 38 S. E. 794.

For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 1064; Dec. Dig. ⟸283.]

[Husband and Wife ⟸298.]

She shall have relief and maintenance according to the fortune of the husband. Referred to the master to enquire and report his circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 1093; Dec. Dig. ⟸298.]

This was a bill filed by the complainant against her husband, charging that he had used her extremely ill, and praying for alimony to be allowed her out of his estate, for the maintenance of herself and child.

The bill stated that the complainant, (a lady from St. Domingo) intermarried in the month of February, 1800, with Francis Jelineau, (also from St. Domingo,) and for some months lived with him in peace and harmony, but soon after his conduct became changed, and her life made wretched, by his ill treatment. That he cohabited with his own slave, by whom he had a mulatto child, on whom he lavished his affection; whilst he daily insulted the complainant, and encouraged his slave to do the same. That her said husband told her she should quit his house, and his conduct compelled her to do so; and she took refuge with a friend, at whose house she has become the mother of an unfortunate child, to whom the means of subsistence have been denied by his unnatural parent. That since the birth of her infant, she has written to her husband, and applied to him through her friends, but their applications have been unavailing. Her husband has repeatedly declared that she should never have a shilling of his money; and in fact has not contributed one farthing to the support of herself or his child, since his *conduct drove her from his house; though he is worth 7 or eight thousand (7 or 8,000) dollars. That he has sold his property in Coosawhatchie, and is about to depart the state, and to leave her and her infant unprovided, and totally destitute—the bill prays for relief.

*46

The answer of the defendant admitted his marriage with the complainant, but denies that he has used her ill, or in any way to justify her separating herself from him. The answer states, that she owes her unhappiness to her own conduct; and that if she had behaved towards him in a decent and dutiful manner, she might have continued to live happily with him. The defendant states that at the time he was about to marry the complainant, he informed her that he had a mulatto child, born to him in St. Domingo, (where he stated, it was not disgraceful to have such connexions,) for whom he cherished an affection, and meant to provide; and the complainant promised to behave kindly to said child.

That when the defendant married the complainant, she passed under the name of the widow of Mr. La Barthe, by whom she had a son, about eight years of age; but he has since been informed that he was the son of a Mr. La Fon. But she had lost a daughter some time before her marriage with complainant, whom he has since learnt was the child of Mr. La Barthe. That the defendant hath since learned that the complainant never was married to Mr. La Barthe, but had imposed herself upon him as the widow of that person; which she has in fact since acknowledged to him. That the complainant soon after the marriage, forgot her promises, and used his mulatto child so ill as to distress and wound his feelings, and oblige him to complain to her of her conduct; which only encreased her severe treatment to his child, as well as to her mother, and also her abuse and ridicule of the defendant.

That the complainant took some sugar out of the store, to send to her sister, contrary to the directions of the defendant, who told her he could not maintain two families. Whereupon he told her if she repeated this conduct, he *would turn her away. She retorted with insult and abuse, and declared that all she wanted was that he would turn her away. That the defendant being greatly irritated, took advice from counsel, who informed him that he could not separate himself from her without maintaining her, on which he resolved to make the best of a bad bargain, and not to furnish her, by his conduct, with a pretence of a separation which she desired; but he offered her a sum of money if she would voluntarily separate from him, by deeds duly executed; which she did not accept, but treated him with scorn and contempt, and shut herself up in her chamber a fortnight, inaccessible to him, and inattentive to him, though very sick and debilitated.

*47

That the complainant at length quitted the defendant's house of her own accord, taking with her some of his property, and endeavouring to slander his character among his neighbours.

That defendant never struck complainant, or threatened to do so, though she insulted him almost beyond the bounds of human patience, when he reproached her with her former licentious life, and imposition on him.

Defendant denies that he insulted complainant or permitted the negro slave to do so; and he denies that he desired the complainant to quit his house, or obliged her to do so by his ill usage of her.

The defendant admits that the complainant has had a child born since she left his house; but that from the date of its birth, and the opinion of medical men, he has good reason to doubt its legitimacy, as the said child was born only 8 months & 4 days after the marriage took effect.

The defendant admits that the complainant wrote to him a short time before she filed her bill of complaint; but her letter contained so many false charges, that he took no notice of it—and when her solicitor John Bee Holmes, Esq., applied to him on her behalf for a maintenance, he answered that it was impossible for him to maintain her apart from him; but that his doors were open, and that if she would return and behave properly to him, he would *do so to her. Defendant denies that he declared she should never have any of his money, except in resentment of her declaration, that she married him only for his money. But he admits that he has not supplied her with any thing since her departure, she having helped herself when she quitted his house. Defendant denies that he has sold his property, or has any settled determination to leave the state, though he has some thoughts of returning to France in a year or two.

*48

Defendant denies that he is worth more than about $3,000, which is insufficient to enable him to maintain complainant separate from himself.

The defendant submits to the court, "That under the above circumstances, he is not bound to provide for her a separate maintenance, though it would be more to his happiness to do so, if he had the ability, than to receive her back. Neither does he think he is bound to receive her again; but should the court think it proper that he should receive and maintain her at his house, he is ready to do so, and to treat her with the same respect that she shall treat him."

The cause came to a hearing in June, 1801, and it was proved that the defendant Jelineau had treated the complainant with great indignity and impropriety, and had degraded her in his language and deportment, below his slave, the mother of his Mulatto child. But there was no proof of his having struck her, or actually turned her out of doors, though he had threatened the last. She left the house, after repeated ill usage and degradation.

There was no proof on the part of defendant, of the charges made in his answer against the complainant.

Dr. Fronty proved that her child was an eight months child.

This case was ably argued by Mr. Holmes for the complainant, and by Mr. Parker and Mr. Pringle for the defendant. But no notes of the arguments have been preserved. The minutes taken by Chancellor Marshall refer to 1st Fonb. 96, and to the case of Oxenden

*49

v. Oxen*den, reported in 2 Vern. 493, and the important cases connected with it. (See Nichols and Danvers v. John Danvers and others, 2d Vern. 671, and Williams v. Callon, 2 Vern. 752.)

The case of Head v. Head, 3 Atk. 547, appears to have been cited and relied upon by the defendant's counsel, to shew that the court could not give relief in such a case as this. The remarks of Chancellor MARSHALL, (in his own hand writing, on his brief,) are important. He says, "the principle of this case, (Head v. Head,) is an extraordinary one. It compels the wife however, reluctantly, and notwithstanding the most barbarous and inhuman treatment on the part of the husband, to go back to him, merely because he makes an offer in court to take her back. This is called enforcing the marital rights. I observe through the whole current of cases on this head, that the Court of Chancery in England touches this business of alimony and maintenance, with a delicate hand. They leave it to the ecclesiastical courts. Here we have no such institution, and must take it on ourselves."

Chancellor BURKE made the following remarks, (in his hand writing on the same brief,) on the case. "His (the defendant's) invitation to her to return and submit herself to new insults from his mulatto mistress, she as a woman of sense, must feel as a further indignity. His answer tells us that this mistress forms the source of the whole difference: yet not a word about removing this cause. Had he made this offer, she should make an experiment."

The Court took time to consider, and afterwards Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court.

It has been strongly contended by the counsel for the defendant, that this Court has not by its constitution a power of decreeing a separate maintenance for a woman although she has been ever so harshly treated by her husband, unless a divorce has been previously obtained, or there be an express or implied agreement on their separa*tion, for that purpose; and this doctrine is attempted to be supported by the cases cited from the English law books.

*50

It may be very good law in that country, because there ecclesiastical courts have competent jurisdiction to grant divorces, a mensa et thoro: but in this country, at least in this state, there is no such court; those cases therefore are by no means applicable to our local situation. Hard indeed would be the lot of the fair sex, if they alone were to be excluded from the protection of the laws in this country, and if from the fear of infringing on the marital rights of the husband, the wife must be obliged to submit to all his brutal treatment, without any redress whatsoever. If there were no precedents of the interference of the court of equity in cases of this sort, we must make them, rather than so wanton an abuse of power by a husband over his wife, should escape with impunity.

On examining the law establishing this court, we find it has all the powers granted it, incident to a Court of Chancery; and its jurisdiction is not in any measure restricted, except in cases where the party can have complete and adequate remedy at law.

The cases however of Huger v. Huger, and Wilson v. Wilson [1 Desaus. 219], which have been determined in this court, have established precedents for us to follow. It is true, the separate maintenance in those cases was a provision out of the estate, that belonged to the wife; but it can by no means be inferred from thence, that if they had not had such estate, they would not have been provided for out of the estate of the husband. The complainant made out her case by testimony, so as to entitle her to the attention of this court. That she was extremely ill used, though not beaten by her husband, we need only refer to the testimony of Mrs. P——, who though the sister of complainant, (and may very naturally be supposed to have considerable resentment against the defendant,) delivered her evidence with a calmness and composure, that carried with it the greatest appearance of truth. She said that he *had refused to send away the negro woman slave, who was the bone of contention between them. That at dinner one day, he took away the plate from complainant when she was going to help herself to something to eat, and said, when he and the negro had dined she might. He grudged her the bread she ate, and said grass was good enough for her; that he was going to a magistrate to get a divorce, and would buy a horse whip, and whip her well, before she went away. The complainant's letter to him, which was given in evidence, shews a sincere desire to be again reconciled, and to return home to him. How did he treat it? He has sworn in his answer to her bill, that it was unworthy of an answer. He has also in his answer lavished his abuse on her in the most unqualified and scandalous manner. His charge of the child, which she bore him, being illegitimate, appears to be as unfounded as it is cruel. It is a wanton attempt by him to bastardise his own issue, and to brand with infamy on the records of this court, the name and character of his injured wife. But the charge has been completely refuted and destroyed by the testimony of Dr. Fronte. At the same moment that he avers he is not obliged to take her back or to maintain her, and that he would be happier without her, he has the confidence to say, if the Court order him to receive her, he is ready to do so.

*51

He attempted to prove, (notwithstanding what he had sworn in his answer) that they lived happily together, and examined two witnesses for that purpose.

The first knew nothing, and the second very little. He said he believed they lived happily together, and the next moment declared that she cried very much when she related to him the conduct of defendant towards her, which he the witness was to communicate to Mr. Morgandollar, whom she went to consult with on the subject. There can be no doubt that the complainant ought to have some provision made for her and her child's maintenance.

It would be absurd after what he has sworn to in his *answer, to suppose they could ever live happily together; he at one time offered to maintain her, and now offers to make some provision for the child. Let it be referred to the master to make inquiry into the circumstances of the defendant and report thereon.

*52

2 Desaus. 52

Case VI.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Burke and Marshall.]

NICHOLAS POWER v. Dr. JAMES LYNAH, Executor of Thomas Eustace.

(June, 1801.)

[Executors and Administrators ⇐298; Wills ⇐489.]

The court decreed that the identity of a devisee and legatee, coming from abroad, was sufficiently proved by evidence and circumstances. But the legatee should give security that the estate should be returned at his death, if the limitation over in the will, on the event of his dying without leaving any heirs, should be hereafter decreed to be a good limitation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1217; Dec. Dig. ⇐298; Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1037–1046; Dec. Dig. ⇐489.]

The complainant filed a bill, charging that the late Thomas Eustace made and executed his last will and testament, whereby he devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate to his wife for life; and on her death, to his two brothers John and Alexander Eustace, and their heirs and assigns; but if they should die without leaving any heirs to enjoy the property, then to his friend Nicholas Power, of Waterford, in Ireland. If the said brothers, and N. Power should die without leaving any heirs, or their heirs should not be heard of in ten years, after the death of his wife, the testator directed the property to be sold, and the proceeds distributed among the poor of Charleston. He appointed Dr. James Lynah sole executor, who, on his death, qualified and proved the will as executor, and possessed himself of the estate. The widow has been dead near ten years; and though great pains have been taken by complainant, to find out the brothers of the testator, they have never appeared, and no person has produced any proofs of relationship to them.

*53

*The bill claims the estate, and an account thereof from the executor.

The executor admitted the will, and that he had possessed himself of the estate, and was ready to account.—He admitted that no persons had appeared who answered to the testator's brothers, though proper enquiries had been made for them and their heirs.

He knows nothing of the complainant N. Power, and prays he may be put to the proof of his identity.

At the hearing, the only question made, was, as to the identity of Nicholas Power.

M. Power, Mr. Phelon & M. Corbett, proved that they knew Nicholas Power well. He had been an innkeeper in Waterford for many years.

The court delivered its decree as follows:

From the testimony which has been given in this case by M. Power, Corbett & Phelon, the court is of opinion, that the identity of the complainant's being the person to whom the testator Eustace intended to bequeath his estate after the death of his wife and brothers, as mentioned in his will, is fully proved, as far as circumstances and strong presumptive evidence can go, and the nature of the case will admit.

It is therefore decreed that the estate shall be delivered up to him by the defendant, upon complainant's giving security for its being returned at his death, if the limitation over in the will, on the event of his dying without leaving any heirs, should be hereafter decreed to be a good one; that question not having been now agitated.

---

2 Desaus. 53

Case VII.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Burke and Marshall.]

MARY GIST, and Others, Representatives of B. Cattell, v. the Heirs and Representatives of Col. W. CATTELL.

(July, 1801.)

[Equity ⇐87; Executors and Administrators ⇐263; Wills ⇐796.]

The statute of limitations does not run against cestuis que trust, in favor of the trustee, or those volunteers claiming under him.

*54

Where *the statute is not a bar, it must be a strong case to induce the court to permit mere lapse of time, to operate as a bar to the claims of heirs or legatees for an account and settlement of an estate; especially where there have been minorities, and impediments to the course of justice. The heirs and legatees of the original testator, are entitled to be paid in preference to the creditors and legatees of the trustee or executor, where the original estate can be followed. A person waiving a claim on the ground of a supposed benefit, may revive it, on failure of that benefit. So a widow taking a legacy, and waiving dower, may again set up her claim to dower, if the debts take away the legacy.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Speake v. Kinard, 4 S. C. 56; Powers v. McEachern, 7 S. C. 300.

For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 242; Dec. Dig. ⇐87; Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 975; Dec. Dig. ⇐263; Wills, Cent. Dig. § 2065; Dec. Dig. ⇐796.]

The bill filed in this case, was to compel an account and settlement of the estate of the common ancestor of the family, Wm. Cattel, under and conformably to his will, made in the year 1752.

It is unnecessary to state the case fully, as the only point decided by the following decree was, that the complainants were not barred by the lapse of time, or by the operation of the statute of limitations, as was contended by the defendants counsel; and that the complainants were entitled to a settlement.

The facts on which the court grounded its judgment, are sufficiently stated in the decree itself, to enable the reader to perceive the principles on which it is founded.

After a full argument on the points above Stated Chancellor MARSHALL delivered the decree of the court.

The bill in this case, is brought by the heirs and representatives of Benjamin Cattell, against the representatives, executors, and legatees of the estate of Wm. Cattell, for an account, and for a discovery of property claimed under the will of the ancestor Wm. Cattell, made in 1752, and under a decree of the then Court of Chancery, founded on that will, and made in 1756. Notwithstanding the extensive discussion this case has undergone, the variety of points stated, and the diversity of grounds taken by counsel, we find that it must at length terminate in an account before the master. It is in its nature, a mere matter of account, though it becomes necessary, previously to estab*lish some principles or positions by which the reference must be regulated.

*55

Col. Wm. Cattell was the heir at law of the testator, at the time of the decree in 1756. The estate in Stanyarne's tract of land, Deer Island tract, and the house at Ashley Ferry, which had been devised to Peter, (who was then dead,) was limited by the decree to testator's six grand children, as tenants in common for life, and after their deaths respectively, then to testator's heir at law, in fee.—With respect to the lands of Charles, the decree limits the estate in the following manner:—To such of the grand children as might be living at the death of Charles, as tenants in common for life, and after their deaths respectively, to testator's heir at law, who shall be then living, in fee. The decree therefore, has made a different disposition of the fee in the respective estates; giving it to the heir at law generally, as as to Peter's lands, and to the person who might be heir at law, with regard to Charles's lands, when any of the life estates fell in. Col. Wm. Cattell then had a vested remainder in Peter's lands; and two of the grand children having died in his life time, the fee vested in him.

There has been much controversy in this case, on the subject of the lapse of time. The reasons must be forcible, and the circumstances of a strong character, to induce this court to interpose it as a bar, admitting the case not actually barred by the statute. But neither the principle, nor the cases cited, apply to this case; because Benjamin Cattell did not arrive at age till July, 1772. His uncle John Cattell, the executor and trustee, died in 1774. The revolution commenced in 1775. The declaration of independence was in 1776; and the limitation act was suspended during the war, and for some time after. Benjamin Cattell died during the war, viz: in 1782. The complainants were all infants, nearly till the time of filing the bill: therefore Laches is not imputable to them. Besides, this is a trust estate, against which the limitation does not run or operate. No doubt the lapse of years, under which *this claim has been buried, has greatly obscured many points of the cause, and thrown doubts on transactions, which, in former days, might have been cleared up by the most satisfactory evidence. But it is for the complainants to make out their accounts before the master, by evidence and documents: If they do not, they will fail.

*56

The defendant Bowman cannot possibly render an account, never having possessed Wm. Cattell's books or papers. Complainants deny that they are possessed of any, and offer to answer any interrogatories on the subject, to save the delay and expense of a cross bill. They must establish their own case.

From the decree of 1756, it will appear what part of the grand father's estate William and Benjamin, the grand sons, were entitled to. The tax return of John Cattell, the executor and trustee, in 1767 or 8, shews what estate he had in his possession, belonging to William and Benjamin. The list of debts which were due to William Cattell, the testator, in Col. William Cattell's own writing, shews what money had been received by John Cattell, the executor and trustee, and also, by Col. Wm. Cattell. The will of John Cattell shews, that Wm. Cattell was his sole executor and residuary legatee; and the inventory of his estate, returned by Col. Wm. Cattell, will shew what he derived from his uncle, so as to make it liable in his hands, to satisfy the complainants claims, (when they are established) prior to any of Col. Wm. Cattell's creditors or legatees.

There is no evidence even of a presumptive nature, before the court, that Col. Wm. Cattell ever settled his brother's claims with him. On the contrary, it appears that in 1777, Benjamin Cattell had determined to prosecute his demand, but was dissuaded from it by their mutual friends. Col. Wm. Cattell dying in 1778, and leaving Benjamin his executor and residuary legatee, there was then no person whom he could sue, or against whom he could prosecute a claim, as the residuary estate was devised to himself. It has been contended that he waived his *claim, by accepting the estate. Supposing that to be the fact, (which does not appear, for all his transactions were purely as executor) he could only be deemed to have waived it, under an idea, that he was to have an equivalent: but that failing, of course his claim must revive, and be satisfied out of the estate of John Cattell, which came into the possession of Col. Wm. Cattell, as far as it can be traced, or may be sufficient; he having a prior and superior equity to either Col. Wm. Cattell's creditors or legatees.

*57

It was urged that Mrs. Bowman, in consequence of having received this legacy, had not demanded her dower in the lands of Col. Wm. Cattell, although by the will, she is not barred; and if this legacy was resumed, she would set up her claim of dower, which was paramount all creditors. This is true, and must be admitted. If defendant thinks proper to relinquish the legacy, and claim dower, or set up her claim of dower by way of discount, the court will order it to be ascertained.

It is unnecessary in this stage of the business, to say any thing as to the mode of refunding, or of the other legatees. This must await the result of the account before the master.

As to the injunction granted in this case, on the bond given by Col. Wm. Cattell and Benjamin Cattell, to the estate of Thomas Lynch, it is ordered that it be dissolved.

Desaussure and Ford, for complainants.

Pringle, for defendants.

NOTE.—See the case of Hercy v. Dinwoody; 4 Bro. C. C. 257. Hoveden v. Lord Annesly; 2 Scho. & Lef'r 630. Smith v. Clay; Ambler, 645. Delorain v. Brown; 3 Bro. C. C. 633. Beckford v. Cloze; 3 Bro. C. C. 644. Webster v. Webster; 10 Ves. 93. Earl of Pomfret v. Lord Windsor; 1 Ves. 472.

---

2 Desaus. 57

Case VIII.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Burke and Marshall.]

PHILIP LEVEN HART and Others v. the Executors of PHILIP HART, Deceased.

(November, 1801.)

[Wills ⇐527, 676.]

Where there is a plain and positive devise, the Court will not raise an implied trust in executors, to favour a particular devisee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1140, 1592; Dec. Dig. ⇐527, 676.]

*58

[Wills ⇐527.]

*Among other legacies to the testators relations, there was one "to the children" of his nephew, S. M. H. and then a devise of the residuary estate to his several relations, "above mentioned," with bequests, share and share alike. These children take but one share of the residuary estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1140; Dec. Dig. ⇐527.]

[Wills ⇐519.]

A legatee by codicil is not entitled to a share of the residuary estate bequeathed to his relations named in the will, of whom he was not one.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1073; Dec. Dig. ⇐519.]

The real estate decreed to be sold, and then divided among the residuary legatees, some of whom were aliens.

[Aliens ⇐13.]

[Since the treaty with Prussia (article 10) allows citizens and subjects of the two countries to sell real estate which descends to them in the country of the other power, Poles who were subjects of Prussia were allowed to take under the residuary clause of a will.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Aliens, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. ⇐13.]

Philip Hart, a citizen of Charleston, made and duly executed his last will and testament, on the 3d day of Feb. 1796, in the presence of three witnesses, with a codicil thereto, of the same date, wherein and whereby he bequeathed as follows: To his nephew, Abraham Levy Hart, one thousand guineas: to his nephews P. L. Hart and A. M. Hart, £500. each; to his nieces H. M. Hart and Ella M. Hart, £100. each; to his sisters children, M. D. Shiff, and J. D. Shiff, £100. each; to the children of his nephew, Simon Moses Hart, and to the survivors of them, share and share alike, £400.; to his sister Hester's daughter, Galle, £100.; to the widow of his brother, Moses Hart, £200.; to Keram Kagames, (a religious institution) in Hamburg, 1500 marks. To the Synagogue in Charleston, £200. and to the Poor House, and Orphan House, £100.

He then says, "as to the rest of my estate, (if any there should be remaining,) after paying all my just debts, and the abovementioned legacies," "it is my will that the same be equally divided between my several relations abovementioned, with bequests share and share alike." And by the codicil to his will, he bequeathed to his nephew, Simon Moses Hart, £400. The testator died soon after, leaving his said will in full force. Thomas Roper and Robert Dewar, qualified on the will, as executors thereof. Abram Levy Hart, the other executor named in the will, died soon after his uncle Philip; and his relation Simon M. Hart, has administered on his estate.

*59

*The estate consisted of a considerable personal estate, and some real estate.

Most of the legatees were foreigners, inhabitants of Poland, and alleged to be within that part of Poland occupied by Prussia, in the partitions of that country.

The executors paid the pecuniary legacies; but having some doubts as to the real estate, on account of most of the legatees being aliens, whose claims to the real estate were opposed by Simon Moses Hart, a nephew of the testator, on behalf of himself and his three children, who are citizens, they required a bill to be filed in this court, in order to have the sanction of its judgment. A bill was accordingly filed by the legatees, who were foreigners, not naturalized, against the executor, for a sale and division of the real and personal estate, that the will of the testator for the equal division of the whole residue of his estate, real as well as personal, might be carried into full execution. The bill also made Simon Moses Hart a defendant. The complainants insisted that there was a trust by implication in the executors, to give effect to the will. And the bill prayed for relief.

The executors, in their answer, admitted the facts stated in the bill, and submitted to the court the effect of the proofs of the relationship of the complainants. They admitted that having paid the legacies, they are in possession of other personal property, and some real estate, (two lots of land in Charleston, and a tract of land in the country;) and some of the legatees have applied to them to sell the lands, and to divide the money as the residuum of the estate, in the manner directed by the testator, as and concerning the rest and residue of the estate. That the executors having doubts as to the real estate, especially as Simon Moses Hart insists that the other legatees being aliens, he alone, and his children, being citizens, are exclusively entitled to the real estate of the testator, the executors pray the direction and judgment of the court for their guidance.

Simon Moses Hart, one of the nephews of the testator, *and the legatee in the codicil to the will, in his answer set up a claim to the whole real estate of which the testator died seized, in his own right, or in the right of his children, they being natural born citizens of this state; and he being naturalized on the 11th of Oct. 1796, soon after Philip Hart, the testator's death. That all the other legatees are aliens and incapable of taking real estate; and there was no power in the executors to sell the real estate, and convert it into personal; nor was there any implied trust.

*60

At the hearing it was contended for the complainants, that the intent of the testator was manifestly to dispose of the whole estate. Indeed the very words of the will are "as to the rest of my estate, it is my will that the same be equally divided between my several relations abovementioned, with bequests, share and share alike." The word estate is sufficient to carry everything which a man hath. See Co. Litt. 345, and 2 P. Wm's. 335, 523. Cases Temp. Talb. 157.

But how was this to be effected? There are two city lots of land, and one tract in the country. These are indivisible among so many legatees; almost all of whom, as the testator well knew, resided in Europe; and therefore it could be only by a sale, and a division of the proceeds, that the intent of the testator could have effect. There must therefore be an implied trust, that the executors should sell the real estate, convert it into money and divide that conformably to the will. The court will strain a good deal, and adopt any reasonable construction, rather than declare that a forfeiture is incurred. See 1 Fonb. 442 3, 2 Fonb. 58. It is clear that the testator meant that his whole estate, real and personal should, after payment of debts, and enumerated legacies, go to the residuary devisees. This intent will be carried into effect if possible. It is possible, if the court will direct the executors to sell it, and divide the money. See 2 Bro. C. C. 277. The Court will raise a trust in the executors to give effect to the intent.

In many cases executors are declared trustees to pay *debts. See 1 Vern. 296, 411. 2 Vern. 106, 228. Cases Temp. Talbot, 157, 163, 283. 1 Bro. C. C. 81. 3 Ves. jur. 7, 152. 7 Bac. 138 9.

*61

Executors are also trustees of the residue, for the next of kin, where no disposition is made of it. And by parity of reasoning for the residuary legatee, where the occasion requires it. See 2 P. Wms. 523, 186. 3 P. Wms. 295. 4 Ves. jur. 21, 76, 117, 725. Nor is it certain that the complainants are incapable of taking and disposing of real estate in this country. They are Poles, and are alleged to be now subjects of Prussia. And by the 10th article of the American treaty with Prussia, the citizens and subjects of the two countries are at liberty to sell real estates which descend upon them (or devolve doubtless by will) in the country of the other power.

At any rate the defendant Simon Moses Hart, cannot take and hold the real estate, if alienage be a bar, for he was not naturalized till the death of the testator. See 1 Bacon, 132, title alien.

Mr. Parker for the defendant S. M. Hart, and his children.

The counsel admitted that the word "estate" used in the will, would carry the whole estate, real and personal. But he contended that there was not any direction in the will, that the property should be sold by the executors for the benefit of the heirs. And unless there be an absolute direction, the court will not raise a trust for that purpose, in favor of residuary devisees, who are aliens, to the prejudice of the heir at law, or person entitled by operation of law. The law which excludes aliens from taking and holding lands devised to them, (which makes them purchasers—2 Bro. C. C. 189,) would be eluded, if the court would raise a trust in the executors, and direct sales of the land, and the money to be paid over to aliens.

The complainants then being aliens, cannot take any benefit of this devise of lands, and they will go to his nephew, Simon Moses Hart, who is a naturalized citizen; or if his naturalization, after the death of the testator be too *late, to his sons, who are natural born citizens. For if a man dies, leaving sons, and the eldest be an alien, the law passes him by as though he were not in existence, and his younger brothers take in exclusion of him. 3 Salkeld. 35.

*62

With respect to the right of the foreign devisees to take the benefit of the will under the treaty with Prussia, because part of Poland has been annexed to Prussia, it has not been proved that these devisees were inhabitants of that part of Poland, which has been permanently annexed to that kingdom; and if they were, we have no proof that they being Jews, are entitled to hold landed property. It is well know that the Jews are not permitted to hold real estate, or immoveable property, in most of the kingdoms and states of the continent of Europe, where they are subjects: and the proof lay upon the complainants to get rid of the legal objection of alienage, by shewing that they were subjects of Prussia, and could hold lands in that kingdom; else they could not have the benefit of this peculiar provision in the Prussian treaty.†

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court.

The testator, P. Hart, after giving several pecuniary legacies, makes a residuary clause, in the following words: "And as to the rest of my estate, if any there should be remaining, after fully paying all my just debts, and the above mentioned legacies, it is my will that the same be equally divided, between my several relations above mentioned, with bequests, share and share alike." Various questions arise under this residuary clause.

1st. Whether there is not a trust by implication created in the executors, by the words of this clause?

*63

*2d. What share of the residuary estate, the children of Simon M. Hart will take?

3d. Whether Simon M. Hart takes any part of it?

4th. If a trust by implication is not created, what part of the real estate of the testator, Simon M. Hart would be entitled to, the complainants being aliens, and as such, not capable of inheriting real estate?

The first question was the most strongly contended: and it was insisted for the complainant, that the words of this clause would create a trust by implication in the executors, in order to enable them to sell the real estate, (if the personal was not sufficient) to pay the debts and legacies, and for the purpose of making a division among the residuary legatees, agreeably to the intention of the testator. A variety of cases were adduced, to shew that words of desire, request or recommendation, will raise a trust by implication, to execute the intention of testator. Upon a review of those cases, (though they are very good law,) it will be found that they are not applicable; for in all of them, the testator has given an estate for life, or a certain term, to a particular person in the first instance, and then follows his request or recommendation to that person to dispose of the estate in a particular manner, to certain persons named or described by testator. That is not the case before us, for the residuary clause in the will is as plain as words can make it: it is in the common phraseology of residuary devises or bequests, and cannot, we think, but by a most forced construction, create an implied trust in the executors. The estate, if any there should be remaining, being given expressly and directly to the legatees above mentioned; and therefore it is not necessary for the intervention of trustees, to carry the intention of testator into effect; for if the residuary legatees cannot agree on a division, this court, on application, will decree it.

In this particular case, it is necessary to contend for an implied trust, being in the executors, to enable them to sell the real estate, and convert it into money, for the purpose of appropriating a part of it to the complainants, who *are aliens; and but for that circumstance, it is presumed this suit would never have been instituted; but surely it would be carrying the doctrine of implied trusts further than the court is warranted in doing, to put a forced construction, as is contended for in a plain clause of a will, to favor a particular legatee.

*64

With regard to the second question, the court are of opinion, that the children of S. M. Hart take but one share under the residuary clause because they are not named individually, but collectively, in the particular bequest in the will.

3d question—The court are of opinion, that S. M. Hart is not entitled to a share as residuary legatee, he not being one of the relations in the will above named.

4th. Simon M. Hart can only take such part of the residuary real estate of the testator, as his father, whom he represents, would have been entitled to.

The court decreed that the real estate be sold by the master, and the money arising from the sale, be divided among the residuary legatees, as they are respectively entitled thereto.

Costs to be paid out of the estate.

Desaussure, Ford and Pringle, for complainants.

Parker, for defendants.

† Mr. Parker offered to have a young man of the name of Hart, sworn, to prove that Jews in Prussia, are not permitted by law to hold land, but for a limited time, (leasehold) and that they are excluded from many other privileges.

This was not considered a sufficient authentication of the Lex Loci, and Chancellor BURKE remarked, that the celebrated Ephraim was treasurer to the king of Prussia, who reposed unlimited confidence in him, and removed most of the disabilities of the Jews.

During the sitting of the Court which commenced in October, 1801, and continued throughout November, the ill health of Chancellor Burke, prevented his attending the Court more than three days; and he was never able to attend afterwards, till his death in the year 1802.

---

2 Desaus. *65

*Case IX.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge and Marshall.]

THOMAS SMITH v. JOHN E. POYAS.

(November, 1801.)

Life Estates ⟸13.]

A devisee for life restrained from cutting down the woodland of the estate, and from planting the new grounds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. §§ 21, 32, 42; Dec. Dig. ⟸13.]

Life Estates ⟸13.]

Restrained also from using the timber for any other purposes than fuel, fencing, &c.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. §§ 21, 32, 42; Dec. Dig. ⟸13.]

Life Estates ⟸17.]

Devisee for life, bound to contribute one fourth of the expence for repairing the buildings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. §§ 37, 38, 42; Dec. Dig. ⟸17.]

Life Estates ⟸5.]

Commissioners to estimate and report the expence of necessary repairs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. § 25; Dec. Dig. ⟸5.]

Life Estates ⟸5.]

Tenant for life to deliver up title deeds to devisee in fee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. §§ 11, 12, 21; Dec. Dig. ⟸5.]

[This case is also cited in Moon v. Moon, 2 Strob. Eq. 332, on the doctrine of waste by life tenant.]

By a decree of this court given in June, 1788, (vide 1st vol. of these reports, page 156,) it was decided that Mrs. Poyas was entitled together with her sisters, under her fathers will and a codicil thereto, to a residence on his Goose Creek plantation, and to plant thereon, during their lives, after which the estate was to go to the complainant in fee simple.

Mr. and Mrs. Poyas believing themselves entitled to clear the wood lands, and to plant the new land, began to clear and to plant according to their own opinion of their rights.

The complainant being of a different opinion filed his bill in this Court, to obtain an injunction restraining them from clearing the wood land, and planting the new grounds; and to restrain them generally in the use of the timber; and to oblige the defendants to keep the buildings in repair. At the hearing, the fact of the clearing the wood land was established; and indeed the defendants insisted on their right to do so.

After the cause was argued, Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court.

It is ordered and decreed that the defendant be enjoined and restrained from committing further waste on the plantation or tract of land in bill mentioned, by cutting down *the trees or clearing the oak land or felling the trees or the pine timber land, except what may be necessary for fuel or other plantation use, or fencing in the fields. The injunction not to extend to old fields cleared or planted in the lifetime of testator. That complainant and defendant each make choice of one person who shall choose a third to examine the state or condition of the dwelling and out houses on the plantation, and estimate the sum that will be necessary to put them into tenantable repair, and make their return thereof to this Court by the first day of the next term. That the defendant be chargeable and liable for one fourth part of the expence of repairing the said buildings, and forthwith repair the same, as far as the expence with which he is chargeable, may extend. Also that defendant do forthwith deliver to complainant all the title deeds and grants for the said land, which he has in his possession. And lastly, that the costs of suit be paid by defendant.

*66

Desaussure and Ford, Ward and Parker for complainant. Pringle for defendant.

---

2 Desaus. 66

Case X.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge and Marshall.]

The Executor of MARY SMELIE, v. BENJ. REYNOLDS, and Others, Executors of Wm. Smelie.

(January, 1802.)

[Wills ⟸30.]

A man married a lady possessed of some personal property, for which she was indebted by bond. He paid the debt, and also executed a deed, by which he gave the property to his wife, to take effect after his death. There was no trustee named. Afterwards, she made her will, which was written by her husband. She bequeathed several legacies, and the bulk of the property to her husband for life, and at his death, to her daughter by a former marriage. The husband proved the will, and accepted and held the property under it till his death, and did other acts of confirmation. It was decided that the will, tho' there was no agreement in writing to permit it, was valid, and would carry the property to the legatees against the heirs of the husband.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 64; Dec. Dig. ⟸30.]

*67

*The bill of complaint charged that in 1783, William Smelie married Mary Lowrey, who, at the time of the marriage, was possessed of a considerable personal estate: that she had one child, the issue of her former marriage, who afterwards married Abraham Waight, now dead.

That William Smelie, in August, 1787, made a certain deed, by which he gave to said Mary Smelie, after his death, all the estate that belonged to her at the time of her marriage with said William, to her and her heirs for ever. That said Mary, at the time of her marriage with Wm. Smelie, was possessed of eighteen negro slaves. That said Mary on the 30th of October, 1787, made her last will, and left to her daughter Sarah Maxwell Waight, several negroes by name to her and her issue. She also bequeathed to Sarah Hutchinson, one negro and £100 currency.—The remainder of her estate she left to her husband Mr. Smelie, during his life, and at his death, to her daughter and her issue, and in failure of issue, to return to her heirs for ever.

That Mary Smelie died in the year 1788, leaving her will in full force. That complainant, with the assent of William Smelie, qualified under said will; that having obtained a warrant of appraisement, he went on said plantation of William Smelie, who delivered to complainant 18 slaves as the estate and effects of testatrix. That complainant took an inventory and appraisement of said slaves, and delivered to Sarah M. Waight, with the assent of said William Smelie, the negroes bequeathed her. And he also delivered to said Wm. Smelie, the negro left Sarah Hutchinson, and the rest of said slaves to be held by him agreeably to the tenor of said will.

That Sarah M. Waight married B. Stiles, and is since dead, leaving three children now living. That William Smelie died in December, 1800, having first made and executed his last will, and appointed B. Reynolds, W. Hayne, and John Seabrook, executors, who qualified thereon. That the complainant demanded the negroes from the executors, who refused to deliver them. The bill prays *that they may be compelled to deliver them to complainant, and to account for their work and labor since Mr. Smelie's death.

*68

To this bill, the defendant, Benjamin Reynolds, the principal acting executor of William Smelie, put in an answer. The answer of B. Reynolds admits, that at the time of the marriage of Wm. Smelie with Mary Lowrey, that she was possessed of some personal property purchased at the sale of her former husband's estate; but the whole purchase money was not paid at the time of her marriage with Wm. Smelie.

The answer admits that W. S. made the deed as stated in the bill, but denies the validity of it, as there were no trustees, and the deed was from husband to wife: and as the deed was executed on a supposition that the property was unembarrassed; whereas William Smelie was obliged to pay the balance of the purchase money, and therefore the property vested in him by purchase. Defendant denies the right of complainant to take the property by virtue of the deed, as it was not to take effect until after William Smelie's death, and was intended for the benefit of Mrs. Smelie; but on her death, the gift having been to her and her heirs and assigns, the property became vested in W. Smelie, the husband, as answering the description in the deed, and legally entitled to his wife's property. The defendant avers that William Smelie told the defendant and others, that he did not consider the deed to be valid, as he had signed it under the impression that the property was unincumbered, and that he never would give up more than he had already given up, alluding to negroes named in will of Mary Smelie.

That William Smelie sold one of the negroes that had belonged to Mrs. Smelie, previous to her marriage with him. The defendant admits Mary Smelie made a will, but denies its validity, as the said will does not appear to have been made under the authority of any settlement or other deed. With the assent of William Smelie, the defendant admits complainant may have gone on the planta*tion of Wm. Smelie, and that he may have made an inventory; but defendant contends Wm. Smelie was ignorant of or had a misconception of his rights, and that such permission ought not to be binding or considered as an assent on the part of said Wm. Smelie, as said William Smelie declared to defendant that he had acquiesced, supposing complainant legally authorized by virtue of authority from the ordinary. The defendant states that W. S. had told him that complainant had made application for the purchase of the negroes mentioned in the inventory, and had offered half of the value; but that he the said W. S. refused to part with them but for their full value.

*69

Defendant contends that permitting negroes named in the will of Mrs. Smelie, to be delivered to Mrs. Waight and Hutchinson ought not to be considered as an assent on part of said W. S. as those acts were done immediately after the death of his wife, when ignorant of his rights, and he might of his own bounty have consented to these dispositions. The defendant admits the death of W. S. his making his will, naming executors who have qualified. He admits the demand of the complainant, and his refusal; also, the marriage of Mrs. Waight with B. Stiles, and issue left as stated in bill.

At the hearing in November, 1801, the following statement was agreed upon by the parties, as a part of the case. That Mrs. Mary Lowrey purchased at the sale of her deceased husband's property, certain slaves, for the price of which she executed and gave her bond. She afterwards married Mr. William Smelie. On the 30th March, 1804, her brother, Mr. Hugh Wilson, and her husband Mr. W. Smelie, took up her bond, and gave their own in place of it, conditioned to pay £571 with interest.

This bond has been since paid off as follows: on the 24th May, 1788, by Mr. Smelie, £239 18s. 6d. On 1st May, 1796, by Mr. Smelie, £110 1s. 3d. The balance of the bond paid by Hugh Wilson.

The complainant produced in evidence the original will *of Mrs. Mary Smelie, drawn in the hand writing of her husband Mr. Wm. Smelie.

*70

Mr. Hugh Wilson (who was admitted to be sworn, by consent,) testified that his sister, Mrs. Mary Smelie made her last will, with the consent of Mr. Smelie, her husband, and by his authority, expressed verbally.

The introduction of such evidence was opposed, but admitted by the court.

Mr. Wilson then proceeded to state that when his sister was ill, Mr. Smelie sent for him, and told him she was about to make her will, which was done accordingly. Mr. Smelie himself wrote the will, and kept it; and after his wife's death, carried it to the Ordinary, and had it proved and recorded. A time for the appraisement of the property was fixed: and Mr. Smelie delivered up the property, and said he had no claim to it. He delivered the negroes bequeathed to Mrs. Waight, and paid the legacy to Mrs. Hutchinson.

Mr. Smelie always called the property his wife's: though he knew the negro slaves had not been fully paid for by her, and he had given his bond jointly with her brother for the purchase money. He proposed to the witness to purchase his (Smelie's) life estate, for his wife's daughter, who was to have them after his decease.

On cross examination, Mr. Wilson said that Mr. Smelie some time after his wife's death sold one of the slaves of her estate; and offered for sale an entire family, without restricting it to his life estate in them. He mentioned it to witness, but did not ask his permission.

Mrs. Chisolm testified that Mr. Smelie, a short time before he died, told her he had sold one of Mary Smelie's negroes; and said he had sold her because worthless and diseased. She always heard him call the negroes of his wife's estate, her property.

Mr. John Smelie testified that he was appointed one of the appraisers of Mrs. Mary Smelie's estate by Mr. Wm. Smelie, who said the property was to be appraised as her estate, and not his. He always heard Wm.

*71

Smelie speak of *the property brought by his wife, as her own property, and to go to her daughter by her former marriage. He offered to sell his life estate in the negroes, to Mr. Hugh Wilson, who told him his price was too high.

Mrs. Bouchonneau testified that she often heard Mr. Smelie tell his wife he did not want her property, and that she should give it to her daughter—was present when Mrs. Smelie signed her will. Mr. Smelie wrote it; but it was she who insisted on giving him a life estate in her property.

Mr. William Smelie's will was produced in evidence. It was dated in the year 1798, with a codicil dated 6th Dec. 1800. In that he gave to his last wife the property he got by her.

Mr. Ward and Mr. Pringle argued for the complainant, that Mr. Smelie had completely divested himself of his marital rights, and agreed to a settlement to the separate use of his wife. That though the statute of frauds is the rule of the court, yet there are exceptions to it; and parol evidence is admissible to explain. See 1 Powell, 432.

The evidence is very full to prove that he never considered or called his wife's property his own; but meant it always to be her separate estate. As to the separate estate of the wife, see 1 Fonb. 106, 7.

It was said that Mr. Smelie was ignorant of his marital rights, and acts done in ignorance of rights, are not binding. But this is not so. He seems to have been intelligent and beneficent; and his language and conduct all shew that he was aware that he might take his wife's property to himself, but deliberately declined to do so; and left it to her own disposal chiefly for the benefit of her daughter, to whom by his marriage he stood in the place of a parent; and the court will consider this as a gift to her.

Gifts to a wife, without trustees, will pass. See 1 Atk. 270. Lucas v. Lucas. And an agreement on marriage may be made without trustees. 2 Ves. sen'r. 666 8. Pau*let v. Delaval. See also 2 P. Wms. 244, Cannel v. Buckle; and 2 Vesey, jun. 488, 49. 3 P. Wm's. 388, Slanning v. Style. The husband is considered trustee of the wife's separate estate, where no trustee is named.

*72

The will was drawn by Mr. Smelie himself. This shews that he considered the property as his wife's separate estate, and being in his hand writing, was a sufficient assent in writing, if that were necessary, which however it is not. Consent may be implied, and even subsequent approbation will be sufficient. See Burn. 47, 8.

The answer does not deny the deed as illegal or invalid, but rather as defeasible by Mr. Smelie's paying great part of the purchase money for the property of his wife; yet he was at liberty to do so, if he pleased, and he ought still to hold and consider it as his wife's separate estate. He has done so, and even confirmed it by his will: and who is there who can control his acts.

Mr. Edwards and Mr. Desaussure argued for the defendant. They insisted that no contract between husband and wife is binding, without the intervention of trustees. They are not separate persons at liberty to contract. The deed therefore was not valid. The case of Mrs. Haig v. the executors of Haig, decided in this court in 1794, (see vol. 1, of these Reports, p. 348) is strong to shew that the wife cannot take property to her separate use by direct gift, without the intervention of trustees.—There was also a want of consideration, for the marriage had been consummated, and the marital rights had attached. Powell on Contr. 230.

If the deed can take effect, it must be as a gift. The deed was executory, and donee died in the life time of the donor—therefore void. If it was to operate as a will, then by the death of Mrs. Smelie, in the life time of the husband, this was lapsed. 1 P. Wm's. 84.

If the deed be inoperative, the will of the wife does not help the complainant—for a wife cannot make an effectual will or testament without the consent of her husband, and *that must be in writing. 4 Burn. 46, 78. 1 Bacon abr. 291. Godolphin, 30. Our stat. of 1734, excludes femes covert from making wills.

*73

But the deed by Mr. Smelie was void, for it was made direct to the wife, without trustees, after marriage, and to take place in futuro.

A man cannot grant any thing direct to his wife, or enter into covenant with her. 2 Bla. 442. Co. Litt. 112, 113. 1 Fonbl. 93. 1 Vern. 385, Moyse v. Eyles. 3 Atk. 72, Beard v. Beard. All agreements in consideration of marriage, must be in writing, or they are void. 1 Fonbl. 179; and even then, if not to be executed within a year, they are void by the statute of frauds. 1 Atk. 270. 3 P. Wm's. 334. 3 Bro. C. C. 340, 381.

The defect of the want of a trustee is decisive—for it is only through a trustee that a husband can grant to his wife. 2 Bla. 442, note 16. Hargr. Co. Litt. 30. 2 P. Wm's. 77, Burton v. Pierpoint. 1 P. Wm's. 125, Harvey v. Harvey.

It is a maxim that a gift of personal property to take effect in futuro is void. 2 Bla. 441, 2.

In Darley's case, 3 Atk. 399, 400, lord Chancellor Hardwicke lays it down that a mere voluntary promise of a husband to a wife, and executory only, has never been carried into execution by the court. That the slaves were absolutely the husband's by virtue of the marital rights cannot be denied. To this it may be added, that he even paid the greater part of the purchase money for them.—Hence, a resulting trust to him, independent of the marital rights. If a man purchases even lands in another's name, and pays his own money, it will be a resulting trust for himself; though no deed be made declaring the trust.

See 7 Bac. 142. 1 Vern. 366. 3 P. Wm's. 321, 3.

Besides, in construing this informal paper, it is clear that it was to have effect, in case Mrs. Smelie survived her husband. The words are, "I give, after my decease, to Mary Smelie," which amounts to saying, in case she *survives me. But that event did not occur—she died before him.

*74

The deed gave no power to the wife to make a will; and she had no power without such provision. By law a feme covert has no authority to make a will—and even where, by agreement before marriage, a wife is to be allowed to make a will, it must be duly executed and conform to the power to make it effectual. 1 P. Wm's. 739. 2 P. Wm's. 258. All the cases where marred women have been permitted to make valid wills, are cases where the husband bound himself by covenant or bond, to permit his wife to make a will. 7 Bac. abr. 244. 2 Vern. 329. 2 P. Wms. 623. 2 Ves. sen'r. 61, 75, 612. 3 Atk. 155.

Not one of the decided cases go so far as to say, that parol proof shall be allowed to establish a husband's verbal assent to his wife's making a will, or without a previous agreement in writing.

Acts of confirmation must be shewn to have been with full knowledge of the rights of the party confirming.

The court took time to deliberate, and afterwards Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court.

Complainant's bill states, that his testatrix had one daughter by a former marriage, and being possessed of a considerable personal estate in 1783, she married defendant's testator, Wm. Smelie. That not having made a settlement on her daughter, when she married Mr. Smelie, he on the 6th of Aug. 1787, executed a deed, giving to her after his decease, all the estate that belonged to her at the time of marriage. That soon afterwards, viz., in 1786 or 87, she made a will, disposing of the principal property she was possessed of at the time of her marriage, some part thereof to her daughter; a negro and 100*l.* to S. Hutchinson, and the remainder to her husband during life, and after his death to her daughter; and she appointed her husband and complainant executors. That the complainant, with the assent and privity of Mr. Smelie, proved the will, and qualified as executor. That defen*dant's testator delivered up the personal property to complainant, to be subject to the dispositions in the will of his wife. That it was appraised with his consent: the legacies were afterwards delivered over to the legatees, and the remainder was delivered to the said Wm. Smelie for his life, agreeable to the directions of the will. That Wm. Smelie is dead, and complainant has applied to his executors for the personal property, (so as aforesaid bequeathed to him for life) which they refused to deliver.

*75

The defendants admit that complainant's testatrix was possessed of some personal estate at the time of her marriage with the testator: the whole consideration money, for which had not been paid, and which he afterwards satisfied. He admits the deed, but denies the validity of it, there being no trustee named in it: also denies complainant's right to take personal property, as it was not to be effected till after testator's death. Admits that Mrs. Smelie made a will, but denies the validity of it, as it was not made under the authority of any settlement or deed; or with the assent of Smelie, without which, she had no right to make any will that would be binding. Defendants contend that Smelie's assent to the delivery of the negroes to the other legatees ought not to be binding, as he was either ignorant of, or misconceived his rights.

The evidence produced in this case was, the will of Mrs. Smelie, which was admitted: also, that it was written by her husband Mr. Smelie. It was proved that after it was executed, he kept it in his possession, and sometime after her death, went with the complainant, and delivered it to the ordinary. That the complainant received the personal property as executor from Mr. Smelie, and re-delivered part of it to him as a legatee under the will. That the legacies were delivered to the respective legatees by complainant, and Mr. Smelie himself paid the 100*l.* legacy to Mrs. Hutchinson. J. Smelie, another witness, deposed that Wm. Smelie, the husband, appointed him one of the appraisers of the personal property, which he called his wife's estate.

*76

That it was pointed out by Smelie, who *said it was to be appraised as her's and not his. Mrs. B———u was present when he drew the will, and desired his wife to give the property to her daughter, and that he wanted nothing. Mr. Smelie made his own will in January, 1798, and a codicil in December, 1800; in neither of which has he disposed of this property.

For the defendant, it was contended that agreeably to the settled principles of law, the husband and wife are considered as one person: that she has no will of her own: that he by marrying, acquired the absolute right to her personal property, and she cannot dispose thereof, unless a power to do it is reserved to her by articles, or a settlement before marriage; which, however, was not done in this case. That the deed was void, being made after marriage, without the intervention of trustees. That to make a will valid, she must have permission in writing; and that subsequent acts of confirmation by the husband, do not strengthen it or make it good. That if the will should be deemed good, defendants should be at liberty to hold the personal property for the money paid, for her debts, and for this property particularly. It was insisted for complainant, that gifts between husband and wife, after marriage, would be supported in this court, though not at law, without the intervention of trustees; so as they do not affect or prejudice the rights of creditors. That if a husband consents to his wife's making a will, he should not afterwards dissent, and that an assent in writing is not necessary.

This is a very singular case, it cannot be assimilated to any in the books, and probably such another may never occur; it must therefore be determined on its own particular circumstances.

It is not pretended that the power of disposing of her property was reserved by articles or settlement before marriage. On the contrary it is admitted, that she married without any settlement.

This then comes under the idea of a voluntary settlement, or rather a voluntary permission of the husband af*ter marriage, for the wife to dispose of the property she brought in marriage. Creditors cannot be affected by it, as the husband left property to pay his debts. On this ground it must stand or fall. If creditors will not be affected, call this paper a will, or a deed of appointment, or any other name you please, if he has given such assent to the disposition as would satisfy the mind of the court, that he was consenting thereto, it ought to be binding and conclusive.

*77

As to the deed of August, 1787, that is out of the question; she clearly had no right to make any disposition, unless she survived him.

The case then rests altogether on the instrument of writing made in Oct. 1787, (which has been called the will of the wife,) and the simple question is whether there was such an assent by him to her making that disposition of the property as would bind him, and consequently all others claiming under him. That it is not absolutely necessary the assent should be in writing is plain, from the case of Lucas and Lucas, 1 Atk. 270, where a verbal promise made by the husband to the wife in her lifetime, and delivery of property after her death, was held sufficient to vest the property in the daughter, and he could not afterwards invalidate it. And in another case of Brooks & Tunner, among other points, it was determined, that if the husband consent that his wife should make a will, and she does so, and dies, if after her death he comes to the executor and seems to approve her choice of him as an executor, and seems satisfied in the main with the will, this is a good assent, and makes it a good will;

though when he sees and reads the will, he is therewith displeased, and opposes the probate of it: and his subsequent disagreement after the former assent shall not hurt the will.

Compare the case before the court with those above cited, and we shall see that it is much stronger than either of them. Defendant's testator, several years after his marriage, when he is fully acquainted with all the circumstances relative to the property he received with his wife, *and after he had made himself responsible for payment of part of the purchase money, undertook to draw, and actually drew a will for his wife, disposing of the property he got with her in marriage; nominates himself an executor therein, and directs it on the back to himself, and the other executors; gets it executed by her; keeps it in his own possession, and some time after her death, carries and delivers it to the ordinary to be proved.: The other executor qualifying at the same time, he being present, and assenting thereto.

*78

Shortly after he delivers the property to the other executor; he himself nominates an appraiser, and not only permits the executor to deliver the legacies to the respective legatees, and himself pays a pecuniary legacy to one of them, but receives back such part of the property as his wife had bequeathed to him for life. When he drew the will, he relinquished his claim to every part of the property, saying he did not want it, and desired his wife to give the whole of it to her daughter. And finally, 12 or 13 years after her death he makes his will, and a codicil, in neither of which does he dispose of any of the property that he received with his wife.

If an assent in writing was absolutely necessary, we are of opinion that the very act of drawing the will, having it executed, keeping it in his possession and himself delivering it after her death to the ordinary to be proved, ought to be deemed as a full assent to the will, and to the dispositions of the property therein mentioned, and binding on him and those claiming under him. That the subsequent conduct of defendant's testator in giving up the property to the other executor, to be delivered over agreeably to the will, he himself paying the pecuniary legacy, receiving back some of the property given him for life, and not disposing of any part of it by his will or codicil, are all confirming acts of his assent to the disposition made in the will, which neither he nor those claiming under him ought at this late day to be allowed to invalidate. That his executors should not be permitted to set up the demand *they have done for the money paid by him on account of this property, because he was fully apprised of the situation of it, had made himself personally responsible for it several years before the deed of 1787, or the subsequent disposition of it by his wife, and never brought it forward as a claim against complainant or his testatrix. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the defendants do forthwith deliver up to the complainant such of the property as hath come into their hands or possession, which their testator received from complainant, under the will of his wife, and also account for the work and labour of the negroes, since the death of their testator.

*79

Costs to be paid by defendants.

---

2 Desaus. 79

Case XI.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge and Marshall.]

PAUL HAMILTON v. ISAAC PEACE and Others.

(January, 1802.)

[Principal and Agent ⇐64; Wills ⇐78, 79.]

A person wrote instructions to his attornies, to collect the debts due to him, and to divide the money among themselves. They did so in part; but having bonds for large sums, which they could not collect immediately, they divided these bonds among themselves.

He afterwards wrote other instructions to them to go on collecting, and to divide the money among themselves, and four others, who were his near relations.

After his death, they refused to do so, and claimed the whole under the first instructions.

Decided that the first instructions, by whatever name called, were so far revocable, that all the funds not actually collected before the second instructions, should go among the seven named in the last.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 119; Dec. Dig. ⇐64; Wills, Cent. Dig. § 199; Dec. Dig. ⇐78, 79.]

The late Paul Hamilton, uncle of the complainant, was an inhabitant of this state, advanced in life, and possessed of considerable property, when the revolutionary war commenced. He was unfriendly to the separation of the colonies from Great Britain; and his conduct in the course of the war exposed him to the resentment of his countrymen. He was amerced twelve per cent. on the value of his estate. When the British troops evacuated *Charleston, he left his country, and went to the Island of Bermuda. He had previously lost his only child by death; and his nearest relations were his nephew Paul Hamilton, another nephew, of the name of M'Cleod, and three nieces. His nephew, called after him, Paul Hamilton, was ardently attached to the American revolution; and though a youth under age, had distinguished himself gallantly in the partizan war which unhappily desolated the country towards the close of the struggle. His conduct offended his uncle, who, though a respectable man, had strong passions and prejudices. In this state of mind, and under these circumstances, Paul Hamilton, the elder, made his will at Bermuda, in the month of April, 1784; and on the 1st day of May, 1784, he drew up and signed a certain instrument or paper, which he headed and called instructions, directed and addressed to his particular friends, Isaac Peace, Alexander Chisolm and Norman M'Cleod, (which last was also his nephew,) in which, after giving certain explicit and positive directions and instructions relative to the sale, application and disposal of various parts of his property, real and personal, in this state, he expressed himself as follows: "The above said several requests being fully and completely complied with, strictly adhered to, donations paid, and your continuing in punctually remitting to me in Europe the yearly rent arising as aforesaid from my house and lot in Church Street, Charleston, my will is, that my nephew, Norman M'Cleod shall continue to live and occupy my plantation on Edisto Island, together with the slaves, now on the same, to wit: Sambo, August, Sanco, Jack, Sarah, with the stock of horses, cattle, hogs, &c. in short all the implements on the premises; then it is my pleasure, and I hereby will and request that my said attornies, Isaac Peace, A. Chisolm and N. M'Cleod, do mutually, unanimously agree with each other to collect, ascertain and receive the rest, residue and remainder of my personal estate, wheresoever and whatsoever. And as they receive the same, each to render an account to the other, and mutually and in a friendly *manner divide the same equal and amongst them, share and share alike. This is my express desire, that they do, and continue to do in full confidence, that they my said attornies will yet oblige me in acting in the said friendly and faithful manner in future, in complying with my desire, as my attornies during my life, if they survive; whose friendly and faithful conduct, I have in time past, so happily, so amply experienced."

*80

*81

In a letter written by Mr. Hamilton to Isaac Peace, dated 5th June, 1786, he says, "Rice cannot, I believe, be shipped to make a saving remittance; yet it is better than indigo, and I think better than any bills, so should you be so happy as to receive in and be able to furnish me in future with what remains from, as per instructions from Bermuda, per Normand, to wit: The first payment, £700. for the James Island plantation, and the yearly rent, be it what it will, of my town house, I wish no more. It will be sufficient for me. You know I have received by bill on Champion & Dixon, in part of said £700. £500, and now in rice, per Capt. Ball, say £95. 14s. 11d. making £600. or near it, of the £700. paid by Rivers: so there remains only about £100. of that allowance as per instructions aforesaid, with the rent added, of my house as you may get it paid. This I say is the utmost I desire shall be remitted me here as may suit you to receive it convenient for you. If you should fail even that, I must be satisfied, and shall be, as I am convinced you do as well as though I was present. All this I explain to you to confirm to you, that I do not deviate from my instructions, and the same will be enough for me. As you desire to know if you shall make me another shipment in rice, I answer dont exceed the above if you should receive from Rivers and others; but you shall remit, please let it be in rice or cash, or either, (no bills,) so pray apply all you may receive of my estate, of any person above this allowance to myself, to your own benefit, as directed by the instructions, immediately, and it will give me pleasure to hear you can help yourselves and families, who I esteem. Shew this to *Chisolm and Normand, as my requests to each of you are jointly."

*82

In another letter, dated 20th Feb. 1788, he says, "You hint the remitting me and giving me notice, in time to make insurance. I thank you, and should you do so, let it be only a moderate amount, even if you fortunately get payment of Rivers and others. I do not require more than you jointly think proper to send me; but as per my desire by instructions per Poinsett, I only wish to be kept free from any claim whatever to answer the two trifles at Bermuda. See the event of the amercement, and then divide part as in your power amongst yourselves, as directed, and in such mode as you jointly or by majority of two agree."

The attornies of Mr. Hamilton acted under these instructions, collected in some of the debts due to him, and made him some remittances, and divided among themselves some of the money collected. Not, however, being able to collect in all the monies due on the bonds of Mr. Hamilton, they thought themselves at liberty, under the instructions abovementioned, to divide among themselves, the bonds themselves. Accordingly on the 1st of May, 1788, they proceeded to make such division, and made an allotment of the bonds to the amount of about 4000l. sterling, as appeared by a paper headed "division of bonds, 1st May, 1788, the gift of P. Hamilton to I. Peace, N. M'Cleod, and A. Chisolm," specifying particular bonds to each individual.

It does not appear that any information of this division of the bonds was given to Mr. Hamilton, with whom, however, the attornies kept up a friendly correspondence.

Mr. Hamilton went to Europe from Bermuda, and resided in England; and in the course of time his resentments and prejudices against his nephew Mr. Paul Hamilton the younger, were softened, if not wholly removed; and he felt disposed to take him into favor, and to give him with others hereinafter mentioned, the benefit of that part *of his debts which had not been actually collected in, and divided by his attornies, according to his instructions in the year 1784. In pursuance of these intentions, he wrote a letter to I. Peace, A. Chisolm, and N. M'Cleod, dated London, 15th Sept. 1791, in the following words:

*83

Letter from P. Hamilton to I. Peace, A. Chisolm, and N. M'Cleod, dated

"London 15th September, 1791.

As time produceth all things, and a few years occasion changes among us of the human race, Divine Providence has spared me to live and see seven years since I sent my instruction from Bermuda by N. M'Cleod, for your conducting and settling my affairs, by calling in my debts, and distributing as directed then by said instructions, of which I have a copy in hand, experience has taught us and others, that the sanguine hopes entertained then, that law and justice would immediately after the peace succeed, and debtors be disposed to pay their debts, but that we have been mistaken.

I am now advanced in years, and reviewing the changes of circumstances since the date of the above instructions, the present situation of my relations in Carolina, and their issue and each particular as matters stand now with you there, and with me here, and well knowing your willingness to pardon my weakness, and to comply with my will; It is now as I conceive, I have latterly already expressed it, my will, that you, my attornies, Messrs. Peace, Chisolm, and M'Cleod, together with my three nieces Christiana, Dorcas and Ann, with my nephew Paul Hamilton, be equal partakers and sharers of all my debts due there, as well as due from Thomas Rivers, for my James Island land sold him, as all other debts of whatever kind. And that you, the said seven persons, shall enjoy equally and as speedily as the same can be collected in, or as you may mutually agree to divide the same debts among you.

My last will and testament executed here, corresponds with and expresses distinctly these my new instructions. You, my now three attornies, in case of my decease, are *then my executors for all my property in Carolina, while I nominate others here, so that each party is positively restrained from giving trouble, or meddling with the other. On my decease, my executors here are to transmit one of the two executed wills of the same tenour and date, with other papers to you, with a certain sum of money, also to be divided betwixt you and the said seven. Two drafts of my will I have executed for said purpose. No debts otherwise are to be claimed or paid in Britain from Carolina property—nor in Carolina from my property in Britain.—The above instructions and my said will and testament are my will, and I hope will be satisfactory to all concerned, and to the world before and after my death.

*84

Thus much my friends, which in all probability I may never change or alter while I live.

May we ever be enabled to say God's will be done.

Yours affectionately, Paul Hamilton."

This was accompanied by a letter of the same date to the same persons, and intended to be a more private communication. It is in the following words:

Copy of another letter from P. Hamilton to I. Peace, A. Chisolm, and N. M'Cleod, dated.

"London, 15th September, 1791.

You will readily see on your perusal of the instructions enclosed, that I wish to ease my mind, by trying to satisfy the world, and individuals also, especially now in age.

As it hath been impossible for you to collect in and distribute my pecuniary property as yet, as formerly instructed, I now mean to pass over the froward conduct of my junior name sake and nephew Paul Hamilton, and place him just equal with, and let him be one of you seven, as expressed, in taking one seventh of all that you, my attornies can collect in future, or may have lately collected.

Friend Peace to be made whole for his advance of amercement. No claim to be unpaid; divide what's due from Thomas Rivers, as well as all old accounts, amongst *you seven, mutually and equally, and as soon as you are able. Please let my nieces and Paul know this my desire. I wrote you some time ago of selling my house in Gibraltar Row, and of my purchase, and now residing in No. 4, Cumming Place, Pentonville, City Road, London. Please let this be your direction in future, &c. P. H."

*85

It does not appear that these letters were communicated by the attornies to Mr. Paul Hamilton, jun. Nor is there any proof that they expressed to their constituent Mr. Paul Hamilton, senr. that they were dissatisfied with his new instructions; or considered his first instructions as irrevocable, and conveying absolute rights to them.

Indeed it is certain that no such pretensions were set up during the life time of Mr. Hamilton, and made known to him, for in his letters to his nephew Paul Hamilton, (with whom he opened a correspondence) in 1793, 5, and 6, he tells him he hopes he will soon enjoy a seventh part of all his pecuniary property in South-Carolina. But it appears that the instructions of May, 1784, were not put on record until the instructions of September, 1791 were received; soon after which, to wit: in December, 1791, the former were placed on record, and not the latter. Mr. Paul Hamilton, the elder, died some time in the year 1798, and one of the attornies communicated to Mr. Paul Hamilton, jun. in a letter of 23d Oct. 1798, the will of his uncle, and the instructions of 1784.

Subsequent to the death of Mr. Hamilton, the attornies set up the pretence that the instrument or instructions of Mr. Paul Hamilton, in May, 1784, contained an immediate, absolute, and irrevocable gift to them—of the pecuniary property of the donor, whether collected on the bonds or not; and that they had made a division among themselves of the bonds in 1788, which was conclusive on all parties.

Mr. Paul Hamilton, jun. taking a different view of the subject, filed a bill in equity against Messrs. Isaac Peace, Alexander Chisolm, and Norman M'Cleod, to compel *them to account for those debts which had not been actually collected in and divided, before the new instructions of his uncle, in the year 1791. The answer denied the right of the complainant to call them to any account, and insisted on the absolute gift of the uncle in 1784.

*86

At the hearing, the instructions of 1784 and of 1791, were given in evidence. Also, many letters from Mr. Hamilton to his attornies, and some of their answers.

Also, his letters to his nephew Paul Hamilton, in 1793, 5, and 6—in which he expresses his hope that he would soon get a seventh part of his personal estate in Carolina.

Also, a paper, stating a division of all the bonds on which monies were due to Mr. Hamilton, made by the attornies among themselves, on the 1st May, 1788, allotting to each certain specified bonds.

Several witnesses were also examined. Mr. Glover testified, that Mr. Paul Hamilton the younger, took a very active part in favour of his country, in the revolutionary war. He entered the service at 16 or 17 years of age. It was known that Mr. Paul Hamilton and his uncle differed on politics; which created disgust and dislike in the mind of the uncle.

Mr. Rivers testified, that he was well acquainted with Mr. Paul Hamilton, the elder, and knows his hand writing. He proved the letters of 15th Sept. 1791, and those of 1793 and 1796, and the instructions, to be in the hand writing of Mr. Hamilton. The witness became a purchaser of part of Mr. Hamilton's property, to the amount of 1700 guineas, of which 700 were paid down, and the balance payable by instalments. He made some payments before 1791, and some since 1791, to Mr. M'Leod and Mr. Chisolm, who held the bonds.

Paul Hamilton, the uncle, lost his only child (a son) about the time the British troops invaded this state. He and his nephew differed in political opinions.

Mr. George Tunno testified, that he saw Mr. Paul Hamilton the elder, in London. He committed to the care of the witness certain papers, which he said were of *consequence, and which he read. The witness left England on the 1st October, 1791, and the papers were delivered to Mr. Peace, in Nov. 1791. The purport of these papers was that his blood relations should have his property equally. Witness informed Mr. Paul Hamilton, the nephew, of these facts. When the witness saw the elder Mr. Hamilton, it appeared that he had heretofore thrown off his nephew; and that this was on account of the decided part Mr. Hamilton, jr. had taken in favor of his country. He did not state to the witness in conversation that he had changed his mind as to his nephew.

*87

It was argued by Mr. Desaussure and Mr. Gaillard for the complainant, that this instrument, paper or instructions, of May, 1784, under which the defendants claimed the property of Mr. Hamilton, senr. as an absolute gift, irrevocable by the donor, was of a very doubtful and ambiguous nature. It certainly had some features of a deed, as well as some of a will. The writer himself heads it, instructions to his attornies, with directions for their conduct. But it is manifest that he and the defendants also considered the subject as under his control. They continue to correspond on the subject; and he did actually in 1791, make a different disposition of such of the debts as had not been actually collected, received and divided. And the attornies, though he lived many years afterwards, never disputed his power to do so, or remonstrated with him, as attempting to make a new disposition of what he had previously disposed absolutely to them.

This acquiescence shews the light in which they viewed the subject. They did not dare to avow to their friend, that they claimed the whole, and that he could not dispose of his own property. The court will the more readily give this construction to so doubtful a paper, when it is remembered that this prejudice and exclusion of a nephew, the nearest to him in blood, and bearing his name, was the wretched offspring of a miserable difference of political opinion, which shut up his heart against the merit of a distinguished relative, and excluded him from all share in *his fortune, for the benefit of persons, two of whom were entire strangers to his blood, and there was no valuable consideration given. And the conduct of the defendants, in concealing from the nephew, the uncle's altered temper and intentions towards him, which time and better feelings had brought about; and in concealing from the uncle their intention to resist his last instructions in favor of his nephew, and to claim the whole under the first instructions, does not entitle them to any favor. The court will therefore treat this paper of May, 1784, as an anomalous thing, of no distinct character: and consider it, as the maker of it manifestly did, a thing entirely under his control and revision. If so, it was revocable, and being so, has been revoked by the instructions of Sept. 1791.

*88

Papers of this doubtful kind, partaking partly of the nature of wills and partly of the nature of deeds, have been frequently construed wills. See 7 Bacon, 300. Title wills and testaments. Swinburn, p. 6. T. S. wrote a letter, which was construed to be a will. 1 Modern Rep. 117. A deed indented and executed between two parties, was construed a will. A deed referring to a will, is to be taken as a part of the will. This was the execution of a power. See Methuan v. Duke of Devon. 1 P. Wm's 529, 530. In Hodges v. Peacock, 3 Ves. jr. 735, a written paper, signed and entitled, "Instructions to my friends and executors," was considered as a part of the will, and proved with the will.

The court will mould the deed or instrument in such manner as to give effect to the true intentions of the donor. The court construed a feoffment to be a will, to give effect to the deed. See 2 Ves. jun. 226.

In Ousley v. Carrol, decided in the Prerogative Court, (noticed in 2 Ves. sen'r. 440,) a writing in the form of a deed, using the words, giving and granting, was construed to be a will. So in the case of Shargold v. Shargold, also decided by the Ecclesiastical Court, (see 2 Ves. sen'r. 440, 1.) a deed of gift, but not to take effect till the death of the maker, with sixpence delivered as a symbol, was de*cided to be a will. See also Swinburn on wills, part 1, sec. 10, page 74.

*89

But it was contended, that call this paper by what name you will, some acts were to be done directly; and the defendants were expressly directed to collect in the money due to Mr. Hamilton, and to divide it among themselves immediately; and that this has been done, as to the money collected, and also as to the bonds; which being in execution of an express order, is final and conclusive. This, however true it may be as to the money actually collected and divided, (and there is no wish to disturb that, under any name the paper may bear) cannot be available as to the bonds.

The power was to collect in and divide the money—not the bonds. The division of the bonds was a premature act, not done in pursuance of the power, and is void. All the bonds which remained uncollected, till the new instructions in Sept. 1791, must go in pursuance of these new directions.

Mr. Pringle and Mr. Cheves argued for the defendants.

The instrument or writing of 1784, is an absolute gift or grant. 2 B. Com. 440.

The requisites of a gift or grant, in the case of personal property, are words of transfer, possession, assent. 1 Pow. Mort. 27. 14 Viner, 19.

The previous gifts are not conditions, but trusts in the defendants pro tanto. The subsequent words relative to the collection and receipt of the debts, are only modal and directory, and create no condition. 1 Powell on Contr. 267.

The effect of these words is done away by the subsequent letters.

All dispositions of property are resolvable into the following:

1st. Absolute sales.

2d. Conditional estates.

*90

*If it be a conditional estate, yet it is not revocable. 2 B. Com. 441, 42.

The nature of a conditional estate is, that it shall be defeated only for a breach of the condition.

The caprice of the donor is not one of the conditions on which it is held.

Conditions are precedent or subsequent. The difference is stated in 2 Bla. Com. 154, 163.

If an interest depending on a condition precedent, has in any case been considered revocable, it was.

1st. In no case where an interest in a specific thing was conveyed, but in cases of contract.

2d. Where the contract had not been at all acted upon, or the condition in no sort or part performed.

3d. Where the conveyance only gave a naked power, not coupled with an interest.

4th. Where there was no consideration. 6 Viner, 482, 83.

But if the interest in the present case be conditional, it is so on a condition subsequent.

The condition is always subsequent, where possession, (the interest being a personal chattel or chose in action) attends the gift or grant.

Possession, with words expressing a gift or grant, conveys the interest immediately, and vests the estate, which is inconsistent with the nature of a condition precedent.—Such a condition would be repugnant to a vested interest, and void. 1 Pow. Contr. 262.

It is like a feoffment of land, with livery of seisin.

If possession did not carry an immediate and vested interest, then it would be a limitation, not a conditional estate, which would suppose a vested interest in some other person, having a particular previous estate, which could not be without possession.

If A. gives B. 20*l.* in hand, on condition that he go to Rome, and there transacts certain business on his account, this is a condition subsequent. But if A. promise B. 20*l.* on condition that he go to Rome, and there do cer*tain business on his account, this is a condition precedent.

*91

Possession in the one case, makes the difference.

But a condition subsequent, can not be annexed to personalty; and therefore the interest must be absolute.

Bac. Cond. (D.)

Condition subsequent, is founded on the idea of a reversion, of which there is none in personal property.

If this were considered as a contract, it is such an one as the donor would be compellable to perform. 2 Bl. Com. 441.

As to consideration, see 2 Bl. Com. 445. 1 Pow. Contr. 340, 43.

3d. Gifts causa mortis.

4th. Devises or bequests by last will.

By enquiring under which of these the present disposition does not come, we will ascertain under which it does come.

If an estate is not in its original grant or creation, so given as on some contingency to cease and determine, as in the case of conditional estates, or to shift, as in the case of a limitation, where, in the first case, it reverts to the donor, and in the second, it goes over to a remainder man, it will be absolute. See the case of Main and wife v. Dickinson, decided in this court.

The gift was absolute, and has been fully executed. It would be quite inconsistent to allow this to be revocable.

The grant being complete, and the property in possession of the donees, they were at liberty to divide the bonds as well as the money, when collected.

The court having taken time to consider, Chancellor RUTLEDGE afterwards delivered the decree of the court:

The questions in this case are whether the paper writing in the bill referred to, signed P. Hamilton, now deceased, dated 1st May, 1784, disposing of certain parts of his estate in this state to the persons therein named, was or was not of an executory nature, and revocable, or whether it was not absolute and indefeasible? And if revoca*ble, whether the instructions of Sept. 1791, did not absolutely revoke the former, at least as to such parts as had not been executed agreeable to the directions therein contained? As to its being of a testamentary nature, although from some of the technical expressions, it might be said to embrace that idea, yet as the acts to be done by the persons, were to be executed as speedily as possible, and in the lifetime of Mr. Hamilton, it cannot be considered as a testament or will; nor is it a deed, because it wants some of the requisites essential to a deed. In fact it is nothing more than what Mr. H. intended it to be, viz: Instructions to his attornies. Viewing it then in that light, it cannot but be considered in its nature, as altogether executory, and therefore countermandable or revocable. That Mr. H. looked upon it as revocable, appears upon the face of it; for at the beginning he calls it his instructions to his attornies, for their guide in conducting his concerns; and desires them to be executed as speedily as may be.—He then proceeds to direct what acts they are to do, all of which being done, he concludes with requesting that they do mutually agree to collect and receive in the rest of his personal estate, and as they receive, each to render an account to the other, and mutually divide the same equally among them, share and share alike. As a further proof that he, and the defendants also, considered the paper in no other light than as instructions, they write to him on the subject of his affairs; and he in his letters of July, 1786, and February, 1788, directs them what to do, and adds, to divide what they may receive as per instructions. As a more convincing proof that he thought he had still a controuling power over the acts of the defendants, and to dispose of such parts of his estate (his debts particularly) as had not been received; he by his instructions of Sept. 1791, directs his debts to be divided between his attornies, his three nieces, and the complainant, in equal shares, which instructions he accompanies with a letter to the defendants, to that effect, and by a letter of the same date to com'plt. he says he has wrote to his attornies, *and of which they no doubt would communicate his mind and desires to him as per instructions by Mr. Tunno. Then for the first time the defendants take the alarm; and immediately after the receipt of the letter and these instructions, they conceive the first instructions to be irrevocable, and have them put on record. What was their subsequent conduct? Did they acquaint the complainant with the contents of the new instructions? They did not. Did they remonstrate with their constituent on his change of sentiments, and set up a claim to that property, independent of his controul? We should suppose they did not. It is rather presumable that they seemed to acquiesce in conforming to the subsequent instructions, and kept him in the dark respecting their real intentions; for if they had held the same language to him, which they now do to complainant, it is impossible he could have wrote the subsequent letters that he did to complainant in the years 1793–5 and 6; particularly that of 1795, wherein he writes complainant that he hopes he will soon enjoy a seventh part of all his pecuniary property due here. There is a mystery in this business which ought to be developed. The defendants have carefully concealed the letters which were wrote to them by Mr. Hamilton, subsequent to July, 1788, and their answers thereto. They do not even pretend that they ever informed him that a division had taken place, which it was natural for them to have done. Such conduct was highly unbecoming towards their benefactor, and merits censure, and ought not to be countenanced or supported by the court. As therefore their claim is founded on the first instructions, it was incumbent on them to prove that they had literally complied with them, to entitle themselves to the benefits thereof. So far as they were executed previous to the receipt of the new, and conformable to the directions of the first instructions, those acts are undoubtedly good; but by making a division of the bonds, &c. instead of first collecting and receiving the money due on them, and then dividing it, they have totally deviated from their instructions. As there*fore the original bonds, &c. were still outstanding, and the monies had not been received and divided, when the new instructions were received by them, we are of opinion, that the first instructions were thereby countermanded and revoked, and therefore decree that the defendants do account for all such monies as they have received on account of the debts due their constituent, the late Paul Hamilton, deceased, subsequent to the receipt of the instructions of Sept'r. 1791, to be divided agreeably to those instructions. Costs to be paid by defendants.

*92

*93

*94

---

2 Desaus. 94

Case XII.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge and Marshall.]

CRUGER and Wife, and Others, v. THOMAS HEYWARD, Executor of Daniel Heyward, Dec., and Others.

(January, 1802.)

[Parent and Child ⊂⊃3.]

A father is bound to maintain and educate his minor son if he be of ability, though that son has a considerable estate aliunde: and he must account for the rents of his son's estate, though his own had been much injured by the war.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃3.]

[Wills ⊂⊃603.]

A devise of real estate to a son B.; but if he died without issue, to a grandson D. and his heirs for ever; the limitation over is not too remote; and the estate will go to the representatives of D. though he died before B.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in McCorkle v. Black, 7 Rich. Eq. 419, 420.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1353; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃603.]

[Wills ⊂⊃610.]

In a similar limitation of personalty, (in the same clause of the will) the first devisee B. takes the whole; and he dying without issue, it is distributable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1381; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃610.]

[Wills ⊂⊃686.]

A devise to D. and on his dying without issue, to the heirs of T. and W. D. died without issue, at which time T. had but one son, but has had other children since. According to the maxim that nemo est hæres viventis, the heirs of Thomas cannot be known till his death. On that event, his heirs will be entitled to a moiety of the estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1632; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃686.]

[Wills ⊂⊃506.]

[The word "heirs," used in a will, may be construed "children," where such was the evident intent of the testator.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1093; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃506.]

[Wills ⊂⊃590.]

[Where real and personal estate are bequeathed in the same clause of the will, with limitation over, the fact that they are named in the same clause will not affect the construction given to the bequest as to the different classes of property.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1293; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃590.]

Mr. Daniel Heyward made and duly executed his last will and testament on the 7th June, 1776, and made among other devises of his estate, the following dispositions:

He devised to his son Thomas, in trust for his, the tes*tator's grandson Daniel, his plantation on Savannah river, called Varnezober's with all the slaves thereon, till he attained the age of 21 years: then to him and his heirs for ever: Also, the slaves on the plantation where the testator resided, which were not otherwise disposed of. But if his grandson Daniel should die under age, then he gave the real and personal estate to the heirs at law of his son Thomas, when they should attain 21 years of age.

*95

He also devised to his son Thomas, in trust for his (the testator's) son Daniel, during his natural life, the use of the lands, slaves, stock, &c. enumerated in his will, viz. An island, called Callewashie, and sundry other tracts of land; also, his house in Beaufort, and several slaves: At the death of his son Daniel, the testator devised the lands to be divided between the heirs male of his body; and for want of such, between the heirs female;—and the slaves, between the heirs, male and female: but in case of no such heirs, then the land and slaves to be divided between the heirs of his (testator's) sons Thomas and William.

By another clause in his will, the testator devised the remainder of his estate real and personal, to his sons James and Nathaniel, to be equally divided between them.

He also gave to his son Thomas, and his other executors, "full powers to act, do with, and dispose of the yearly produce of his estate as they should think proper, for the benefit of his heirs abovementioned."

By a codicil, dated the 15th July, 1777, and duly executed, the testator devised to his son Benjamin, (who was born after the making his will,) the island called Callewashie, with the slaves, stock, &c. thereon. "But in case he die without issue, then he gave it to his grandson Daniel Heyward, and his heirs for ever."

By another codicil, dated the 28th July, 1777, and duly executed, the testator devised Coles island, (which was originally granted to Russell,) and the slaves thereon, to his son Thomas, in trust, for the use of testator's son Daniel, during his natural life; and at his death, the lands to be divided between the heirs male of his body, and for *want of such, between the heirs female; and the slaves between the heirs male and female: but in case of no such heirs, then the land and slaves to be divided between the heirs of his sons Thomas and William.

*96

The testator died in the month of October, 1777, leaving his said will and codicils in full force. His eldest son Thomas proved the will, qualified thereon as executor, and possessed himself of the estates of the testator.

The testator's son Daniel, died in the year 1778, without issue.

His son William married after his father's death, and died in the year 1786, leaving issue.

The testator's grand son Daniel, (son of Thomas,) died in the month of February, in the year 1796, having attained the age of 21 years, & leaving a widow and a daughter.

The son Benjamin died in September, 1796, under age, and without issue.

Mr. Thomas Heyward, the eldest son, and acting executor of the testator, educated and maintained his son Daniel, the grandson of the testator, who was so particularly provided for by the will; and afterwards had a number of other children by a second marriage. His fortune was greatly injured by the war, in which he took an active part, having been a member of congress at the time of the declaration of independence. But his affairs were not so reduced, but that he was able to support and educate his son Daniel, equal to his fortune under his grandfather's will.

The testator's grandson Daniel, made and duly executed his last will and testament a few days before his death, whereby he directed, that until his daughter Elizabeth M. Heyward should be married, or attain the age of 21 years, his wife should enjoy the profits of all his estate, if she remained so long his widow; and when his daughter should marry or attain 21 years, then the profits of the estate should be equally divided between his said daughter and his wife, as long as she should continue his widow.—But that immediately after the second marriage or death *of his wife, the rest, remainder, and residue of his estate should go to his daughter and her heirs forever. His daughter to be educated liberally out of the estate. The widow of the said Daniel Heyward proved his will, and qualified thereon as executrix; and some time in the year 1799, intermarried with Mr. Nicholas Cruger, complainant in this cause.

*97

Mr. and Mrs. Cruger have filed their bill against Mr. Thomas Heyward, the executor for an account and settlement of the rents and profits of the Varnezober estate, from the death of the testator to the time of the delivery of the plantation and slaves to his son Daniel, which took place three months before he was of age, in Feb. 1795.

The bill also insists, that on the death of Benjamin Heyward, (in Sept. 1796,) under age, and without issue, the Callewashie estate vested in the representatives of the grandson Daniel, according to the provisions of the will of the grandfather; and that the said Thomas Heyward, the executor, is accountable for the rents and profits from the death of the said Benjamin.

The bill further insists, that on the death of the testator's son Daniel, without issue, the Cole's Island estate which was devised (on that event occurring) to and among the heirs of the testator's sons Thomas and William, became the property of the children of William Heyward, and of Daniel, the only child of said Thomas, who was in existence at the death of testator's son Daniel, and the executor is accountable for the income of the estate.

The bill prays for an account and for relief, according to the rights of the complainants.

The defendant Thomas Heyward, in his answer, admitted generally the facts charged in the bill, with respect to the execution of the will and codicils stated, by his father Mr. Daniel Heyward, decd. and as to the members and state of the family. He stated that he had taken and held possession of the estates; but had given up the possession of Varnezober's to his son Daniel (the devisee) in the autumn of the year 1794; and that Daniel had drawn all the *profits of the crop of 1794, as well as of 1793. That his said son Daniel never required an account from him, and he believes never would have done so; and if he had, the defendant believed there would have been little or no balance due to him, because the plantation had been ruined and broken up by the war, and re-established slowly, and at great expense after the war; and because the defendant had paid all the expenses of the estate, as well as of his said son Daniel's education and support. That he took no discharge from his son, for he had never taken one from his younger brothers, when he delivered up their estates to them. The answer admits that the defendant's son Daniel died at the time stated, and left in full force his will, as stated by complainants; and that his widow qualified as executrix, and has since intermarried with Mr. Cruger.

*98

That Benjamin, the youngest child of defendant's father, died in Sept. 1796, under age, and without issue;—whereby a difficulty arises as to the Callewashie estate.—That said estate having been devised by defendant's father in case of Benjamin's death without issue, to the said Daniel, (son of the defendant) and he having died in Benjamin's life time, a question is made, whether the said estate vested in the heirs of said Daniel, or in the surviving residuary legatee.

That the Callewashie estate having been given in the first case to Benjamin, the income was employed for the use of Benjamin during his life, and a balance is due to defendant from the estate.

The defendant denies that the heirs of his son Daniel are entitled to any part of the estate which had been devised by defendant's father to his own son Daniel, and on the event of his death, without issue, (which had happened) to the heirs of testator's sons Thomas and William: because the maxim of law is, that nemo est hæres viventis; and defendant's son Daniel dying in the life time of defendant, neither he or his representatives are entitled.

Mr. N. Heyward's answer admitted the will of his fa*ther Mr. D. Heyward, and the facts stated in bill of complainants; but denies the claim of complainants to the Callewashie estate, and the crops thereof, as the limitation was too remote, and could not take effect in law; and that the death of Daniel Heyward, junr. (grandson of testator) during the life of Benjamin Heyward, prevented said devise from taking effect, and the said estate sunk into the residuum of the testator's estate, and passed under the residuary clause to this defendant; or became on Benjamin's death without issue, the property of his surviving brothers and sisters.

*99

Mr. and Mrs. Brailsford, (she being the testator's daughter Maria) in their answer admitted all the facts; and they set up a claim to a distributive share of the slaves bequeathed, with the Callewashie plantation to Benjamin Heyward, and in the event of his death, under age, and without issue, (which occurred,) then over to testator's grandson Daniel. They insisted that the estate vested in Benjamin, and that the limitation over to Daniel was too remote and void. Consequently on Benjamin's death, the negroes are distributable among Benjamins surviving brothers and sisters, of whom Mrs. Brailford is one.

At the hearing of the cause, Mr. Gaillard argued for the complainants.

The defendant Thomas Heyward has not pleaded any release in bar. He has none; and he must account for the rents and profits of the Varnezober estate; and he cannot charge the expense of his son Daniel's maintenance and education, as he (Thomas) was able to educate him out of his own estate. 1 Bro. Ch. Case 387. Hughes and Hughes.

The next question relates to Callawashie, and the negroes attached to it.

The word it, used in this will, is the word that ninety nine men out of an hundred would have used. In almost all the devises, he attaches the negroes to the lands:

*100

*The testator has also used the word it, carrying lands and negroes to Daniel, in the case of Varnezober's.

If then "it" has the extensive meaning of carrying negroes and lands in that case why not in the case of Callawashie. It is the same phrase.

There is no other clause, in the will, where "it" occurs, except in these two cases; and these are the only cases of single plantations.

The next point is, whether the limitation over Callawashie, and the negroes to Daniel, are too remote. The intent must guide, if consistent with rules of law. Fearne, 4th Ed. 371, on Con. Rem. The words of the will must be construed to mean, "a dying without issue, living Benjamin," at least as to personalty. See also Fearne, 356—Court is enclined to lay hold of any circumstances to confine the dying without issue, to dying without issue, living at death of devisee. 2 Fonb. 93. The court anxiously hunts for circumstances to tie up the dying without issue, within the permissible limits.

There is no real difference between dying without issue, and dying without leaving issue, and the cases which distinguish them, are frivolous. For the construction of the words, "dying without issue," see these cases; 1 P. Wm's. 564, Pinbury v. Elkein. Ibid, 432, Target v. Gaunt. Ibid. 534, Hughes v. Sayer. Ibid, 666, Forth v. Chapman.

The same words used in the same will may be construed differently, as to real and personal estates. There are sufficient words of restriction in this will. Fearne 355.

If the devisee dies under 21, then the testator gives it over, this is a good limitation; and the 21 years makes no difference. Fearne 359. The word "then" is sufficient to restrict. But there are cases contrary to this. 2. Atkins, 308. Beauclerk v. Dormer.

If the court construe the word "then" as sufficiently restrictive, it will give entire operation to the will. If otherwise, not. 1 Bro. Ch. C. 188, 190. Bigge v. Bensley, was decided against the Chancellor's opinion, and *yielded to the authority of Lord H. in Dormer v. Beauclerk. He does not rely solely on the word then. But on other words of the will. 3 Burr. 1622. The intention is to prevail, if consistent with the rules of law. 3 Burr. 1634. In construing a will, the words supplied must be to support the intent; not to the defeat.

*101

In 1 D. and East, 593, Judge Ashurst's opinion was, that an express legal limitation is conclusive. But if it be only by implication, then the court may follow the intent. 3 P. Wms. 259. Atkinson v. Hutcheson.

In the case before the court, there is only an implied estate tail in Benjamin.

As to Callawashie itself, the will contains a good devise over. The Statute de donis is not of force.

It is then a fee simple, conditional at common law, in Benjamin. It will then go over to Daniel. 2 Black. 109, doctrine of fees conditional at common law. Benjamin having a conditional fee, he might have made it absolute; but did not. The testator, if the condition was not performed, might enter. Testator has given over to Daniel, this right of entry, and he takes it, and his representatives are entitled to hold. See Powell on devises, 31.

The residuary devisee cannot take; for the words rest, residue, and remainder, are relative terms, and mean what was not given.

The next point relates to the devise of Cole's Island, or Russell's, &c. &c. to his (the testator's son) Daniel and the heirs of his body, male and female, as expressed in the will. "But in case of no such heirs, then the said land between the heirs of my sons Thomas and William for ever, and also the slaves."

The word "heirs" in this will is synonymous with children.

His use of the words "male and female heirs," shews he meant children, not heirs at law, in the technical sense.

If the words heir at law are meant technically, then the *daughter of Daniel, the testators grandson is the heir at law of the original testator.

*102

The children living at the death of Daniel Heyward, the testators son, are the persons truly entitled.

The last clause of the will shews in what sense the testator uses the word heirs. The income is to be improved for his "heirs," by which he meant, children. 1 P. Wms. 564, Pinbury v. Elkeins. Limitation over is good in this case.

Estate directed by the will to be divided among the children of Thomas and William. These words from a sufficient limit. Fearne, 368. Keily v. Fowler.

To extend it beyond these would make the limitation too remote and void. Therefore the court will construe it living at the death of Daniel, the son; to let in Daniel the grandson.

But if the court thinks the limitation of Callewashie as to the negroes, was too remote, then the estate vested in Benjamin: And if so, is distributable, and complainants are entitled to a share. Fearne, 345, Con. Rem. Ibid, 368, Beauclerk and Dormer. Ibid, 374.

Mr. Parker also argued the cause, but I have no accurate note of his argument.

Mr. Desaussure on behalf of the defendant Thomas Heyward, argued as follows:

The questions which arise, are the following:

1st. Respecting the devise of Varnezober's on Savannah river, and the slaves thereon, to testator's grandson Daniel. An account is demanded of the rents and profits. Are the complainants entitled?

2d. The devise by the codicil of 15th July, 1777, whereby testator gave Callewashie, and the slaves, &c. thereon to his son Benjamin; but in case he died without issue, then he gave it to his grandson Daniel, and his heirs for ever—Who are entitled, on Ben's death without issue, to Callewashie and the slaves?

3d. The devise by the codicil of 28th July,

*103

1777, where*by testator gave his tract of land originally granted to Stephen Russell, (called Cole's Island) to his son Daniel, under the same limitations as he had given other property to said son Daniel, by his will: also the negroes thereon.

Who are entitled under this clause? As to the first question, we admit the devise to the grandson Daniel of Varnezober, and the slaves. And we admit that defendant Thomas Heyward qualified and acted as executor.

We state the circumstances which prevented crops, and the improvement of Varnezober; the delivery of the property to the grandson Daniel, and his acquiescence, without an account. The answer explains the causes of this acquiescence. They were, because of the injuries done to Varnezober by the enemy; and of its desolate and unproductive state, and its renovation by T. Heyward.

2d. The second question arises respecting Callewashie, and the negroes thereon, and the crops thereof, since Benjamins death.

The complainants claim being for Callewashie and the negroes and the crops—let us examine by the words of the devise,

1st. What was intended to be passed?

2d. Whether if intended to be passed, the limitation is not too remote?

3d. Whether Benjamin had not such a vested interest, as gave him the crops?

1st. The words are to his son Benjamin, Callewashie, with all the slaves, &c. thereon. "But in case he die without lawful issue, then I give it to my grandson Daniel, his heirs and assigns for ever."

The word it, clearly refers to Callewashie, and to that alone; to read it so, it is correct and proper. To make it refer to land and negroes, would be extravagant. The mere force then of the word it, does not carry the negroes.

If this reasoning be correct, then the complainant must resort to some supposed intent. It may be argued that he considered the negroes attached to the lands, and so meant them to pass by the word it, with the land.

*104

But we have *no reason to think so. For in many of the limitations over, he separates the lands and the negroes. See the will, and particularly the limitations over. And where he does not separate them, he gives them distinctly, naming both. See instances in the will marked; and there is only one instance to the contrary.

The law does not give such enlarged meaning to words so limited.

A gift of the "overplus of the estate," to a man's wife, carries only the personal estate. 2 Eq. Ca. Abr. 320, sec. 7. A man possessed of 5 messuages, devises 4 of them; and all the overplus of his estate to be at his wife's disposal. The 5th messuage did not pass. 2 Eq. Ca. Abr. 320, sec. 8.

A devise of all goods, do not pass books, jewels, pictures, &c. 2 Eq. Ca. Abr. 322, sec. 12.

A person seized of lands in fee in A. and possessed of a term for years in B. devises all his lands, tenements and real estate in A. and B. to C. and his heirs. This will not pass the term. 2 Eq. Ca. Abr. 326, sec. 34. 3 P. Wms. 26, Rose v. Bartlet. Cro. Car. 293. Chapman v. Hunt, 1 Vesey, 271, 2, 3.

2d. If it was intended by the testator to pass both land and negroes to his grandson Daniel, whether the limitation over is not too remote for either or both?

A personal estate was devised to A. and in case she died without issue, then to B. Resolved that the devise over to B. is void, and the whole decreed to A.

2 Eq. Ca. abr. 322. Sec. 10.

Devise to one and his issue, or to one, and if he die without issue, remainder over to another, the devise over is void; and the whole vests in first devisee.

Ibid, sec. 14; see sec. 30, 1, p. 325; sec. 39, p. 327.

The word "issue," takes in all issues in infinitum. 1 Vesey, 200, 1, 2.

When once an estate, (which in real estate would be an estate tail) vests in the first taker, that instant all the subsequent limitations became void. 1 P. Wms. 98. See *note (1) to case of Higgins v. Dowler. See 4 Vesey, jun. 717. See the case of Beauclerk v. Dormer. 2 Atk. 308 and 376. 1 Burr. 272, 3. 1 Vesey, jun. 286, Everest v. Gell. 3 Vesey, jun. 99, (in point,) Chandless v. Price. 2 Bro. C. C. 33, Glover v. Strotoff. Fearn. Ex. Devises, 167, 230, 249. 2 Fonbl. 72, 81, 2.

*105

It is a rule that when a contingency is limited to depend on an estate of freehold, which is capable of supporting a remainder, it shall never be construed to be an executory devise, but a contingent remainder. Fearn. Ex. Dev. 16, 17, 203, 5.

Executory devises are essentially different from contingent remainder, 50, 1, 73, 7, 8, 9.

Limit of executory devises as to real or personal, 82.

Wherever an executory devise is limited to take effect, after a dying without heirs, or without issue, subject to no other restriction, the limitation is too remote and void.

Fearn. Ex. Dev. 116, 144, 154, 167, 171, 4.

Exceptions to the rule, 179, 180, 182, 186, 187, 8, 190, 1, 197, 200.

The words of a will must be read with reference to the rules of law. Fearne 243.

The principal cases for complainant are 3 P. Wms. 262, Atkinson v. Hutchinson. 1 P. Wms. 98, Higgins v. Dowler. 1 P. Wms. 663, Forth v. Chapman. Ibid, 747, Pleydall, See note, p. 750. But they do not apply, or have been overruled by other decisions.

If as I have contended, the testator did not intend to pass the negroes by his codicil to his grandson Daniel, or the words do not pass them, or the limitation is too remote, then arises the question—did the estates vest in Benjamin, and on his death, are they now distributable among Thomas, Nathaniel, William's children, and Mr. and Mrs. Brailsford; or do they pass by the residuary clause to Mr. Nathaniel Heyward?

See 4 Vesey, junr. 708–9. 716. Brown v. Higgs.

"General residuary clause passes all that is not sufficiently disposed of, as in case of lapse." Testator has given *to the residuary legatee all that is not sufficiently disposed of.

*106

A leased house, the bequest of which being to a charity, fails, passes under a general disposition of the residue, and does not belong to the next of kin as undisposed of.—See 4 Vesey, jun. 732–5. Shanly v. Baker.

A legacy out of the produce of Copyhold estate, directed to be sold, failing, was held to pass by the residuary clause against the heir. 4 Ves. 802, Kennel v. Abbot.

Residuary bequest of personal estate includes every thing, as a void legacy or one lapsed. 1 Vesey, 320–1–2. Durour v. Motteux.

But it may be objected that these cases all go on the ground of a total failure of the legacy. Whereas there was a disposition which took effect, that the estate (Callewashie and negroes) was vested in Ben; and it is only the limitation over to Daniel, which is too remote and void.

Answer—It is of no consequence how it fails. The devise and bequest to Benjamin had ran its course. He had but a life estate in the first disposing part. The very claim of the next of kin is, that the limitation over has failed—therefore they claim. But the law is, that on failure of a legacy, the residuary legatee takes. (Sed vide, the cases which say the first taker of personal estate, takes all.)

As to the crops and income of the Callewashie estate, from the death of the testator to the time the contingency happened, and the estate vested, they clearly belonged to Benjamin, or at least he was entitled to a maintenance out of the income. It was a devise from a father to his son, and that son had no other maintenance or means of support. The court would have allowed the income to be so applied, if requested, and it will sanction what has been done by the executor. Even in the case of parents who are bound to provide for their families, the court will authorize the education and maintenance of a child out of the estate devised to him, if the father be incapable of doing it.

But Benjamin had no father living, nor no other estate, *the income of which could be applied to his use during his minority. It would be very hard to starve him who was the direct object of the devise, for the remainder man. In such a case the court will be anxious to relieve Benjamin. See 1 Wilson, 140. 4 Burn's. E. L. 314. 1 P. Wms. 783, Acherly v. Vernon; 2 P. Wms. 21, Harvey v. Harvey; 1 Bro. P. C. 228. 1 Bro. C. C. 119, 298. 2 Bro. C. C. 75. 3 Bro. C. C. 90, 471. 3 Bro. P. C. 337.

*107

The devise over is not an invincible objection to Benjamin's taking the profits. 2 P. Wms. 21. 2, 419, 504. 2 Atk. 473. Amb. 448. 1 Bro. C. C. 82, 104. Maintenance is so much regarded that the principal is sometimes allowed to be broken in upon. 1 Vern. 255. 2 P. Wms. 22.

We come now to the third great question.

The consideration of the devise of the land, (Cole's island) and the bequest of the slaves thereon to the testator's son Daniel, by the codicil of 28th July, 1777. The words are—"my island or tract of land, (called Cole's island) originally granted to S. Russell, I give to my son Daniel, in the manner mentioned in my above said will, together with the slaves, stock, &c."

This refers us to the words of the will, where the testator disposes to his son Daniel as follows—

"I will to my son Thomas, in trust for my son Daniel, during his natural life, the use of the following land, slaves, stock, &c. thereon, and thereunto belonging; and at his death I give them to be divided by my executors hereinafter named, the land between the male heirs of his body lawfully begotten, and for want of such, between the female; and the slaves, &c. between both male and female, and their heirs for ever, viz. One tract of land or island, called Callewashie, containing 550 acres, (various other tracts); one Mustee fellow Dick, and one fellow Jemmy, with one fourth of stores and lot at Cook's landing, Oaketty; but in case of no such heirs, then the said land between the heirs of my sons Thomas and William for ever; and also the slaves."

*108

*The son Daniel having died without leaving issue, the property will go under the said clause of the will.

We insist that the complainants cannot take, as representing the grandson Daniel; for he cannot be considered the heir of his father whilst living. Nemo est hæres viventis. 2 Bla. Com. 169. See the cases on this point.—Fearn. Con. Rem. 389. Fearn. Ex. Dev. 77, 8, 9. 1 Co. Rep. 66. Archer's case; A devise to Robert, remainder to the next male heir of Robert, and to the heirs male of the body of that heir male. This is resolved to be a contingent remainder during the life of Robert.

Now there was more designatio personæ in this case than in Mr. Heyward's, where there can be no pretence of a designatio personæ. Co. Litt. 246. Fearn. Ex. Dev. 18, 22. See 2 Fonbl. 72, 77, 80, 93, 149, 73. Fearn. Con. Rem. 389, 392, margin 456. 1 Inst. 378.

Remainder may fail as to one moiety, and be good as to another. Fearn. Con. Rem. 391, 2, 3, 394, 5, 6.

Where goods are devised to A. for life, and after her death to the heir of D. he who was heir of D. at his death, is entitled. 1 Vernon, 35.

For cases of designatio personæ, which prevent the operation of the maxim, nemo est hæres viventis. See 2 Ventris, 313. 2 P. Wms. 340. 1, 2.

It turned on the words "now living."

If we should be answered that though Mr. Daniel Heyward, jun. could not be the heir of his father Thomas then living, and who has actually survived him, these words of the will may be construed into a designatio personæ, and he and they claiming under him, may take in this way.

We reply that the cases decided are totally unlike this. The testator did not intend it so, for he has made many such limitations in his will, where the persons spoken of had no children living. In the case of William, he limits in the case of his dying without heirs of his body, his estates to the heirs of his sons Thomas and Daniel—and Daniel had then no child, and never had any.

*109

*In the case of testator's grandson Daniel, he limits, in case he dies under age, the real and personal estate given him to the heirs at law of his son Thomas, when they should attain 21. He knew then that Thomas had no other child than Daniel. Thus it appears to be used by the testator as a general phrase, and not as a designatio personæ. And the maxim applies, "nemo est hæres viventis."

On examining the cases where by a designatio personæ, the maxim, nemo est hæres viventis ceases to apply, it will be found that there is something very special in them all.

In some it will be found that the words, "heir now living," qualified the case. 2 Vent. 313, 311. 1 P. Wms. 229.

In others a provision was intended expressly for children, and the words "heirs of the body" have been construed children. 2 P. Wms. 340, 1, 2. See also 1 P. Wms. 229, 233. 2 Bla. Rep. 1010.

In this particular case the testator says, "but in case of no such heirs, then the said land between the heirs of my sons Thomas and William for ever, and also the slaves."

That he did not mean to designate Thomas's son Daniel by the words "heirs of my sons Thomas," is evident from this, that he uses the same words with regard to William, who was then unmarried, and had no lawful issue. And so in another clause, "between the heirs of my sons Thomas and Daniel."

Another circumstance to shew that testator, when speaking of his son Thomas's heirs at law, had not a particular living child in view is, that in the devise of Varnezober to his grandson Daniel, (son of Thomas) he goes on and says, that if Daniel dies under age, he gives it to the heirs at law of Thomas.

Chancellor RUTLEDGE afterwards delivered the decree of the Court.

In this case there are three questions for consideration.

*110

*1st. Whether the defendant, T. Heyward as trustee under the will of his father, must account for the profits of the estate (called Varnezober's,) devised to his son Daniel, or whether they should be applied towards his maintenance and education, during his minority?

2d. Whether the limitation over, of the plantation, called Callewashie, and the negroes, after the death of Benjamin without issue, is good, or whether it is not too remote and void?

3d. The testator devised certain lands and negroes to his son Daniel during life, afterwards to be divided between his heirs male and female, as therein particularly mentioned, and in case of no such heirs, then the lands to be divided between the heirs of his sons Thomas and William for ever; & also the slaves. Daniel died without issue. The question is, whether Daniel, the son of T. Heyward, when in life, or his representative, is alone entitled to a moiety of the estate so devised to Thomas's heirs; T. Heyward being still alive.

Upon the first question there can be no doubt but that the defendant being a trustee, must account for the profits of the estate, (called Varnezober's) during his sons minority. Although the court are fully impressed with the idea that the defendant's son might never have called him to an account, and we feel the strongest inclination under the particular circumstances of this case to direct that the profits of the estate should be applied towards his sons maintenance and education, yet as it has not appeared in the discussion of this case that the defendant was unable to maintain and educate his son, and as the cases in the books are pointedly against such allowance being made (even in cases where an allowance is directed by the will) where the father is of ability to do it, we think we are bound by such decision, and cannot decree the profits to be applied for such maintenance. The cases in this court, where maintenance has been allowed, have all gone upon the principle that the fathers were not in a situation to afford *a suitable maintenance to their children. However under the peculiar circumstances of this case, we think it is both just and equitable, that defendant be at liberty to bring in to account by way of discount, a charge for the work and labour of such of his negroes as he employed in erecting buildings and otherwise improving and putting in order the plantation belonging to his son.

*111

As to the second question, respecting the limitations over of the Callewashie plantation and negroes after the death of Benjamin without issue, it has been contended for complainant that Benjamin had only a conditional fee in the lands, and the reversion remaining in the testator, he might dispose thereof on the contingency of Benjamin's dying without issue, and therefore that the devise over to Daniel and his heirs was good. That the bequest of the negroes being in the same clause, they were attached to the lands, and the same construction ought to hold, respecting them; and that the words, in case he should die without lawful issue, should be construed as restricting the limitation to the dying without issue, at the time of his death; so that the limitation over of the personal estate is not too remote; that the court will lay hold of any circumstance, the most trivial to restrict those words, to the dying without issue, at the time of the death of the first devisee, to effectuate the intention of testator. That it was apparent from the words of the will that the testator intended the lands and negroes should go the same way by his coupling them together.

For defendant it was insisted that Benjamin had only an estate for life, or at most a fee conditional by implication in the lands; and that Daniel the grandson, dying in his life time, the devise over could never take effect: that it therefore became a part of the residuary estate, to which the defendant N. Heyward was entitled by virtue of the residuary clause in testator's will; that the words of the clause ought not to be restricted to Benjamin's dying without leaving issue at his death, being general and unlimited; and therefore that in this case, the absolute property *in the personal estate vested in Benjamin, and must be distributed according to law: that where the words in a will disposing of real estate, would give the devisee an estate tail expressly or by implication, the same words used in a disposal of personal estate, would vest the absolute property in the first taker.

*112

The importance of this question arises more from the magnitude of the object in contest, than any great intricacy in it. The subject has been most elaborately discussed, and almost every case that could be found has been brought forward by the counsel. The infinite number of them tend more to perplex than elucidate the subject, and to shew the various opinions that have been entertained by the courts respecting such devises, and how anxious they have been to lay hold of any words in a will however trivial to discover the intentions of testator, and restrain the words dying without issue, to mean dying without issue living at the death of the first taker, in order to give efficacy to the devise over. This devise includes both real and personal estate, and therefore two questions arise out of it. 1st.—What estate Benjamin took in the lands, and 2d, what in the personal estate? There is no doubt if the statute of intails was of force in this state, but that Benjamin would have had an estate tail in the land; for it is laid down clearly in the books, that if lands are devised to one, and if he die before, or without issue, or not leaving issue, it is devised over, these limitations create an estate tail: but that statute not being of force, the estate he took was a fee conditional at common law; the reversion of the estate still remaining in the testator, which he had a right to dispose of, and which he has done in this clause to his grandson Daniel and his heirs. It therefore can never be considered as a part of testator's residuary estate undisposed of by will, to which defendant Nathaniel is entitled, but must go to the legal representative of Daniel. As to the 2d question, respecting the personal estate, it is clearly settled, that where the words in the case of a real estate would give an estate tail, or an estate in fee conditional, a *limitation of personal estate by the same words, will pass the whole interest therein, unless there are some circumstances in the will which confine the generality of the expression, dying without issue, to the dying without issue then living, or living at the death of the first taker. If, however, there are no circumstances apparent to shew it was the intention of the testator to restrain the generality of those words, such devise over has been held void as being too remote. In almost all the cases previous to Beauclerk and Dormer, there were some circumstances in the will which confined the generality of the expression to dying without issue then living, or without leaving issue. In that case which seems to have settled the point, the words were general. "I make Miss Dormer my sole heir and executrix, and if she die without issue, then to go to Beauclerk; and the devise over was held to be void. In the case before us, the words are general: the devise is of Callewashie, with the negroes to Benjamin, but in case he die without lawful issue, then to my grandson, Daniel and his heirs. It runs upon all fours with the case of Beauclerk and Dormer, and there is no one circumstance in this that occurred in the others. We are therefore of opinion, that the whole interest in the personal estate vested in Benjamin, and it must be distributed agreeable to law.

*113

The third question is on the devise over to the heirs of Thomas and William, of the estate devised to the testator's son Daniel, on his dying without issue. Upon this clause of the will, the single question is, which of the children of the defendant Thomas are to take? From the confused and inaccurate penning of this will in several of the clauses, it is with the greatest difficulty that the testator's meaning can be come at, and it is only by referring to another part of the will, that we can with any degree of certainty ascertain that he means children, when he speaks of heirs; because in the legal acceptation of the word heir, a man can have but one heir, and he cannot be known till his father's death. The clause we refer to is that, where*in he directs his executors to dispose of the produce of his estate for the benefit of his heirs, which word, in the case of Beauclerk v. Dormer, the court construed to mean children.

*114

All cases on the construction of wills, depend on the particular penning of the wills themselves, and the state of the families to which they relate. If we take into consideration therefore, the situation of the testator's family at the time of making his will, it will be found that his son Thomas had only one child, and that his son William was unmarried. The benefit intended by the testator, to their heirs was clearly future and contingent; because till the death of his son Daniel without issue, nothing was given to the children of Thomas and William; till then, nothing vested.

When the testator's son Daniel died, Thomas had but one child, (at least it is not stated that he had another alive) and William had not any; therefore the estate could not then vest; but it having been given to Thomas in trust, he continued in possession till the death of William, at which time it was ascertained who were the persons meant to be provided for by the testator; a division was accordingly made, and William's representatives received their moiety of the estate so devised. We have reviewed with accuracy most of the cases cited on this point, but do not think that they apply to the present. In some of them it has been determined that children born after testator's death could not take, unless there be a prior bequest of the estate for the life of another, (which is the present case.) In that case, all the children born in the life of the tenant for life will take: but in this case none of the persons intended to be benefited by the devise were in esse at the death of testator or tenant for life, except Daniel, the grandson, who could not by any construction answer the description, or be within the intention of the testator, who undoubtedly had likewise in view, the future children of his sons Thomas and William. We are therefore of opinion, that Thomas being still living, it is uncertain how many *children he may have who will be entitled to share the other moiety of the estate in question. Until his death, therefore, no division can take place. On that event the representative of his son Daniel will come in for his proportion.

*115

It is therefore ordered and decreed that the defendant Thomas do account for the profits of his son Daniel's estate, (Varnezober's) during the time he had the management thereof, and be allowed in discount a reasonable compensation for the work and labor of such of his negroes as he employed in erecting buildings and otherwise improving his son's plantation. That a reasonable allowance be charged for the use of the Callewashie plantation from Benjamin's death: that the negroes belonging to Benjamin, be distributed among those who are entitled thereunto agreeable to law.

That the defendant Thomas do retain in his possession the moiety of the estate which was devised to his heirs by the testator, on the event of testator's son Daniel dying without issue.

Costs to be paid out of the estate.

---

2 Desaus. 115

Case XIII.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge and Marshall.]

ELIAS LYNCH HORRY, and HENRY DEAS and MARGARET, His Wife, v. THOMAS HORRY and ANN, His Wife.

(January, 1802.)

[Wills ⇐462.]

The Court may supply words omitted in a deed, providing for children, to give effect to the intention. But the intention must be clear, and apparent on the face of the deed. It would be too hazardous to insert words on conjecture that they were accidentally omitted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 981; Dec. Dig. ⇐462.]

[Deeds ⇐132.]

[Under a deed conveying a life estate, with remainder "to the only use and behoof of the survivor of" two daughters of the grantor, the children of a daughter dying before the decease of the life tenant have no title, as against the other daughter, surviving the life tenant.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 372; Dec. Dig. ⇐132.]

[Husband and Wife ⇐31.]

[By a postnuptial settlement, husband and wife conveyed land of the wife to trustees in trust for the husband and wife, and the survivor of them, for their lives and the life of the survivor, and, on the death of the survivor, to the use of A. and B., children of the aforesaid parties, "and their heirs and assigns, forever," in case they should both be living at the death of the surviving parent; but, if either of the said children should die before the surviving parent, then, on the death of such parent, to the use of the surviving child and his heirs and assigns, forever. A. having died before the survivor of the parents, it was held that B. took the whole estate in fee.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 193; Dec. Dig. ⇐31.]

The complainants filed their bill in this Court, setting forth that Mrs. Elizabeth Branford, grandmother of complainants was possessed of two lots of land at the cor*ner of Tradd and Meeting streets; that she joined her husband, the late William Branford, in conveying the said land to F. Rose and John Miles, in fee, on the trusts and to the uses following, viz: To the use of Wm. Branford and wife during life, and to the survivor for natural life, in case their children Elizabeth and Ann, should be both living at the time of the death of the surviving parent to them jointly. But in case of the death of either of the said children before the death of the surviving parent, then to the surviving child for ever; and in case of the death of both children before the death of the surviving parent, then if there should be any other subsequent issue to that issue, or in default of such, to the surviving parent absolutely.

*116

That William Branford died, leaving alive his said widow and said daughters.

That his said daughter Elizabeth married in 1770, Elias Horry, by whom she had issue, the complainants E. L. Horry and Peggy Horry, now Mrs. Deas. That the daughter Ann married Thomas Horry in 1771. That Elias Horry died 11th Feb. 1785. That Mrs. Elizabeth Horry died in 1785, leaving her will, dated 10th June, 1785, by which she devised all her estate to her three children, who are the complainants.

That Mrs. E. Branford shortly after the death of her husband entered into the possession of her house, and had the use of it till her death, on 24th March, 1801. That soon after Mrs. Branford's death, Thomas Horry, (defendant) claimed the whole lot of land and house aforesaid, in right of his wife, who he contends is alone entitled to the same, as she survived Mrs. Branford; whereas complainants insist that it could never from any equitable construction be inferred that by the said trust deed, the issue of the deceased daughter were intended to be deprived of the share of said house, due to their mother, had she been living at the time of the death of the surviving parent.

That said Elizabeth Horry attaining 21 years, and having issue, she was cestui que use of a joint estate in re*mainder, upon the death of said Elizabeth Branford; and that the same was severed and passed by the said residuary clause of her said will. That complainants have applied to Thomas Horry and F. Rose, heir at law of said F. Rose, surviving trustee, to concur in having the house and lot partitioned or divided in severalty according to their several rights, and one moiety given to complainants. That defendant has refused to comply, and F. Rose is unwilling to act without the sanction of the court. The bill prays for a division of house and lot, and equal distribution thereof be allotted to complainants.

*117

The defendants in their answer admitted all the facts stated in the bill; but they insist that they are exclusively entitled to the house and lot in question, under the deeds referred to by the complainant; the said Ann being the surviving daughter of Wm. Branford and his wife; and that this was the opinion of Mrs. Elizabeth Branford, the mother, who informed these defendants of it; and this perhaps was the consideration which induced her to bequeath her estate principally to the complainants. And defendant also understood, that for some time the complainants gave the same construction to the said deeds, and made no opposition to the claims of the defendant under the said deeds.

The following is an abstract of the deed on which the question in this case arose. It was a deed executed on the 23d May, 1754, by Wm. Branford and Elizabeth his wife, to Francis Rose and John Miles, in fee, but on the trusts and to the uses hereinafter stated.

The deed recited that Elizabeth Branford was seized in fee of certain lots of land on the north side of Tradd street (and describes them) under the will of her uncle, Benjamin Savage, dated 26 April, 1750.

That Elizabeth Branford being so seized, intermarried with Wm. Branford, and that they then had issue, two daughters, Elizabeth and Ann Branford.

*118

*Whereupon, in consideration of 10s. and of the love and affection William Branford and Elizabeth his wife bear to their two said children; and for settling said lots of land to the uses therein declared, they the said W. B. and Elizabeth his wife, did "grant, bargain, sell, alien, remise, release, and confirm to F. Rose and John Miles, and their heirs and assigns for ever, (being in their possession under a lease) all the two lots of land, &c. (No. 87 S.) with the houses, &c.

To have and to hold said lots, &c. to the said Rose and Miles, their heirs and assigns, upon the trusts and to the uses and purposes therein mentioned and declared, that is to say:

1st. For the use of W. Branford and Elizabeth his wife, during their joint lives.

2d. To the use of the survivor.

3d. On death of the survivor, to the use of Elizabeth and Ann Branford, the said infants, their heirs and assigns for ever, in case they should both be living at the decease of the survivor of them the said W. B. and E. his wife. "But in case either of them the said Elizabeth Branford and Ann Branford, the infants, should die before the survivor of them, the said W. B. and E. his wife, then at the decease of the survivor of them, the said W. B. and E. his wife, to the only proper use and behoof of the survivor of them the said E. Branford and Ann Branford the infants, living at the decease of the survivor of them the said W. Branford and Elizabeth his wife, and to the heirs and assigns of such survivor of the said E. and A. Branford the infants, for ever."

But in case neither of them the said E. and A. Branford, the infants should be living at the death of the survivor of them the said W. B. and E. his wife, yet, if said E. B. (the wife of W. B.) should leave other issue of her body, begotten by said W. B. and living at the decease of the survivor of the said W. B. and E. his wife, then to the only use and behoof of such other issue for ever. In *default of such issue, to the use of the survivor of the said W. B. and E. his wife.

*119

Signed by W. Branford.
Elizabeth Branford.

In the presence of Samuel Perronneau &
Thomas Lamboll.

This deed was followed by the execution of another deed, by the said Elizabeth Branford, on the 27th May, 1754, before Peter Leigh, the then chief justice of the colony, by which she renounced her inheritance in the said lots of land, in the form then in use —to the purposes of the trust deed.

The cause came to a hearing. Mr. Desaussure and Mr. Pringle argued for the complainants.

The construction of trust deeds must be governed as in wills, by the intention, which is the great guide.

Fearne's Devises 304, 5. 2 P. Wms. 478—(note) 3 Vesey, junr. 732.

Fearn. Cont. Rem. 124, 156. 4th Ed. 343, &c.

1 Fonblanque 395, 6, 434, 438.

The court will construe a settlement according to the intent of the parties, though the literal expression be otherwise.

3 Bro. Chan. Cases, 569, Woodcock v. Dorset, which is strongly applicable to this case.

Cro. Car. 185. Fearn. Ex. Dev. 53. Spalding v. Spalding.

A. devised land to his son John, and the heirs of his body, after the death of Alice, the devisor's wife. And if John died, living Alice, then his (testator's) son William shall be his heir.

John died living Alice; but he left issue. Question—If the issue should take or William.

The court construed it to read, "if John died without issue, living Alice."

*120

*Judgment for John's issue.

1 Ventris 230—King v. Mellin.

Lord Hale cites and approves the above case in Cro. Car. 185. He says that in that case it was ruled by all the court that it was an absolute estate tail in the first son, as if the words had been, "if he died without issue, living the wife." For he could not be thought to intend to prefer a younger son before the issue of the eldest.

See 3 Bro. Chan. Rep. 253—(note) Cholmondeley v. Meryck.

The court supplies the words "dying without issue," to effectuate the intent in a settlement.

2 Vesey, 195, 6, 7. Targus v. Puget.

The court will, to effectuate the manifest general intent, raise an estate tail, notwithstanding the express estate devised for life, and no longer.

2 Vesey, 225, 232. Robinson v. Robinson.

In the great case of Coryton v. Hellier, determined by Lord Hardwick, the words "if he should so long live," were added, upon full argument—and upon the nature of the thing, though it was not a necessary implication.

See 4 Bro. Chan. Cas. 441 to 460 1. Lytton v. Lytton.

In Smith v. Camelford, 2 Ves. junr. 704, speaking of the case of Adams v. Adams, the Lord Chancellor says, "the justice of the case required that the children defrauded by a gross imposition of the law, should be restored to the right they lost."

"Issue under marriage articles claim as purchasers; but under a will they are only volunteers." 1 Fonbl. 410, 411.

Every cestui que trust, whether a volunteer or not, or be the limitation under which he claims with or without a consideration, is entitled to the aid of a court of equity, in order to avail himself of the benefit of the trust.

1 Fonbl. 412—(note) 3 P. Wms. 222. 1 P. Wms. 426, 7. Hewet v. Ireland.

Provision by deed, for daughters, to be born, shall extend to daughters then born.

*121

*Husband and wife had issue a daughter, and executed a deed for securing 600*l.* in trust that wife should have the interest during life; and afterwards in trust that the 600*l.* should be paid to such daughter or daughters as shall be begotten by husband on wife. If no such daughter, then to the husband.

The daughter born at making the deed, shall take.

See also Talbot's Cases, 30, 1. 1 P. Wms. 234. Kentish v. Newman.

Articles for settlement—equity supplied the words, "if the wife die without issue;" else the money would have gone over from the issue to other relations.

In the performance of a trust, the chancery has power to alter the disposition of the party on emergent accidents which he did not foresee; and which, if he had foreseen he would in all probability have settled his estate otherwise. 2 Fonbl. 199. 2 Freeman 42.

White v. Barber.—Ambler 701. One devises to his son Thomas, and if he dies under 21, and testator's wife shall be ensient at his death with other child or children, then to such at 21. But if no such, then over to his nephews Cham and Barber.

Two sons were born after the will, and in the life of the testator. Held by the judges and the chancellor, that the children born after the will should take, notwithstanding the defect of expression.

See same case reported in 5 Burr. 2703.

It was twice ably argued, and all the objections made which ingenuity and learning could furnish.

Newland v. Shephard, 2 P. Wms. 193, and Peat v. Powell. Ambler 388, are strong cases of supplying words. See Fonnereau v. Fonnereau. 3 Atk. 315, 318.

Settlements are reformed according to the recital. 1 Vesey, jun. 170, 1.

A mistake in a will corrected by the intent. 4 Vesey, 51, 5.

There are many cases of elder children being construed *younger, and vice versa, to do equity and justice among them.

*122

See 2 Vernon 528, 530. Chadwick v. Dolman.

Approved by Lord Talbot. Cases Temp. T. 95.

1 P. Wms. 244, Beale v. Beale. 2 Atk. 456. Heneage v. Hunloch; 2 Vesey 198. Teynham v. Webb; note in 2 Vesey 203. Duke v. Doidge.

In this last case, the eldest son was considered as younger son, to give effect to the deed.

2 Vesey 210, 11. 2 Bro. Ch. Rep. 38, 47.

Portions in a settlement after mother's death, to grow due and payable at 21, or marriage, &c.—One of the daughters having after 21, married, had issue, and died in life of her mother, her portion shall go to her representatives, and not to her sister.

1 Vesey 209, 210. Emperor v. Rolfe.

Great stress will be laid on the words used in the deed, "to the use of Elizabeth and Ann Branford, the said infants, their heirs and assigns for ever, in case they should both be living at the decease of the survivor of them the said William Branford and Elizabeth his wife."

But the cases are clear on this point. See Beale v. Beale. 1 P. Wms. 244, 5, 6.

Provision was made by deed for younger children who should be living at his death. A daughter was born after his death. She shall come in and take a share, being construed to be living.

Sir Robert Burdett v. Hopegood. 1 P. Wms. 485, 6.

One devises, if he leaves no son at the time of his death, to J. S. The testator dies, leaving his wife priviment encsient with a son.

This posthumous son is a son living at the testator's death; and J. S. not entitled.

In 2 Bro. Ch. Ca. 320, 1, the lord chancellor was evidently of the same opinion, against the master of the rolls.

1 Vesey 85. Millar v. Turner. See the case of Archer Smith, decided in this court.

The words were—that on his widow's departing this *life or marrying, his "whole estate real and personal, should be divided among all my sons and daughters that shall be then alive share and share alike."

*123

One daughter died before her mother, leaving children. They took under the words sons and daughters.†

See also the case of Drayton and Drayton, decided in this court in 1793. The court went great lengths to provide for grand children, excluded by the strict words of the will. (See 1st vol. of these Reports, p. 324.)

*124

*The case of Doran v. Ross. 1 Vesey, junr. 57, 8, will be relied on by defendants. But even there the chancellor said. "if the recital contained any thing to which this phrase stood in contradiction, I might correct the phrase as has been decided by former cases.

Literal adherence to the words of the deed will exclude the complainants from any share in the house and lots in question; but it is manifest that the parents providing for their children, meant to provide equally for them, and did not mean to exclude the children of one of the daughters who might die before the surviving parent. The words, "without leaving issue" must have been omitted by accident, in the clause providing for the case of the death of one of the two daughters; and the cases will warrant the court in supplying them.

Mr. Ward argued the case for the defendants. He relied on the literal provisions of the deed, which he contended were too clear to leave any doubt, or leave room for construction to supply any alleged omission. But no notes of his argument could be procured.

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the Court.

William Branford and Elizabeth his wife, by deeds of lease and release, conveyed to certain persons, a lot of land in trust for the use and benefit of the said William and Elizabeth, during their joint lives, and after the death of either of them, to the use of the survivor, during the natural life of such survivor; and after the death of the survivor, to the joint use and behoof of their daughters Elizabeth and Ann Branford, their heirs and assigns, in case they the said Elizabeth and Ann should both be living at the death of the survivor of them the said William and Elizabeth, but in case either of them the said Elizabeth and Ann should die before the survivor of them the said William and Elizabeth, then at the decease of the survivor of them the said William and Elizabeth, to the only use and behoof of the survivor of them the said Eliza*beth and Ann, at the decease of the survivor of them the said William and Elizabeth, and to the heirs and assigns of such survivor of the said Elizabeth and Ann for ever.

*125

William Branford died many years ago. Elizabeth the daughter married, had issue the complainants, and died. Elizabeth the wife of Wm. Branford, and mother of Elizabeth, survived her daughter, and died lately. Ann the other daughter, survived her mother, and is still living.

For complainants it was contended that they are entitled to a moiety of the land in question. That the same rules are to be observed in the construction of trust estates as in wills, and that in decreeing of marriage articles or settlements, the court will regard the end and consideration of settlements, and will go so far as to supply words that have been omitted to effectuate the intention of the parties, and will construe marriage articles against the words, for the sake of the † George Smith made a will on the 17th Feb. 1782, by which he devised to his wife—"the use of all his estate, real and personal, during her widowhood and no longer." And that on his widow's marrying or departing this life, his whole estate real and personal, should be equally divided share and share alike among all my sons and daughters that shall be then alive." Also, that his children remaining unmarried, should receive an education and maintenance out of his estate; and that his children should not receive their share of the estate, "till they shall respectively attain the age of 21 years, in case their mother be married or dead as aforesaid."

He also gave authority to the executors to sell the estate, if desired by his wife.

Afterwards he made a codicil, by which he added another executor, and desired that if his wife should be unable to act as executrix from sickness or otherwise, that his estate should be sold at public auction, and one third of the money given to his wife, and the remaining two thirds to be distributed equally among his children when they should arrive at the age of 21 years.

The testator died on the 17th June, 1784, leaving his will in full force.

His widow and executrix qualified, but all the business was done by Mr. Smith, the brother and executor.

Most of the estate was sold; some still remains.

The testator left several children. One daughter married Archer Smith, and died after her father and before her mother, leaving two children. The mother is since dead.

The bill is filed by Archer Smith for his wife's share of the estate. The executor states the doubt of his right, and the surviving brothers insisted that as his wife died before her mother, she had no right to any portion under the will, though she had attained 21.

The court said it would not bear an argument.

It had been repeatedly decided (in case of Ladson, &c.) that "sons and daughters," will extend to grand children to prevent their being cut off.

intent. That in the present case, the intent of the parties was to give to each of the daughters and their issue, a moiety of the land settled.

It was insisted for the defendant, that the words of the deed were plain and unequivocal; that there was no ambiguity in the expression; and that the intention of the parties was manifest through the whole deed, and there was nothing contained in it to shew that the intention was different from the words. In support of the argument of the counsel on each side, an infinite number of cases on wills and marriage settlements were cited. Most of them have been reviewed and examined, and the general conclusion to be drawn from them is, that the intention of the parties is to prevail. The counsel have argued altogether from analogous cases; for there are none to be found in the books which exactly tally with the present. The only question in this case, is whether the complainants as representing their mother are entitled under this deed to any part of the land settled therein. Trusts being the creation of equity, and one of the peculiar branches of the jurisdiction of this court, they are viewed with a favorable eye. In marriage settlements, the most favorable exposi*tion will be made of words, to support the intention of the parties; nay, even in voluntary settlements, if the words lean more strongly to one construction than the other, it will likewise prevail. It is however the intention of the parties, appearing on the deed, that always governs the court in construction; not the arbitrary conjecture of the judge, though founded on the highest degree of probability; for if once you wander in the wide field of conjecture, it is impossible to say where the line will be drawn. No two cases would perhaps receive the same adjudication.

*126

This cannot properly be called a marriage settlement, in which all the issue of the marriage generally are provided for, and consequently being considered as purchasers, the most liberal construction is always made; but it is a voluntary settlement made by the parents some years after marriage, of a small portion of the mother's estate for the joint benefit of the two children whom they then had; in which from the very words of the deed the chance of survivorship was actually contemplated.

It is only necessary to read the clause of the deed to determine the question; and nothing but the ingenuity of counsel could have raised a doubt. The trusts created, were for the benefit of the husband and wife during their joint lives, and the life of the longest liver of them, and after the death of the survivor, for the joint use of the daughters and their heirs; so that a joint estate only was given to them in the first instance, in case they should both be living at the death of the father or mother, but if either of them should die before such survivor of father or mother, then the estate is to go to the surviving daughter living at the death of the father or mother. It was insisted that the words without issue, ought to be inserted, in order to carry into effect the intention of the parties. How does it appear in any part of the deed to be their intention? If the not inserting the words, without issue, is an omission, it is unfortunately in the most material part of the deed; but whatever conjecture might be made how *it happened, we cannot go out of the deed, but must take it as it now appears. The words are plain & certain; a joint estate is given to the daughters in the first part of the deed which necessarily implies the benefit or chance of survivorship, and the latter clause of it gives the estate to the daughter who shall be living at the death of the father or mother. Taking the whole of the deed therefore into consideration, and construing one part by another, we are of opinion that the complainants are not entitled to any part of the estate in question, and therefore that the bill must be dismissed, with costs; but that the whole thereof vested in the defendant's wife, as the surviving daughter, agreeably to the express plain words of the deed, and the manifest intention of the parties thereto.

*127

---

2 Desaus. 127

Case XIV.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge and Marshall.]

JOHN P. RICHARDSON, Executor of James Sinkler, Deceased, v. MARGARET SINKLER, JAS. B. RICHARDSON, and Others, Legatees of James Sinkler, Deceased.

(May, 1802.)

[Wills ⇐524.]

Testator directs his funded stock to be kept till his youngest child should come of age, or marry; and then to be divided among his children that might be living, and his wife, if then his widow. A child born after making the will, is entitled to a share of the stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1126; Dec. Dig. ⇐524.]

[Wills ⇐858.]

Personal property bequeathed to a particular legatee on conditions, does not pass under the residuary clause if the legacy be refused; but is distributable as undisposed property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 2180; Dec. Dig. ⇐858.]

[Descent and Distribution ⇐112; Wills ⇐762, 866.]

A son to whom some estate is loaned by his father to work and improve, and to receive the profits, is not accountable for the profits to entitle himself to a distributive share of the estate undisposed by his father's will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. § 421; Dec. Dig. ⟸ 112; Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1972, 2202; Dec. Dig. ⟸762, 866.]

[Wills ⟸866.]

A child to whom a marriage portion is given, is not under the circumstances obliged to bring it into account to entitle herself to a share of the distributive estate not passed by her father's will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 2202; Dec. Dig. ⟸866.]

[Descent and Distribution ⟸109.]

In cases of partial intestacy, the doctrine of hotch pot does not apply.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Snelgrove v. Snelgrove, 4 Desaus. 292.

For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. §§ 416, 419, 420; Dec. Dig. ⟸109.]

[Descent and Distribution ⟸45.]

[The statute of distributions applies only where the parent dies entirely intestate.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. § 123; Dec. Dig. ⟸45.]

[Descent and Distribution ⟸112.]

[The value of an advancement is to be estimated at the death of the ancestor, not taking the improvements of the real estate or the increase of the personal estate into computation.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. § 421; Dec. Dig. ⟸ 112.]

The bill was filed to obtain the decision of the court on many questions which arose among the heirs and legatees *of the late James Sinkler, respecting their rights in his estate, and for the guidance and protection of the executors.

*128

The bill charges that, Charles Cantey being possessed of a large estate, died intestate, on the 10th Oct. 1780.—Leaving among other children, his daughter, Mrs. Sarah Sinkler, (then the wife of James Sinkler,) and a grand daughter, Ann Cantey Sinkler, the daughter of James Sinkler, by his wife then deceased, who was also a daughter of said Charles Cantey.

That by the statute of distributions, the personal estate was divisible into eight equal shares, one of which was to go to the said daughter of James Sinkler, in right of her mother then deceased. That in 1783, there was a division of the personal estate, when James Sinkler drew one share in right of his wife, and one share for his said daughter. That James Sinkler possessed himself of the share of his daughter during his life time, and worked the negroes as his own, and took the rents and profits to himself. That James B. Richardson married the said daughter Ann C. Sinkler, on the 10th May, 1791. That James Sinkler during his life, never settled with J. B. Richardson, or paid any part of the property received for his wife from Charles Cantey's estate; but he gave him on his marriage thirty-two negro slaves as a marriage portion with his said daughter.

That in February, 1798, James Sinkler made a writing purporting to be a last will and testament, in which are the following dispositions, among others; that his estate should be kept together till his debts were paid. Then he gives his wife Margaret Sinkler fifty-one negro slaves by name. He also gave to her, "in lieu of dower, &c. all his household furniture, &c. poultry, carriage and chair, and choice of five geldings, his southernmost tenement and lot in Meeting-street, the use of the plantation whereon he lived, and 250 acres to plant; together with the retreat houses; while she remained his widow; & one third of his stock of cattle, sheep, &c. He gives to his son-in-law Jas. B. Richardson, his northernmost tenement in Meeting-*street, together with thirteen negroes by name, and adds, "these, with thirty-two negroes, given my daughter as her marriage portion, makes him fully equal to my other children, and is in lieu of any claim to any part of the estate of Charles Cantey." He orders his funded stock to remain till his youngest child should come of age or marry, then to be divided among his children that may then be living, and his wife, if a widow.

*129

The interest of the funded stock in the interim to the sole use and education of his son William, and daughter Margaret Anna. The residue of his personal estate he gives to his children at twenty-one or marriage. That he appointed complainant one of the executors: that the instrument being subscribed by two witnesses only, has been proved as a testament of personal property in preference to a new will, began but not finished by the testator shortly before his death. That the real estate cannot pass, and of course that part of the provision for J. B. Richardson, in lieu of the claims for Charles Cantey's estate, is defeated.

That after making the testament, and a few months prior to his death, the testator had a son born named James. That the testator died on the 20th Nov. 1800, leaving his widow and daughter Ann Cantey Richardson, (wife of defendant J. B. Richardson,) Charles, William, Margaret Anna, and the young child James, all still living. That the testator acquired some personal estate subsequent to the making of the will, which by the act abolishing primogeniture, cannot pass, but must be distributed.

That the real estate consisted of divers plantations, and town property, all of which has been divided by a writ of partition between all the parties, including the young child James, except the two tenements in Charleston, which the commissioners have recommended to be sold.

That some or all of the provisions made for the wife are in lieu of dower; but as the real devises cannot pass, complainant is unadvised whether she will accept or not, or resort to her dividend under the primogeniture law, or betake herself to dower.

*130

*That the debts of the estate are not considerable: that some of the children are minors, viz: William, Margaret Anna and James: that complainant is desirous for a division of the estate, and that the rights and interests of all the parties should be preserved.

But that various questions have arisen, which complainant is incompetent to decide. Some are made on behalf of James Sinkler, the youngest child, who is totally unprovided for in the testament. He claims a share of the funded stock under the words of the will, when it shall be divided; also a share of the personal property acquired after making the will, whether slaves purchased or born, or increased by crops, monies, interest money, funded stock, and dividends on interest thereof; also that some provision be made for him out of the lands recommended to be sold; and that in consideration of his condition, no part of the intestate property real or personal, should be applied to the payment of debts: but that the same should be paid in the first instance out of the residuary personal estate given to William and Margaret Anna; whereas the other defendants insist that the funded stock is to be divided between them only, by the terms of the testament.

Again, William and Margaret Anna contend that the testator is not to be considered as intestate, as to any monies he may have acquired or received after making the testament, nor of interest money, nor of money changed into stock, or otherwise put out and called in again, nor of crops, and that a contrary construction would involve great perplexity, and be impracticable.

Again, the said defendants, other than the said James B. Richardson, insist that no provision can be made for him out of the intestate's real estate, which has been recommended to be sold; but that the same, or the monies which may arise out of the sales, are distributable among all the defendants; and contend also that the unbequeathed personal property, particularly the crops, as well by the laws of the land as by the intention of the testator, are the most suitable fund for the debts.

*131

*That the said James B. Richardson claims the thirty-two negroes given to his wife as a marriage portion absolutely, and not as being in lieu of Charles Cantey's estate, and contends that only the house and lot in Charleston and the thirteen negroes are in lieu thereof: that if this court can by any decree secure the latter to them, they are willing to accept it in lieu thereof; but that otherwise they claim the share of Mrs. Ann C. Richardson of her grandfather's estate, and an account of the profits, and that the slaves be specifically delivered over to them. They also contend that the slaves are not to be brought into hotch pot with the real and personal estate, whereof James Sinkler died intestate: whereas Margaret Sinkler, and the minors William, Margaret Anna and James, insist that the thirty-two negroes were given in lieu of the claims of Mrs. Richardson for her grandfather's estate: that it was well known that the circumstances of the said James Sinkler could not permit him to give so large a marriage portion (without injustice to the rest of his family) if he was yet to be answerable for Charles Cantey's estate, &c. And also, if this were not so, that the claim of J. B. Richardson and wife, for their share of said estate, is barred by law. —That the said Margaret Sinkler contends that some of the negroes of Charles Cantey's estate now sought to be specifically delivered to J. B. Richardson, have been specifically bequeathed to her by the testator; and if they are taken away, that she ought to be compensated out of some other parts of the estate; whereas the other legatees contend that the said bequest being specific, must in such case, be lost to her altogether; and lastly, all the defendants, (other than J. B. Richardson,) contend that J. B. Richardson is entitled to no share of the intestate's real or personal estate, unless the thirty-two negroes are accounted for, and brought into hotch pot, according to the primogeniture act.

At other times Charles Sinkler claims certain crops made by a number of slaves of which his father gave him the use from year to year, one of which crops he has received the money for, but not for the last crop, viz.

*132

of the year *1800, and that those crops ought not to be brought into hotch pot. Whereas the other defendants contend that the use of the slaves was no gift, but only done for the purpose of instructing him in planting, and that he ought to receive no share of the intestate's real estate till he does so account.

At other times Margaret Sinkler insists the fifty one slaves, the one third of the real estate, and the use of the lands bequeathed to her by her late husband, was a bounty only; and that the household and kitchen furniture and dairy, poultry, carriage and geldings, and the tenement and half lot in Meeting street, were the only property given in lieu of dower: whereas the other defendants contend that the whole was given for and in lieu of dower. That she hesitates to elect, and they insist that she ought to elect, in order that the estate might be settled.

All which involves complainant in anxiety and apprehension of future trouble. The bill prays that the parties interested may answer and interplead that the complainant may be instructed how to act, and saved from future responsibility in consequence of the jarring claims of the defendants.

The answer of James B. Richardson and Ann his wife, admits that James Sinkler in his life time possessed a large real and personal estate, and that some time in the month of February, 1798, he made and executed his last will in the presence of two witnesses only, a copy whereof is filed with the bill. That testator died on the 20th Nov. 1800, leaving the same in force sufficient only to pass the personal estate and not the devises of land. That after making his will and not long prior to his death, the testator had another child born (a son) named James, an infant of tender years, and not provided for in the will by express words. Defendants wish this court may be able by a judicial construction of the will to raise a provision out of the estate for the infant. That by the terms of the devise, whereby the testator gives to J. B. Richardson 13 ne*groes and part of a lot in Charleston and part of a tenement, it appears he intended the provision of this will to go in satisfaction of claims, which Mrs. A. C. Richardson had upon her father for her portion of her grandfather's estate, which James Sinkler received while she was an infant; touching which the defendants beg leave to state, that her said grandfather Charles Cantey being possessed of a large real and personal estate, died on the 10th of October, 1780, intestate, and leaving among other children, his daughter, Mrs. Sarah Sinkler, wife of J. Sinkler, and this defendant, a granddaughter by Mrs. Sinkler, then deceased, who was also a daughter of Charles Cantey. That by the intestacy of Charles Cantey, the real estate descended to his only son Charles, and the personal became divisible into eight parts, each living child entitled to a share, and this defendant, to the other share. That after the debts were paid, the administrators of the said Charles Cantey, proceeded to divide the personal estate, and J. Sinkler drew two shares, one for his then wife, and the other for this defendant. That defendant's father blended her share with his own property; but made no particular purchase as stated, no doubt considering himself responsible as trustee. Defendants admit that after their marriage, which happened about the 10th May, 1791, James Sinkler gave to this defendant, J. B. Richardson, thirty-two negroes, as a marriage portion; but did not intend, as defendants believe, the same to be in discharge of the claims they had upon him, respecting the estate of C. Cantey. They understood he would compensate them in his will, and appeal to the terms of the will to prove this. In the said will, the testator expresses himself, that he meant the property thereby given, to be in lieu of the said claims, and that when the devises were taken together with the marriage portion, it would be a provision more than equal to his other children. The defendant, J. B. Richardson, and his said wife, believe if the interest and profits of Cantey's estate should be added to the gross amount of the portion and the legacy, it would exceed the provision intended by testator; yet regarding *the will and opinion of the testator, they would accept of the terms of the will, if all the devises and bequests could pass, and they hereby offer to release their claims on Cantey's estate, if by this court the provisions of the will can be decreed to them; yet if the real estate should fail to pass, the defendants are constrained to seek a compensation for their claims on Cantey's estate, and pray for an account thereof.

*133

*134

In denying that the thirty-two negroes were given in lieu of their claims, these defendants speak so far as they understood. Whether the provision was disproportioned to his then estate (regarding his other children) it is of no weight to determine, as the property of James Sinkler was large, his other children young, and he might expect, as it really happened, it would greatly increase before any further allotment. And defendants hope this court will so regulate the assets of James Sinkler's estate, as well for the payment of this as other debts of the estate, as to preserve a net distribution of such parts of the estate, of which the testator died intestate, so as to augment the dividend to the child, not in the contemplation of the father when he made his will. The defendants admit that the testator acquired considerable personal property after making his will. Defendants say if this court should not decree the thirteen negroes and the tenement to them, they must claim their interest in Cantey's estate, and seek the aid of this court to have the specific property delivered to them, where it can be ascertained. That divers of the negroes bequeathed to Mrs. Margaret Sinkler, are of those that fell to defendant Ann C. Richardson on the division of her grandfather C. Cantey's estate. If these should be taken from her, (Mrs. Margaret Sinkler) the defendants submit whether she would be entitled to compensation out of the residuary personal estate. Whether the provision made by testator for his wife is in lieu of dower or mere provision, defendants cannot answer, as it depends upon the construction of the will which is submitted to the court. That the various matters of doubt, and *the conflicting interests in the bill set forth excite, and the peculiar difficulties of the case render it unsafe for executors to act.

*135

That no compromise can be made, as two of the children, viz. Margaret Ann and James, are infants of tender years; and the defendants pray the aid of this court.

Defendant admits that James Sinkler died possessed of a considerable real and personal estate, and that on application to the ordinary, he judiciously recognized the paper, (as filed in bill, and first executed as the late will and testament of said James Sinkler,) that complainant qualified thereunto. They further admit that the said James Sinkler left a widow, and the children named in bill, and submit that the right and interests of such of these defendants as are infant orphans, ought to be protected by this honorable court.

It appears that the property Mrs. James B. Richardson was entitled to from her grandfather C. Cantey's estate, consisted of the following property:

A proportion of a tract of land, the property of her grandmother, which her grandfather held by the curtesy, and which on his death was divided. But on the division of the lands, the allotment to her being of inferior value, the difference was made good to her by the other heirs, who delivered her father Mr. J. Sinkler, five negro slaves on her behalf. When her father Mr. J. Sinkler delivered her 32 slaves as her marriage portion, the above five formed a part of the thirty-two.

She was also entitled to 18 slaves, which her father received as her eighth part of the personal estate of her grandfather; some of whom Mr. J. Sinkler included in his legacy to his wife Mrs. Margaret Sinkler; some he bequeathed to other legatees; one he sold, and the remainder are claimed by the residuary legatees. One only was given to Mrs. J. B. Richardson on her marriage.

It was agreed that the testator had acquired considera*ble personal property after making his last will; which as the law then stood, (since altered,) did not pass under his will, though there was a full residuary clause.

*136

It was agreed that Mr. James Sinkler had placed part of his real and personal estate in the possession of his son Charles Sinkler, not as a gift, but to manage, with permission to apply the rents and profits to his own use during his father's life.

The various questions which arose in this case were fully discussed by Mr. Parker for the complainant, and by Messrs. Desaussure and Ford, for the several defendants. But few notes of the argument have been preserved.

It was contended that Mr. Charles Sinkler was compellable to account for the rents and profits of the estate, placed under his care by his father. But it was conceded that the decided cases have established, that the English doctrine of hotch pot does not apply to cases of partial intestacy, as the application of it to such cases might produce and encrease the very evil intended to be remedied by that doctrine, to wit, an inequality among the children of the deceased parent.

It was contended that the provision for the widow was manifestly intended to be in lieu and bar of dower; and that such intention will be operative without an express declaration that the provision by the will is in lieu of dower. It may arise by plain implication.

On the part of the widow, it was denied that there was any such plain implication as ought to bar her.

On the part of Mr. J. B. Richardson and his wife, it was contended that he was entitled to recover all that she had a right to from her grandfather's estate, (which had been received and held by her father Mr. J. Sinkler) without prejudice to her claim to what was given her as a marriage portion, or bequeathed her by the will of her father. But if she was to be put to her election as to the legacy, then she was entitled to an account for rents and profits of her property, kept and received by her father till his death.

*137

*And it was insisted that at all events, the defendant J. B. Richardson and wife, would be entitled to a distributive share of the undisposed personal estate of Mr. James Sinkler, retaining both the marriage portion and the negroes bequeathed to her.

For the unprovided son James, it was contended that besides his proportion of the real estate, which had not been effectually disposed of by the will of the testator, he was entitled to a distributive share of every part of his father's personal estate which was not effectually given by the will, or which was acquired after the making the will; and particularly, that he is entitled to a proportionate share of the funded stock, which was bequeathed to such of testator's children as should be alive when his youngest child should attain 21 years of age. He is included in the general words, and ought to be allowed to take a child's share, though his father did not contemplate this child, (not then born) at the time of penning the will.

After the argument, and time taken to deliberate, Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court.

There are four questions for determination in this case: 1st. Among whom the funded stock of the testator is to be divided? 2nd. Whether the thirteen negroes bequeathed to the defendant J. B. Richardson, (if he refuses to take them on the conditions prescribed in the will) are to be considered as a part of the residue of the personal estate, and to pass as such by virtue of the residuary clause, or to be distributed agreeable to the statute?

3d. Whether the produce of the two years crops received by C. Sinkler are not to be considered as an advancement, and brought into account for distribution, allowing him thereout a reasonable maintenance?

4th. Whether the advancement to defendant J. B. Richardson, by the testator, (this being a case of partial and not a general intestacy) is to be accounted for by him in a distribution of the undisposed surplus personal estate?

As to the first question, the testator has in express *words directed, that the interest of his funded stock shall be applied to the sole use and education of his son William, and daughter Margaret Ann; and the principal to remain till his youngest child come of age or marries, and then to be divided among his children that may be then living; and his wife, if a widow. Though the testator, at the time of making his will, might not have contemplated any other children than those already born; yet as he made use of those general expressions, that the stock should be divided among his children who may be alive at a certain period, we are of opinion, the after born children (who are totally unprovided for by the will,) if then living, will be justly and equitably entitled to a distributive share equally with the rest.

*138

On the second question, we are of opinion that the thirteen negro slaves bequeathed to the defendant J. B. Richardson, cannot be deemed a part of the residuary estate, and pass under the residuary clause of the will, because they are expressly bequeathed to J. B. Richardson on certain conditions, and not being bequeathed over in case of his refusal to accept them, they must be considered as part of the testator's personal estate undisposed of and distributable.

3d question. Whether the produce of the two years crops received by C. Sinkler are not to be considered as an advancement, and brought into account for distribution, allowing him thereout a reasonable maintenance?

From the evidence of Mr. Carson and Mrs. Sinkler, it is plain that the testator had given the whole profits of certain lands and negroes to his son Charles, (who was his eldest son) to be received and enjoyed by him for his own advantage, without any responsibility; and that the testator was not thereafter to be answerable for any of his debts. His letters to his son, his receipt for money from the factors, and the directions which he gave them concerning a charge respecting some cotton gins which he ordered to be set down to his son instead of himself, confirm the testimony of the witnesses: *but it was nevertheless only a temporary, not a permanent provision, to initiate him into the planter's business, and to encourage him to be industrious. Whatever he made therefore was only a reward for his own labor and diligence, and ought not to be brought into account for distribution, his father never having intended it.

*139

4th question. Whether the advancement to defendant J. B. Richardson by the testator, (this being a case of partial and not a general intestacy) is to be accounted for by him in a distribution of the undisposed surplus personal estate?

The principal object of the statute of distributions is, to effect an equal distribution of the personal estate of the testator among his children, and has only in view a general intestacy. The act of assembly of the year 1791, abolishing the right of primogeniture, recognizes the dispositions of the statute, and goes one step further, by providing for a partial intestacy; i. e. as to property acquired after a testator has made his will, not having republished it, directing in such case how it shall be distributed.

The object, both of the statute and act of assembly, being a perfect equality among the children, they have pointed out (the act of assembly more precisely than the statute) the method, in a case of general intestacy, how it is to be effected. When a child has been advanced by the intestate in his life time, but not equal to the shares falling to the other children, the mode pointed out for equalizing him, is (not by bringing it into hotch pot) but by a valuation of the property advanced, as it may be estimated at the death of the ancestor (not taking the improvements of the real estate, or the increase of the personal estate into computation) and the difference is to be made up out of the estate to be distributed so as to make the estates of all equal.

The testator in the present case having by will disposed of all the personal property he then possessed, nothing remained to be distributed. What has been acquired since the will was made, our law directs how it should be dis*tributed. It is confessed that the personal property which testator has given to his other children by his will, is considerably more than what he gave to defendant J. B. Richardson and his wife; but as it is not a general intestacy, the court cannot decree the difference to be made up to the defendant J. B. Richardson out of the surplus personal estate, so as to put him on a footing with the other children.† We are therefore of opinion that it is but just and equitable, and decree that he shall retain the negroes which he received from the testator for his marriage portion as he calls it, without any accountability; and that he is entitled to a distributive share of the undisposed surplus of the personal estate, in common with the other children.—The case of Vachell and Jeffreys, as it is reported in Brown's P. C. does not shake the authority of the same case as reported in precedents in chancery, (p. 169.) with respect to the determination of the question on a partial intestacy; the question on the appeal being solely on the right of the two children disowned by the testator, to a distributive share with those he owned. The other case in Precedents in Chancery (182) is opposed to that of Vachell and Jeffreys; but we do not see how the Lord Keeper could give any opinion on that question, it not being a point made for his determination. It is decreed, that the two houses and lots in Meeting-street, belonging to the testator's estate, be forthwith sold by the master, giving the usual notice, on bonds and mortgage of the premises, with personal security if required, on a credit of 1, 2 and 3 years; and the monies arising from the sale to be divided agreeable to law. The shares of the minor children to be placed and kept at interest by the defendant Margaret Sinkler, their mother, for their benefit. The costs of suit to be paid out of the estate.

*140

† 2 Eq. Cases, Abr. 435.

---

2 Desaus. 140

Case XV.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge and Marshall.]

ZYLSTRA and Wife v. S. KEITH and Others.

(July, 1802.)

[Trusts ⟸44.]

The answer denying the allegation of the bill, that a purchase was *made in trust, must prevail, as there were not two witnesses, or one witness and strong circumstances in contradiction to the answer.

*141

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 66-68; Dec. Dig. ⟸44.]

[Execution ⟸247.]

A sale of land made by the sheriff, under executions at law, set aside and the sale declared void, because he had previously sold enough to satisfy the executions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 690; Dec. Dig. ⟸247.]

[Mortgages ⟸529.]

A mortgagee having become a purchaser at a sale, which is set aside, and having entered satisfaction on his mortgage, shall have the same set up again, and supported in equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1548; Dec. Dig. ⟸529.]

[This case is also cited in McDow v. Brown, 2 S. C. 112, without specific application, and in Hutchison v. Fuller, 67 S. C. 284, 45 S. E. 164, as an exception to the rule that equity affords no relief for mistakes of law.]

This was a bill filed to compel defendant to discover whether he had not purchased a house and lot of land in Charleston at sheriff's sale, in trust for Zylstra's wife and child; on an engagement to repay defendant the amount which he gave at the sale. And if such trust should not be established, then to set aside the sale as having been made irregularly; the sheriff having previously made sales of Zylstra's property, sufficient to pay the executions.

The defendant by his answer denied positively the alleged agreement to make the purchase of the house and lot in trust. But admitted that he had said, after the purchase, that if Zylstra and his wife would pay him the amount for which he bid off the property, they should have the house. This however had never been done, and the defendant claimed the purchase on his own behalf.

There was no evidence to contradict the answer as to the alleged agreement before the purchase, but two persons, who got all their information from Zylstra and his wife.

It was proved that defendant had permitted Zylstra and wife to remain in possession of the property after the sale; declaring he would reconvey to them, if they paid him the purchase money. But this was altogether voluntary; and there was no proof, or indeed allegation that the money was paid to defendant.

The sale was made by the sheriff, on certain executions in his office; but when examined, it seems that there was more in the sheriffs hands from previous sales than was sufficient to satisfy those executions.

The defendant became the purchaser at the sale; he being an early encumbrancer by mortgage, (which however *had not been foreclosed) and on the sheriffs making him titles he had entered satisfaction on his mortgage.

*142

The cause was argued, and afterwards Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the Court.

The scope of complainants bill is to search the conscience of the defendant and to discover from his answer whether the house and lot in bill mentioned were not purchased by him at the sheriff's sale, in trust for complainant's wife and child, in consequence of an agreement made between complainants and defendant previous to the sale; and that he be compelled to hold the premises in trust for them pursuant to such agreement, subject to the debt due by complainant to defendant on bonds and mortgages. This is the principal ground of the bill. Another ground is that the equity of redemption in the premises was never regularly foreclosed; and therefore that the sale by the sheriff was irregular and illegal, the execution under which it was pretended to be sold, having been previously settled; at least the sheriff had money enough in his hands for that purpose.

The defendant by his answer absolutely and positively denies that he ever gave any assurances to the complainants or either of them that he would purchase in the premises, in behalf of complainant's wife and child; or that if he was the purchaser thereof, he would transfer the titles he should receive to any uses or trusts whatsoever; and avers that the only conversation that passed between them on the subject, was after the sale, when complainant said he hoped defendant would allow him to purchase back the premises at the price he had given; to which the defendant replied, if he paid him his debt he did not know what he might be tempted to do.

To support complainants charge of a secret trust between him and defendant, and to contradict the answer, parol evidence has been adduced, viz. Messrs. Winstanly and House. The substance of their testimony evidently amounts to no more than the information they received from complainant himself respecting the assurances of de*fendant, that he would buy it in for complainants. There is no written evidence of such assurances. The evidence for defendant tended merely to criminate the conduct of complainants, and to shew various acts of fraud committed by him to cheat his creditors, but which however could not affect the defendant, he having a mortgage of the premises prior to that period; nor can they have any influence in the decision of the present question.

*143

This case lies in a small compass; there is no intricacy in it. The principal ground of complainants bill charging the secret trust, has been completely denied by the answer; and the only evidence opposed to the answer, is that of Winstanly and House, (derived from Zylstra himself) which cannot contradict it. It is the established rule of this court, that unless the answer is contradicted by two positive witnesses, or one positive witness, and strong corroborative circumstances, the answer must prevail. The answer is not at all contradicted, and it is only by circumstantial evidence, that it is in any manner impugned. Neither Winstanly or House prove the trust; all their information being from complainant and not a syllable from defendant, previous to the sale, and only one solitary circumstance after it, acknowledging that he had put complainant in possession and that he might have the house back again if he paid him his debt. On the first principal ground therefore the complainant has entirely failed, and he is not entitled to the relief prayed for.

On the second ground, respecting the sale by the sheriff being irregular and illegal, it appears plainly from the evidence, that goods belonging to complainant had been sold previous to the sheriff's advertisement, which were adequate or nearly so, to pay the amount of the executions in his office against complainant; and that those mentioned in his advertisement were of the number that would be satisfied. On what pretence he could sell the property at all, or for cash, is inexplicable. It does not appear, however, that it was at the instance of defendant, because no part of his debt was then due; and even in that case he could not *sell until he had sued, obtained a judgment and an order of the court for that purpose; and even in that case, the property could not have been sold for cash. Independent of the terms which the law has imposed in cases of mortgages, of selling on a credit, the convention of the creditors (of whom the defendant was one) that the property should be sold on a credit of 60, 90, and 120 days, ought to have regulated the sheriff's sale; and the discretion which the creditors afterwards gave to a committee, should not have altered the terms; nor does it appear to the court that they did. Upon the whole of this case, therefore, it is evident that the sale was illegal, because from the documents produced, it appears that the sheriff had under his controul a sum of money sufficient or nearly so, to satisfy all the executions in his office, when the sale was advertised. It was irregular, being contrary to the convention of complainant and his creditors, of whom defendant was one; and ought not therefore in any event to have been sold for cash. It has been suggested that defendant has entered satisfaction on his mortgage, and has thereby lost his lien or claim on the property. If the court interferes, it would take care to protect his rights, and set up the mortgage again, upon the ground of defendant's having been under a mistake in what he did. It is therefore ordered and decreed, that the sale of the sheriff be set aside, and the title deeds to defendant cancelled; that it be referred to the master to ascertain what is due and owing by complainant on his bonds and mortgages to defendant for principal and interest; and that he do within six months pay the amount thereof, together with the costs at law and in this court, to the defendant; or in default thereof, that the mortgage be foreclosed, and the house and lot of land be forthwith advertised, and sold by the master for cash.

*144

And that the injunction heretofore granted in this case, be made perpetual.

---

2 Desaus. *145

*Case XVI.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge and Marshall.]

Representatives of JAMES ASKEW v. JOHN E. POYAS.

(July, 1802.)

[Evidence ⇐441.]

To a bill praying for the specific performance of a parol agreement for the sale of land, the defendant answered and denied the agreement as charged by the bill; but set up another agreement which he insisted upon he had complied with. The complainant is not at liberty to support the alleged parol agreement by parol evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1778; Dec. Dig. ⇐441.]

[Partnership ⇐53.]

Defendant denying the allegation of a partnership in a brick yard, and there being no proof, no account can be directed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 76, 79; Dec. Dig. ⇐53.]

[Trusts ⇐44.]

Defendant denying that he had purchased in complainant's property in trust, and no proof of such fact, the trust will not be raised.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 66–68; Dec. Dig. ⇐44.]

[Slaves ⇐8.]

Defendant admitting the hire of some slaves, an account was directed as to them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Slaves, Cent. Dig. §§ 30–38; Dec. Dig. ⇐8.]

This was a bill filed to compel the specific performance of a parol agreement, for the purchase of a tract of land on certain terms alleged in the bill; and for the formation of a copartnership in establishing a brick yard on the land; and for an account of the profits from the labor of certain slaves placed on the premises by Askew.

The bill also sought a discovery whether the defendant had not purchased certain slaves of Askew at Sheriff's sale, in trust for Askew, on his being reimbursed the price given for them.

The defendant in his answer denied the agreement as alleged in the bill, and set forth another agreement, which he insisted he had fully complied with; but that Askew had altogether failed to comply with his part of the terms. The defendant also denied the allegation of an agreement for a copartnership in the brick yard; but admitted that Askew had some negro slaves on the place whom defendant employed as labourers; and that he was willing to pay a reasonable hire for them.

At the hearing the complainant offered some parol evidence of the agreement as charged in the bill; which the court admitted, but without prejudice. It did not, however, fully support the allegations of the bill.

*146

Nor was *there any satisfactory evidence of an agreement to enter into a copartnership.

There was no evidence that the defendant had agreed to become the purchaser of the slaves sold by the sheriff in trust for Askew. The sale was proved to have been a fair one, and that defendant became the purchaser on his own account.

Chancellor MARSHALL delivered the decree of the court.

The objects of complainant's bill are, to discover from the defendants oath, whether a parol agreement was not entered into between him and the complainant respecting the land in bill mentioned to the following effect: That the whole of what belonged to complainant (being 201 acres) should be sold; that the defendant should purchase it, and pay 200*l.* for a moiety of it: that the sheriff should make titles to defendant for one moiety, and complainant for the other moiety. That the defendant should also discover whether a copartnership was not entered into between them for the purpose of establishing a brick yard, and carrying on that business, the defendant accounting for the profits of it, or the work of the negroes on it; and that the defendant may discover whether the negroes of complainant sold by sheriff under execution were not purchased in by defendant in trust for complainant. The defendant in his answer denies the agreement as set forth, but says he agreed to purchase 201 acres, a moiety of complainant's land, provided he could get good titles: that he was to pay and did pay 200*l.* for it; and it was agreed that on complainant's repaying him one half of the purchase money, he should have half of the land; that he was always ready to comply with the terms; but complainant never was. Defendant denies that titles were to be taken in his and complainant's name; but when he received them from sheriff, he shewed them to complainant who made no objection to their being made to defendant. He denies that he is liable to account for the profits of the brick yard. He admits a co-partnership was contemplated, but *denies that Askew complied with any of the stipulations agreed on. He is nevertheless willing to allow wages for the negroes of complainant whilst there; and denies that the purchase of the negroes was made in trust; but avers they were sold under execution for complainant's debts; and defendant bought them for a valuable consideration, and has paid the money.

*147

This case lies in a very narrow compass: the first question respecting the parol agreement is plain and clear; the defendant totally denies it as stated in the bill; and there is no written evidence to contradict his answer; it must therefore be taken to be true. —To admit parol proof of a parol agreement, in a case not tinctured with fraud, would introduce all the mischiefs and inconveniences which the statute of frauds intended to prevent: and would be in effect to repeal the statute which makes void all parol agreements concerning land. The parol testimony respecting the agreement must therefore be laid aside. The defendant's answer denying the agreement, standing uncontradicted, the bill would be dismissed, were it not necessary to retain it for the purpose of defendant's accounting for the work and labor of complainant's negroes. Defendant having denied the existence of a co-partnership, and there being no proof of it, the complainant is not entitled to an account for the profits of the brick-yard. Defendant having also denied the purchase of the negroes at sheriff's sale in trust for complainant, and it having been fully proved by Mr. Ford that the sale was a fair one; that he thought and believed defendant was bidding for himself, and that he never heard that he was buying for any one else; and Turner, a deputy sheriff, swearing that defendant absolutely refused Mrs. Askew's request to buy them in for her husband, but said that he would purchase them for himself; and the bill of sale from the sheriff to defendant, being in the common form, he cannot be considered in any other light than as the absolute proprietor of the negroes: but as he admits complainant had some other negroes working at the brick yard *for a certain time, it must be referred to the master to ascertain how many there were, and how long employed there, and what will be a proper allowance to be made for their services during that period.

*148

Moultrie, Desaussure and Ford, for complainants.

Pringle, for defendant.

---

2 Desaus. 148

Case XVII.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge and Marshall.]

THOMAS SHUBRICK and ROBERT SMITH, Executors of Thomas Shubrick, v. JAMES FISHER, JOSIAH SMITH, N. RUSSELL and Others, Members of the South-Carolina Insurance Company.

(July, 1802.)

[Insurance ⇐55.]

Articles of agreement that the members of an insurance company should each bear his proportion of the losses (without any negative words that they should not be liable for more, in case of insolvency of some of the partners) is an ordinary copartnership; the members are bound in solido, each for the whole; not only as to strangers, but as to members of the company, who have procured insurance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 68; Dec. Dig. ⇐55.]

[Insurance ⇐55.]

An arrangement by 76 solvent shares (out of 100 shares) to pay the whole loss, was not a new agreement to enlarge the liability of the members; but evidence of their own sense of their liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 67-69; Dec. Dig. ⇐55.]

[Insurance ⇐55, 196.]

A member of the company appointed by the company to collect from the members, is their agent, and if he collects, and does not pay over to a creditor of the company, it is their loss; though that creditor acquiesced in the appointment, and dealt with him as the agent. The insured has nothing to do with the insolvencies. He must be paid by the company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 68, 435; Dec. Dig. ⇐55, 196.]

The bill stated that James Fisher and the other gentlemen above mentioned, formed a company, called "The South-Carolina Insurance Company," for the purpose of insuring vessels and cargoes. And being so associated made certain articles of agreement, the original of which is in the possession of defendants.

That Thomas Shubrick in his lifetime being the owner of a brig, called the Effingham, then about to sail from Charleston on a voyage to foreign ports, and being desirous to have said brig and cargo insured did on

*149

13th *Feb. 1777, cause her and her cargo to be insured, by a policy of insurance, by the said company, to the amount of £10,000 currency on goods, and £5,000 on the vessel, on a voyage "at and from the port of Charleston in said state, to any port of France, or in the Bay of Biscay."

That said policy was signed by the said company, (by Edward Lightwood one of the said company, and for himself and the others, and as their agent for such purposes specially constituted,) as appears by said policy marked A. and filed.

That said Thomas Shubrick afterwards, to wit, on the 11th of April, in same year, caused another policy of insurance to be opened, to insure on the body of said brig a further sum of £2000. currency, which was presented to said company, who through Samuel Legare, one of said company, for himself and the others, and as their agent, signed the same in due form, as appears by said policy, marked B. and filed.

That the said Thomas Shubrick shortly afterwards, on the 23d of May in the same year, at Charleston, wishing to insure the further sum of £3000. currency on the said brig and cargo, on the same voyage, had another policy made out, which (through Josiah Smith as agent for the said company, and for himself as a member of it,) said company signed in due form.

That the said Thomas Shubrick paid to the said company as a premium for the risks against which they insured in the aforesaid policies, the sum of £20. for every £100. insured on the said brig and cargo.

That shortly after said policies were signed, the said brig proceeded on the voyage described in the policies, and not having deviated from the true course of her said voyage, was taken, captured by a British armed vessel, and condemned as a good prize to the captors, whereby the whole vessel and cargo were totally lost to the said Thomas Shubrick.

That by said capture and loss to said Thomas Shubrick, the said South-Carolina

*150

Insurance Company be*came liable to pay the said sums of money in the different policies mentioned, agreeably to their engagements therein contained.

That conceiving the said Insurance Company bound to pay for the losses accruing by the capture aforesaid, not only the said

Thomas Shubrick, in his lifetime, but complainants have often called for payment, and having been frequently refused, were compelled to bring a suit upon one of the policies, against Edward Lightwood, agent as aforesaid, in the Court of Common Pleas; that a judgment was entered against him for the sum of £3037. 11s. 1d. sterling, with interest thereon from the 1st of July, 1793.

That the said Edward Lightwood and Samuel Legare, having since died insolvent; and the said Josiah Smith, another agent as aforesaid, not thinking proper to pay the said losses, the complainants called upon the defendants or their legal representatives to make up and contribute amongst themselves as members of the said company, their several proportions of the losses aforesaid, according to an account delivered them.

But the defendants have refused or declined to make any settlement with complainants: some of them alleging that they had paid into the hands of said Edward Lightwood, monies to pay their respective proportions of said losses; and that they are in consequence discharged from any claim or demand of the claimants, whether they received the money from said E. Lightwood or not.

The bill prays that the defendants may be compelled to pay the complainants the amount of the said losses with interest. And that in case any members of the said company or their estates should have become insolvent, then that each of the solvent members or their estates may be made liable to pay the whole, as being bound in solido, or jointly and severally as for a copartnership debt, or that they may be compelled to contribute amongst themselves the payment of the said losses upon just principles.

The answers of James Fisher, Josiah

*151

Smith, Nathaniel *Russell, and others, admit that the several person in the bill mentioned, formed the company called the South-Carolina Insurance Company, for the purpose of insuring marine risks; and they signed by their agents the policies of insurance stated in the complainant's bill, and that by the capture of the ship and cargo, a total loss was sustained, for which the complainant's testator had a claim against the said company for indemnity. But they do not admit that the members of said company were bound in solido, as for a copartnership debt: for although they were "jointly concerned," yet it was agreed by the articles of association to which the complainant's testator was a party, (he being a member of the company) that in case of loss, it was to be "borne, paid and sustained by each and every of the several subscribers or members, &c. in average or proportion to the sum or sums of money by them subscribed." They further say that the capital stock of the said company has been exhausted in the payment of losses; and that the individual members are not bound for the loss in the present case beyond their average and proportion, according to the number of shares respectively held by each of them, according to the original articles.

The defendants do not admit that complainants or their testator made any demand of payment under these policies for many years, having neglected them altogether.

They further admit that a suit was brought many years after the loss against Edward Lightwood, who had signed the first policy on behalf of the company, and judgment recovered against him, as stated by the bill.

That although at a meeting of the surviving members of the company, it was stated that there then existed but 76 solvent shares out of the 100, of which the company was composed, and it was agreed that the said 76 shares would pay the whole of the said loss to be proportioned amongst themselves, and the sum of £44. 19s. was adjusted by consent of both parties, (the complainants and these defendants) as the sum which each share was to pay; yet that such agreement was not made on the ground of any sup*posed liability of the said members beyond their own several shares in said company; nor was it meant to extend in any manner the personal liability of said members beyond their several and respective shares in the company; but it was solely intended to divide amongst themselves, a loss which might otherwise have borne hard on the said Edward Lightwood, who has subscribed the policies, and against whom alone a suit had been instituted, and a judgment recovered. And if any attempt should be made to open the said account to extend the liability of the said company, they will hold themselves justified in opening the said account wholly, and availing themselves of all just grounds of defence.

*152

That at the said meeting it was also agreed by the committee who managed the affairs of the company, and by Thomas Shubrick, (one of the executors and complainants) that that said E. Lightwood should collect from the individual members their several proportions of the loss so adjusted, (except seven shares which said T. Shubrick himself undertook to collect) and should pay over the same to the said Thos. Shubrick: and that the said E. Lightwood, by such arrangement, became the agent of the said Thomas Shubrick, and responsible to him for all sums of money so collected: and they would not have entered into such arrangements, but upon the ground that on said Lightwood's collecting, (with the acquiescence of complainants) the persons who should make payments to him under the agreement, would be discharged of all further liability to the company or to complainants.

The defendants further answering say, that in pursuance of such agreement, many of them did pay to the said Lightwood, with said approbation of the complainants, the ascertained and adjusted proportion of the said loss for which they have receipts ready to be produced. And to evince to the court that the said E. Lightwood was the agent of said complainants as well as of the said defendants, they submit to the court that in several instances the said E. Lightwood did not receive money from the defen*dants, but procured discounts for the said T. Shubrick, on demands which some of the defendants had against him or his father's estate, which were by his direction admitted in payment; which were conclusive on the said Shubrick; and these defendants hold themselves absolved from all responsibility.

*153

That if said complainants had used due diligence in demanding and receiving payment from the said E. Lightwood, of the sums he collected from the members of the company, the whole might have been obtained from him; the said E. Lightwood having paid large sums of money to his creditors subsequent to such judgment; and if as is alleged, the said complainants cannot now recover the sums collected and received by the said E. Lightwood, the fault is imputable to the complainants.

The defendants further answering say, that even if they had been originally bound in solido, and liable as copartners, (which they deny,) yet they insist that in justice and equity they ought not to be held liable under the circumstances of this case, for more than their average and proportionate loss, according to the number of shares held by each member; because if the complainant had used due diligence in a reasonable time after the said loss, almost all of the said company would have been competent to have paid their proportions; instead of which, if the complainant should succeed, the loss would fall heavily on a few, as about one third of the shares of said company are now insolvent.

The defendant James Fisher, in his answer, admitted the allegations of the bill, but denied that the members of the company were bound in solido as copartners, and insisted that by the articles of agreement by which the company was united together, (and to which complainant's testator was a party) in case of loss, it was to be borne by each member in average and proportion to the sum or sums by him subscribed.

That although it may be said that at the meeting of the company in July, 1793, it was stated that there existed but *76 solvent shares out of the 100, of which the stock was composed, and it was then agreed that the loss should be borne by the said 76 shares, and the accounts stated accordingly; yet he had not then seen the original articles for many years, and did not recollect precisely the terms of subscription, and submits to the court that all mistakes ought to be rectified, and the defendant held liable for no more than his original subscription.

*154

The defendant further submitted that he had received from the complainant Thomas Shubrick, the following statement: Estate of John Edwards, dr. to estate of Thos. Shubrick 20th Dec. 1798, to amount of nine shares in the South-Carolina Insurance Company, on sundry policies of brig Effingham, settled and allowed on the 1st July, 1793, say £404. 11s.; interest on do. to 1st of Jan. 1799, £155. 14s. 10d.—making £560. 5s. 10d.

James Fisher dr. to estate of T. Shubrick, 1798, Dec. 20. To amount of three shares in the South-Carolina Insurance Company, on sundry policies on brig Effingham, settled and allowed on the 1st July, 1793, say £134. 17s. interest on do. to 1st Jan. '99, £51. 18s. 3d. making £186. 15s. 3d. That he paid part thereof, and holds a receipt in these words. Received 2d of April, 1799, £600. on account of James Fisher, and estate of John Edwards, signed Thos. Shubrick; which plainly shews that the complainants looked to the individual and not to the company, for payment of the respective proportions of the loss.

At the hearing of the cause, it was argued for the complainants that this was a copartnership, subject to all the rules on that branch of law, and that one great rule is that each of the copartners is liable for all the debts of the copartnership. They are bound jointly and severally; and the members of a company cannot affect third persons by any agreement among themselves diminishing the legal liability.

That the complainants testator, though he was a member of the company, was a perfect stranger to it in re*spect to the insurances he procured to be done by the company, on his vessel and cargo; and his representatives are entitled to the full responsibility of the members of the company, as the law establishes it, and not according to the limited liability contended for by the members, under an agreement, the object of which was to establish a rule of proportion among themselves, and not to affect third persons.

*155

That there was no agreement on the part of the complainants to release or in any way give up their right to be paid by the company, the whole loss sustained.

That at the meeting in July, 1793, the defendants were so sensible of the liability of the solvent partners for the whole debt, that they partitioned it among themselves, and as the company had no joint stock, appointed one of their own members, E. Lightwood, to collect the proportions from each. That this was done by the company, for their own convenience, and as the only way of collecting the money from the members. But this act was the act of the company, and the member appointed to collect was their agent.

The complainants could not and did not object to this act of the company, as it was the necessary means of the collection; but their acquiescence did not constitute Mr. Lightwood the agent of the complainants.

Nor did his settling some of the shares by discounts, amount to any relinquishment of his full claims on the company. Lightwood being their agent, the complainants were willing to allow of settlements in the way most convenient to the members; and when not inconvenient to themselves, the complainants undertook to settle with several of the members; as in the case of Mr. Fisher. But they never gave up their right to demand payment of the whole sum from the company, in case of additional insolvencies among them, or of the non-payment to complainants, of the sums collected by their agent.

For the defendants it was contended that this Insur*ance Company was formed on a peculiar plan, by which it was agreed that the members of the company should not be bound in solido, but each for his individual proportion and no more. That all persons dealing with the company, and knowing the terms of their association, would be bound by them. It was a consent to the liability of the members being restricted to the limits stated in the agreement. But that even if this were questionable as to mere strangers, it could not be so as to the members themselves; and the complainants testator could not set up a pretence that the members were liable beyond the extent expressly stipulated by the deed, or agreement of association, to which he was a party himself. He and his representatives are estopped from averring any thing against that deed, or claiming a different responsibility from the members, than that fixed by the deed. See Watson, 29, 50, 361.

*156

Hence then each share was bound for only 100th part of the loss sustained; and complainants can make defendants liable beyond this, only on the ground of a new and distinct contract. The complainants insist that the defendants have made such a contract; and that at the meeting of the company in July, 1793, it was agreed that the 76 solvent shares would pay the whole loss; and that the company appointed E. Lightwood as agent of the company to collect the money from the members, and pay it over to the complainants. And the complainants bill calls for a discovery of these facts. To this prayer for discovery the defendants have answered, and their answer must be taken for true, unless disproved by one witness and strong circumstances. The answer admits that it was agreed at the meeting of the company, that the 76 solvent shares would pay the complainants the whole loss. That this was done to save Lightwood, against whom, as the subscriber of the large policy, on behalf of the company, the judgment had been obtained by the complainants. That the complainants thereupon agreed to suspend their judgment, and agreed that E. Lightwood should collect these *assumed proportions from the members, and pay them over to him. That by these arrangements, E. Lightwood became so far the agent of the complainants, that all his collections and receipts were on their account, and absolutely discharged those who made the payments. For though Lightwood was appointed by the company, (and indeed was jointly with Mr. Dawson, treasurer of the company, with authority to them both, to settle all losses and collect monies due) to transact this business, it was with the concurrence of the complainants, who acted and transacted with him in various ways as their own agent; they settled with him by discount; they even superceded him, (which they could do with their own agent, but not with one who was wholly the agent of the company) and themselves settled with several of the members, giving them statements of what they individually were to pay on the loss, and received the money and gave receipts to them.

*157

It is true Lightwood also made collections from the members, and in some cases gave receipts as on behalf, or for account of the company—but this only shews what is not denied, that he was the agent of both parties.

The result is, that the complainants must rely on the original contract of indemnity by the company constituted as it was; or on the new agreement. If he relies on the former, the members are not bound, (as has been shewn) for more than each his own share. And if they had been, the complainants have made their election to pursue Lightwood alone, against whom alone they have brought suit at law, and obtained a judgment, and having done so, they cannot now come on the company.

And if complainants rely on the new agreement, the defendant's answer explains and qualifies that, and is not contradicted or varied by sufficient evidence. By their answer, it appears that Lightwood was the agent of both parties; but that it was to complainants alone he was to pay. The authority of the company gave him power to collect the money. When collected, it was the property of the complainants who had agreed that he should receive it on *their account. If he did not pay it over to complainants, it was their loss. The complainants neglected to make him pay as he collected. The laches was theirs, and so must be the loss.

*158

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court.

In this case the following questions arise.

First—Whether the members of the Insurance Company are or are not bound in solido to make good the loss sustained by complainant on the policies in bill mentioned?

Secondly—Admitting they were so bound, whether the arrangements made by the surviving members in the year 1793, did not make it a new contract, and complainant acquiescing therein, was bound thereby?

Thirdly—Whether the members who paid to Mr. Lightwood the sums then settled for their shares or proportions of the debt, are not wholly discharged; and Lightwood having since become insolvent, whether the loss should fall on complainant; he being alleged to be the particular agent of complainant?

Fourthly—Whether, as several of the members have become insolvent since 1793, the loss occasioned by such insolvency should not be borne by complainant; he not having used due diligence to obtain payment from them?

On the first point it was admitted, that if complainant's testator had been a stranger to the articles of the company, that no agreements or covenants they made with each other would have been obligatory on him; but they would all have been bound in solido to make good his loss. It was at the same time contended for defendants, that complainant's testator being one of the company, and it appearing by the articles that they each covenanted for himself, severally and not jointly, to make good any loss of the company in average and proportion, to which he subscribed; they are therefore not collectively liable to any individual of the company whose property was insured, because he being a party to the agreement, and knowing the terms of it in case of any insolvencies, he must sustain the loss of those shares *which ought to have been paid by the insolvent members.

*159

This would be a hard doctrine, even if it could be supported by the words of the articles; but upon a reference to, and on a fair construction of them, we are of opinion that the inference drawn by defendant's counsel, is by no means warranted.

The articles set out with stating, that the subscribers agreed to join themselves together, and to become jointly concerned as a company of insurers, for the purpose of insuring ships and vessels, and goods of any individual or individuals, subject to the regulations thereinafter mentioned: then follow the various covenants. Among others, that each party doth severally, and not jointly, and not one for the other, covenant, that the company shall be called the South-Carolina Insurance Company; that there shall be a president, vice-president, directors, treasurer and clerk; that any one of the directors signing a policy in behalf of the company, the same shall be binding on all the members, in average and proportion to the sums by them subscribed; that the treasurer shall give security for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office. In case any loss should happen, over and above the sums subscribed and deposited for a capital, such loss shall be borne by each and every of the subscribers, in average and proportion to the sum by him subscribed.

This is the substance of the covenants contained in the articles, which do not differ in any respect from the usual covenants contained in almost all articles of co-partnership.

It is then to be considered whether they ought to have a different construction put on them, as they regard the complainant, from what they would have, with respect to any other individual.

Had there been a clause inserted in the articles, that in case of any insolvency of any member, the survivors should not make good the loss, then the arguments of defendant's counsel would apply most forcibly, and complainant could not have any redress; although a stranger would not have been prejudiced by such a clause. It is *not reasonable to suppose that at the time of signing these articles, the idea of insolvency was at all contemplated; for an individual share did not exceed the value of £150. sterling: and there was not a person who signed them who did not possess a property of some thousands of pounds more than he subscribed for. And the company being restricted as to the extent of the sum that they could risque at any one time, there was not a probability and scarcely a possibility of the insolvency of any of the members. It is owing therefore to events that have occurred after a lapse of many years, that this defense is now set up, which would otherwise never have been thought of. The articles state that they jointly associated for the purpose of insuring the ships, &c. of any individual whatever, without distinction. Complainant's testator then having paid the same premium for insuring his vessel that any other person would have done, he stands in point of justice and equity exactly on the same footing with any other individual, and is equally entitled to be paid the amount of his insurance by the company in solido. By one of the covenants, the complainants are pledged to stand to any insurance made by their directors. Mr. Lightwood having signed this policy as one of their directors, the complainant had a right to recover, and did obtain a verdict against him for the amount subscribed, and had he been solvent, would have received the whole thereof from him. And would it be contended that he, acting for the company, could not by filing a bill against the surviving members, have compelled them to indemnify him? Surely not. Nay, so sensible were the surviving members of their liability in solido to pay the debt, that when a suit was commenced against Lightwood to recover it, they had a meeting in 1793, and settled the proportion that each of them was to pay. Nor can we consider the arrangements then made as a new contract, or a deviation from the original articles, judging as we do that they were primarily bound.

*160

It is unfortunate indeed that they did not pursue the directions of their articles, when they chose their treasurer *in 1793, by obliging him to give security; in which case, those who paid their shares would not be injured.

*161

It is insisted that Lightwood was the authorized agent of the complainant to receive the money, therefore the complainant ought to bear the loss of the sums so received.

The contrary appears to be the truth of the case: for we find that Mr. Lightwood, together with Mr. Dawson, were appointed treasurers by such of the members as met in October, 1793, and although they might not have constituted a majority of the company, yet the others seem to have acquiesced in what they did; some by paying the sums which were settled as their proportion, and the rest being willing (as they acknowledge) to pay, had they been called upon. And further, from the testimony of Mr. Ward, it appears that complainant would not authorize him to pay any money to Mr. Lightwood as his agent: so that in no point of view could he be considered as the particular agent of complainant: therefore the loss of the money received by L. ought not to be borne by him; because it was peculiarly incumbent on those who did pay to see that the money was applied properly.

The laches therefore was theirs; for as much as they might have compelled Mr. Lightwood to pay it over if they had thought fit.

The fourth question respects the insolvencies, since the year 1793. There does not appear to be any particular laches imputable to complainant to make him liable for the whole loss. The members who met at that time, appointed their treasurer to settle all losses, and to recover all monies due to the company. The complainant therefore had no business to look for payment from any other quarter than the treasurer. And it was in proof that he had demanded payment from the treasurer Mr. Lightwood, from whom he received a letter, promising to call and settle with him in a few days.

Upon the whole of this case therefore, we are of opinion that the complainant is justly entitled to receive from the surviving members of the Insurance Company, the *sums insured on his vessel and cargo, with interest; nothing appearing on a fair and sound construction of the articles to differ his case from that of any other person: deducting therefrom his proportion (as a member of the company) of all the losses which have happened by the insolvency of members, except the monies received by Mr. Lightwood. There is no reason whatever, why complainant should share in that loss, he not having had anything to do with Lightwood's appointment. The rule of equity being clear, that if one of two innocent persons must suffer, he who trusts most should suffer most. The loss occasioned by L's insolvency, would unavoidably fall on those defendants alone who paid the money; but in the adjustment of it, it must be proportioned to the sums paid by them respectively; for money having no ear mark, it is impossible to ascertain whose it was precisely that he paid to complainant. Ordered, that it be referred to the master to ascertain the sum due to complainant, after deducting his proportion of loss, and the money already received by him. And in the settlement of the account, he is to adjust it on the same principles that were fixed by the jury in their verdict against Lightwood.

*162

The costs to be paid by defendants.

Turnbull for complainants.

Desaussure and Ford for defendants.

---

2 Desaus. 162

Case XVIII.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge and Marshall.]

DAVID ALEXANDER, and Others, v. the Executors of JAMES MUIRHEAD.

(October, 1802.)

[Stipulations ⇐13.]

The Court opened a stipulation entered into between the insurers and the insured, by which it was agreed that one case should decide all the others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Stipulations, Cent. Dig. §§ 67–76; Dec. Dig. ⇐13.]

[Stipulations ⇐13.]

It appeared that the evidence applicable to one of the cases, was not applicable to the others. A misrepresentation was alleged as to some of the underwriters—not as to others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Stipulations, Cent. Dig. § 68; Dec. Dig. ⇐13.]

*163

[Stipulations ⇐13.]

*The Court opened the stipulation so far as to let the insurers have the benefit of a trial before a jury, on the question of misrepresentation.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Fludd v. Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States, 75 S. C. 319, 55 S. E. 762.

For other cases, see Stipulations, Cent. Dig. §§ 67–76; Dec. Dig. ⇐13.]

[Equity ⇐38.]

The case sent down to trial at law, with all the proceedings in equity to be given in evidence. The injunction continued.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 103; Dec. Dig. ⇐38.]

[This case is also cited in McDow v. Brown, 2 S. C. 112, without specific application.]

The bill filed in this case was to set aside an agreement entered into by the complainants, with the defendants, by which it was stipulated that all the suits against the underwriters in the policy of insurance in the case then in dispute, should be determined by the decision which might be made on one of them; and thus to enable the complainants to have a trial on all the cases.

It was found after the loss occurred and after the suits brought, and the stipulation entered into, that different representations, as to the time of the vessels sailing, had been given to different underwriters by the broker and his clerk.

The broker had stated the true time of the sailing to the underwriters, Kirke & Lukens, against whom the suit was brought, which was actually tried, and a verdict found against them. But the brokers clerk, Mr. Watson, had stated a different time to the other underwriters, who have entered into the stipulation bond.

It was supposed this difference, (about 8 days) was so material in a West-India voyage, as would have made a difference in the risque, and in the premium.

The object therefore was to have an opportunity of having those causes tried in which the misrepresentation had been made, so as to have the opinion of the jury, on the materiality of such misrepresentations, though they were said to be unintentional.

The bill stated that complainants being Marine Insurers, subscribed two policies upon the schooner Juno, her tackle, &c. and her cargo; from the port of Charleston to the Havanna, in the Island of Cuba; which insurance was effected for the executors of James Muirhead.

That very shortly after the policies were effected, the *complainants were informed that the Juno and her cargo had been lost: and some time after, they were applied to for payment. That by comparing the facts stated by the assured, with the information given when the policies were opened, there appeared to be a material misrepresentation. As it was represented to the complainants by J. Watson, the clerk of Denoon, the broker who applied for insurance, that the Juno had sailed about the last of Dec. 1800, when she had in fact sailed on the 23d Dec. 1800. That the misrepresentation was of such a nature as to avoid the policy; as the Juno would have been deemed a missing vessel, and not insured at all, or at an enhanced premium; and therefore complainants conceive themselves justified in refusing payment. That the executors insisting that no misrepresentation had been made, placed the policies in the hands of H. Bailey, Esq. to commence suits at law. That complainants at that time understanding that the policies had been offered by the same agent, and of course that what had been represented to one had been represented to all of the underwriters, concluded that the trial of any one case would substantially try the whole, they therefore entered into an agreement in writing, that the determination of one of the cases should decide the whole. And they constituted Messrs. Desaussure and Ford, attornies to confess judgment for each of them, if the verdict should be in favour of the plaintiffs; to which stipulation Desaussure and Ford added their engagement to confess the judgment, in the event mentioned.

*164

The complainants supposing the cases to be similar, entered more readily into this agreement to avoid trouble and expence to both parties; but it was never intended by themselves or by plaintiff's attorney to prevent any evidence that might have been adduced, if they had not signed it.

That Messrs. Kirke and Lukens were selected by the insured as the underwriters, against whom to commence the suit for actual trial; and complainants still unapprized *of any difference in their cases made no objection. The cause was tried on the 12th June 1801, and David Denoon, the broker was produced by the plaintiff to testify that he in person offered the policy and made the true representations to Kirke and Lukens; whereupon a verdict was given against Messrs. Kirke and Lukens.

*165

The evidence of Watson, which was peculiarly applicable to the other cases could not be adduced on the trial of Kirke and Lukens.

That a motion was made for a new trial; but as by the rules of law plaintiffs are allowed to enter up judgment and lodge executions to bind, subject to be set aside if a new trial should be granted, the plaintiffs in that case entered up their judgment, and tendered the records in all the other cases to complainant's attornies, to confess judgment according to the agreement; which they did; expecting they would be set aside with that of Kirke and Lukens, in case a new trial should be ordered in that cause.

That a new trial was awarded, and judgment set aside in the case of Kirke and Lukens; but the plaintiffs refused to set aside the others, and the complainants were held bound under judgments from the 9th January, 1802, to the 8th of March last, during which time the case of Kirke and Lukens stood as an issue for a second trial. That the complainants applied for redress, but their confession of judgment was pleaded in bar; that they offered to substitute and try any other case, for that of Kirke and Lukens; but were refused. That the judgments originally confessed are still maintained against the complainants, and they are informed the executions will be speedily issued. That complainants were justified in requesting such modification, that some other case than Kirke and Lukens's, should be tried, since in truth their cases had never been tried; nor the testimony of their witness (Watson) adduced; though so materially different from Denoon's.

That if the true day of the Juno's sailing had been represented, complainants should from the nature of the voy*age and the winds that had prevailed, have deemed her a missing vessel, and would not have insured at all, or but for an inhanced premium. The bill prays for relief, and for a writ of injunction.

*166

Desaussure and Ford, solicitors.

An injunction was granted at Chambers.

The defendants answer stated that the complainants subscribed the policies of insurance mentioned in the bill, and defendants say that they are firmly convinced that Andrew Smylie, who as their agent had the policies effected, made a true representation in writing to the broker, when the vessel had sailed, &c. The defendants admit that accounts of the vessel being lost, arrived in Charleston shortly after the insurance was made. But the defendants had not the most distant idea of the vessel being lost, when the insurance was effected.

The defendants admit that shortly after the loss of the vessel and cargo, they applied to the underwriters for payment of the sums by them sustained, when they or some of them doubted their liability to pay the respective losses, alleging that the vessel had been represented to have sailed about the last of December, when in fact she sailed the 23d of said month.

When the underwriters resolved to stand a suit, they proposed that a suit against one should determine the liability of all—and the defendants having agreed thereto, the rule was accordingly signed, wherein the complainants obliged themselves to abide by the decision of some one case to be tried at the then next Court of Common Pleas.

The defendants swear that Messrs. Kirke & Lukens's case was not selected as being more favorable to the defendants than any other on the policies; that they did not know until the trial of the cause, that Denoon the broker, had himself called on Kirke and Lukens, and that the clerks of Denoon called on the other underwriters to have the policies subscribed; nor did the defendants give any instruction to their attorney who should be sued.

*167

*The defendants say it is impossible to answer the allegations of the bill as to the complainant's views in entering into the stipulation rule. The defendants swear they made no misrepresentation in any matter relative to the insurance; that if any was made, it was done through inadvertence or mistake of Mr. Denoon's clerk; that if a misrepresentation had been made, the complainants could have been injured only in receiving a few dollars less in the premium. The defendants admit that they on the 12th June, 1801, obtained judgment against Kirke & Lukens as mentioned in the bill; and whereon Kirke & Lukens gave notice of a motion for a new trial in that case, contrary to the stipulation rule. It was known by the complainants and defendants, that the Court of Common Pleas being a Circuit Court, could not grant a new trial, or review a verdict which had been taken under its authority. The defendants swear they never contemplated a further trial or decision than was to be had in the said Circuit Court; that they never would have consented to the stipulation, if they could have foreseen that the verdict v. Kirke & Lukens was to have been appealed from. The defendants are of opinion that they were entitled by the stipulation to have judgment confessed, and executions issued against all the other underwriters in the policies, and accordingly applied to Messrs. Desaussure and Ford to have the judgments confessed; when they required as a condition of confessing judgments, that executions should be lodged only to bind, until Kirke and Lukens's case should be finally determined. And as it was understood by all the parties, that after the final decision of Kirke and Lukens's case, no further opposition should be made; the defendants permitted the executions to lie in the sheriff's office without being proceeded on. The defendants admit that the judgments were not set aside, when a new trial was ordered in the case against Kirke and Lukens.

The defendants submit that this court will not intermeddle with the judgments and executions so obtained, or order further examination of the causes, which would enable *complainants a second time to attempt availing themselves of the strict rules of law. The defendants admit that application was made to the presiding judge in the Court of Common Pleas, who, on the 12th of February last, tried Kirke and Lukens's case a second time, for an order to set aside the judgments confessed, but the order was refused. The defendants admit that they were applied to by complainants to consent that the judgments should be set aside, or some other case substituted in lieu of Kirke and Lukens's which the defendants refused, because they had been already delayed for about a year in the recovery of their just demand; and because they apprehended the complainants might select some case, wherein the broker's clerk might possibly, through mistake, have made an incorrect representation. The defendants would have considered themselves bound, and would have abided by the decision of the case, if the verdict had been against them. So on the other hand, the complainants should be bound by the decision already given. The answer denies combination, &c.

*168

H. Bailey, defendants solicitor.

At the hearing of the cause, the case was argued by Messrs. Desaussure and Ford for the complainants, and by Mr. Bailey for defendants.

The court heard the testimony on the point of the misrepresentation; some of which was contradictory. There did not seem to be any fraud in the case; but it appeared that the broker and his clerk had stated different times of the vessel's sailing, to the different underwriters.

The court thereupon opened the agreement or stipulation, and sent the case down to be tried by a jury.

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the Court.

The objects of this bill are two fold.

1st. To set aside the agreement in the bill mentioned, upon the principle that it was founded in mistake, viz.—That all the cases on the policies were similarly circumstanced: Whereas the truth is, that they were materially *different, and evidence applied to that which was tried, (to wit, Kirke and Lukens's case) would not apply to the complainants cases; nor would the court admit the evidence in favor of the complainants to be adduced, as they were not parties to the suit.

*169

2nd. That this court should set aside the policies for misrepresentation, or send the parties to law. Upon the hearing, the court were of opinion that from the words of the agreement, it was not so conclusively binding as to preclude an investigation of the question. It was therefore fully discussed, and a variety of contradictory testimony was adduced.

As there did not appear to be the smallest tincture of fraud in the case, which would give this court a concurrent jurisdiction with the court of law, and the question is simply a question of fact, whether the representation made to complainants was true or not, material or immaterial, which is properly triable by a jury; as a court of law is the proper tribunal for cases of this kind, where they are uniformly tried, and complainants may there have complete and adequate remedy: This court would be cautious of encroaching on the jurisdiction of the other court.—We will therefore direct an issue to try those facts: and that the proceedings in this case be given in evidence at the trial, and continue the injunction in the meantime.

Chancellor Burke died in the summer of 1802; and William Dobein James, then Solicitor of the Northern Circuit, was elected Chancellor, and commissioned on the 14th December, 1802. The Court then was constituted by Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.

2 Desaus. *170

*Case XIX.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.]

FRANCIS HENDERSON and Wife, and the Trustees for his Wife, v. HENRY LAURENS, Executor of Henry Laurens, Deceased. (May, 1803.)

[Wills ⇐734.]

Interest on legacy decreed to be paid at 5 per cent. according to the will of the testator, till the time of the payment fixed by the will. After that at 7 per cent. according to the interest of the country.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1847–1872; Dec. Dig. ⇐734.]

The principal of the legacy not to be raised till the further order of the Court.

£400. per annum to be paid to complainant's wife according to deed of separation. And if a further provision of £300. per annum should fail in England, the same to be paid out of the estate here.

[Husband and Wife ⇐8.]

[Cited in Myers v. Myers, Bailey, Eq. 29, to the point that a wife is not entitled, as against her husband, to receive the interest of a legacy given to her, except to the extent of a suitable maintenance, notwithstanding she is living apart from her husband, under a deed of separation.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. ⇐8.]

The bill was filed by complainants for the recovery of a legacy bequeathed by Henry Laurens (formerly president of Congress) to his grand daughter, Frances Laurens, the only child of his eldest son, Col. John Laurens, deceased. He directed that the legacy should be paid her, on attaining 21 years, or day of marriage; and should bear an interest of five per cent.

She has attained 21 years of age; and also married the complainant, Francis Henderson, from whom she has since been separated by a deed mutually entered into, by which it was stipulated that the sum of £400 sterling should be secured to her annually. The bill was to procure the payment of the legacy above mentioned.

The cause was argued, and Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the Court.

It is ordered that it be referred to the master to state and settle the arrears of interest due to complainant's wife, when she became entitled to her legacy, under the will of her grand father; calculating interest at the rate of 5 per cent. agreeable to his will, to that time. That he do allow 7 per cent. interest on the principal of the legacy from the time it became due; and 7 per cent. also on the arrears of the annual interest. That so much of the annual interest *of the legacy as shall be sufficient to make up the sum of 400*l.* per annum, agreed to be secured to the complainant's wife by the deed of separation, shall be remitted to her in half yearly payments by defendant; and the remainder of the interest accruing annually on the legacy, shall be paid by defendant to complainant, Francis Henderson. If the funds in England, which secures to complainant's wife the sum of 300*l.* per annum, shall at any time fail to produce that sum, it shall be made good out of the estate of complainant in this country. That the testator having expressly charged the estate devised by him to the defendant with payment of the legacies contained in his will, and it not being necessary at present to raise the principal of the legacy bequeathed to complainant's wife, the court will not now direct it to be done: but if the defendant shall fail to comply with the foregoing order, as is therein directed, the complainants may apply by petition to the court, in which case, if it shall be expedient, the defendant will then be ordered to raise the said legacy forthwith. The costs to be paid by the defendant.

*171

---

2 Desaus. 171

Case XX.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.]

PHILIP GIVENS and Wife v. HENRY CALDER.

(May, 1803.)

[Specific Performance ⟸38.]

A parol agreement for the sale of land will not be decreed specifically against the heir of the vendor, though he had given instructions in writing, stating the terms, to an attorney to draw the deeds of conveyance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 113; Dec. Dig. ⟸38.]

[Frauds, Statute of ⟸106.]

The deeds were drawn, and the vendor took them home and wrote to the vendee that the deeds were ready, and requested her to attend and settle the business, but he died before the parties met. This is not such an agreement in writing as will take the case out of the statute of frauds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 193, 210, 211; Dec. Dig. ⟸106.]

[Frauds, Statute of ⟸129.]

The person contracting to purchase, having deposited part of the purchase money with her agent to pay the vendor as soon as he exe*cuted the deeds, and the agent informing the vendor of it, is not such a part performance as takes the case out of the statute.

*172

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 287–292, 303, 306–308, 311, 314, 318–320, 322, 325, 326; Dec. Dig. ⟸129.]

[Frauds, Statute of ⟸129.]

Nor does the purchaser taking possession of the land, without any known permission of the vendor, make such part performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 287–292, 303, 306–308, 311, 314, 318–320, 322, 325, 326; Dec. Dig. ⟸129.]

[Specific Performance ⟸39.]

The defendant may have the benefit of the statute without pleading it.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Suber v. Richards, 61 S. C. 403, 39 S. E. 540.

For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 119; Dec. Dig. ⟸39.]

[Frauds, Statute of ⟸113.]

[In order to make a letter evidence of a contract for the sale of land, it must distinctly set forth the terms of the contract, or refer to some written instrument in which the terms are set forth.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 239; Dec. Dig. ⟸113.]

[Frauds, Statute of ⟸158.]

[Parol proof of part performance of a parol agreement is not admissible to take the case out of the statute of frauds.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 374; Dec. Dig. ⟸158.]

[This case is also cited in Sebben v. Trezevant, 3 Desaus. 220, on the doctrine of limitation of action.]

This was a bill for the specific performance of a contract for a tract of land alleged to have been made by the complainant Philip Givens, as the agent of the late Mrs. Agnes Kelsal, with Dr. Calder, since deceased.

The bill charged that Dr. William Calder of Edisto Island, being possessed of a tract of land in fee, in Prince William's Parish, containing 818 acres, bounded northwardly by lands belonging to the heirs of John Kelsal, deceased; westwardly, by lands of Ann Kelsal, deceased; southwardly, by a creek, separating Coosaw Island, and eastwardly, by lands called Kean's Neck; and being desirous to sell said tract, complainant, as agent for Mrs. Ann Kelsal, about July, 1797, (after frequent meetings for that purpose) agreed with said William Calder for Mrs. Kelsal, to purchase the said land on the following conditions, viz. That she, Ann Kelsal, should pay for said tract 20 shillings per acre, in the following manner, i. e. £218 cash, and the remainder in 1, 2 and 3 years from the date of the purchase: That for securing the said remainder, the said Ann Kelsal should execute bonds to that amount, and also a mortgage of the said land to said William Calder, who promised complainant to go to Charleston and have the deeds of conveyance of said land, and also the bonds and mortgages aforesaid, drawn, and conveyances executed by him, and deposit them all in the hands of Mr. John Rhodes, merchant, in Beaufort, to be delivered by him to Mrs. Kelsal or agent, whensoever she should have paid the sum of £218 aforesaid, and execute the bonds and mortgage for the remainder. That in pursuance of this agreement, complainant as agent for Mrs. Kelsal, informed the said William Calder that the sum of £218 was in Mr. Rhodes's possession, who had been directed to remit *it to Mr. Bold, merchant in Charleston, there to be subject to the said William Calder's order, when he should have delivered the said conveyances to said Ann Kelsal. To this proposal, William Calder assented, and further agreed that said Mrs. Kelsal should take possession of said land, and prepare for the next crop if she thought proper. That Mrs. Kelsal entered on said land without hindrance; and that William Calder shortly after went to Charleston, where he directed an attorney to draw the conveyances and three bonds for £200 each, being the remainder of the purchase money, and a mortgage, &c. securing the payment of the same. That said Calder survived his return from Charleston but a few days, dying intestate, and with the deeds and mortgage aforesaid in his possession.

*173

That said Ann Kelsal died in the month of January, leaving valid her will, wherein after other devises and bequests, she gave, devised, and bequeathed all the remainder of her estates, real and personal, not before disposed of, to the complainant Sarah Givens, who was her niece, for the term of her natural life, and at her death to her issue, by Phillip Givens. That complainant entered on said land as a part of the residuary estate, and now possesses it.

Bill further states, that complainant has long since paid the whole amount of the said purchase to Mr. Bold, to be paid to the representatives of said William Calder, when conveyances should be made by them to the devisees of said Ann Kelsal.

That one Henry Calder, the brother and pretended heir to said William Calder, hath since claimed said land.—Complainant having always been ready to perform the testatrix's part of the aforesaid agreement, and having paid the purchase money to Mr. Bold as aforesaid, wishes to procure good titles from Henry Calder, the brother and pretended heir aforesaid; but said Henry refuses to do it, alleging untruly, that his brother made no such agreement: that said H. Calder has applied to some gentlemen of the bar to issue a writ of ejectment to remove complainants from said land.

*174

*Bill prays that said Henry Calder may be compelled to answer particularly, whether he did not know of such agreement, of the terms thereof, and of Mrs. Kelsal's possessing said land in conformity thereto? Whether he did not find among his brothers papers, the conveyances spoken of here, the bonds and mortgage aforesaid, prepared for execution; and whether the purchase money of the said land hath not been offered him by complainant? Whether he hath not been requested to execute the conveyances of said land, and perform said agreement? Whether he hath not refused to do so, and for what reasons.

The bill prays that the said Henry Calder may be decreed to a specific performance of the said agreement; and that complainants may continue in possession of the land, uninterrupted by the said Henry Calder.

The defendant Henry put in an answer to the bill.

The answer admits that Wm. Calder of Edisto owned the property described in bill; states that defendant is entirely ignorant of all agreements made by said W. Calder and Mrs. Kelsal's agent, and of the arrangements made for completing the same. He therefore cannot admit the charges in bill, relative thereto. That said agreement stated in bill having been verbal, is void by the statute, 29th Chs. 2d, Chap. 3, of force in this state. That defendant is also ignorant of the agreement of said W. Calder, that Mrs. Kelsal should enter on and prepare said land for the next crop, and of her having entered thereon without hindrance.

That defendant has been informed that neither Mrs. Kelsal nor her agent entered on said land until some considerable time after said W. Calder's death; and even then without the knowledge of his heirs or representatives, and therefore that said entry is only an act of trespass. That defendant knows nothing of said W. Calders having gone to Charleston for the purpose of procuring said titles, bond and mortgage mentioned in bill, and cannot admit that he did; but admits that he went to town in August, *returned to Edisto, and then died of a fever very shortly after. That said W. Calder mentioned on his way to Charleston, at the time above mentioned, that he was in treaty with another person for said land, and if he did not decline, should have it.

*175

Admits that defendant on his return from Scotland, found a number of blank papers, and among them deeds entirely unexecuted in his brothers possession, which he never even read, considering them useless. They were with other waste paper destroyed. That if they are to be produced as binding on defendant when he has no legal hold on complainants, then he must be at their mercy, and the terms must be their own. That Mrs. Kelsal died, as is stated in bill, and that the exhibit filed, is a copy of her will. Defendant thinks that a claim made under the residuary devising clause of a will, executed before the time it is said such purchase was made, is not maintainable; that from the circumstances mentioned, complainants claim should not be aided. That defendants cannot admit the asserted deposit of the amount of the purchase money with Mr. Bold to pay for said land, when proper conveyances should be made for it. Defendant denies that said money was ever tendered to him, or that they ever offered to fulfill their contract, until a considerable time after his arrival in this country; although the lands increased daily in value. That defendant, as an heir and brother of said William, has powers of attorney from the other heirs.—That he has administered on the personal estate of his brother who died intestate, and without issue. Admits that finding said Givens in possession of his land, he has bro't an action at law to eject and recover damages against him. That said Givens applied to defendant for titles a length of time after defendants arrival here, under pretence of the said parol agreements, which defendant declines doing for the reasons before mentioned.

Denies all combination, &c.

The cause came to a hearing, and the evidence was gone into, and an argument ensued. But the complainant's *counsel being prevented by the court from giving any evidence of the contents of a letter from Dr. Calder to Mr. Givens,† which was alleged, but not proved to be lost, the complainants were suffered to withdraw the cause, in order to file a supplemental bill, charging the defendant with having seen the said letter, and with having possession of the title deeds, drawn by order of D. Calder, though not executed.

*176

The complainant accordingly filed a supplemental bill, charging that the late Dr. Calder had, a short time before his death, written a letter to Mr. Givens, informing him that he had caused the deeds to be drawn to convey the lands he had sold him for Mrs. Kelsal, and requesting them to meet him to complete the business.

The bill also charged that the defendant, when he got possession of his brother D. Calder's papers, had found among them the deeds drawn by his instructions for conveying said lands to Mrs. Kelsal.

To the supplemental bill, the defendant put in his supplemental answer.

Answer admits that complainants filed their bill at the time mentioned in their supplemental bill, to which defendant filed an answer on the 30th day of September, 1801.—Admits that complainants have since filed a supplemental bill, in answer to which defendant says: that after he arrived in this country, (in 1798,) the documents and papers of Dr. Calder were delivered to him, and he found among them the unexecuted deeds, bonds and mortgages, spoken of in the original answer: but solemnly declares he did not find among those papers any letters to or from Dr. Calder to Philip Givens, or Mrs. Kelsal, or to any other person relative to the lands in question: nor any memorandum or instruction in writing, except the unexecuted deeds, &c. aforesaid. That the knowledge of the letter from Dr. Calder to Philip Givens, defendant acquired from Givens *himself under the following circumstances. On the death of Dr. Calder, defendant came to and arrived at Charleston in April, 1798. Soon after his arrival, defendant was at Fenwick's Island where his brother's negroes planted, when P. Givens made himself known, and informed defendant that there had been a treaty on foot between Dr. Calder and himself, as agent for Mrs. Kelsal, for the purchase of the land which the doctor owned adjacent to her lands. P. Givens stated that the bargain had been nearly closed: that Dr. Calder had, by letter, invited him to settle the business, but the death of the doctor prevented the completion; and Givens then presented to defendant a copy of the letter which he believes was in the hand-writing of his brother, and was to the effect set forth by complainants. That P. Givens spoke at that time as of a bargain rendered incomplete by the death of the parties, and actually solicited defendant to sell him the land: but defendant expressing a reluctance to do so, he solicited the refusal of it, and declared he had taken no possession of it.—That Givens so little valued the letter in question, that he offered to give it up, or a copy of it: upon which defendant took a copy. Defendant knows not what has become of the letter, but supposes Givens being indifferent about the matter, lost or destroyed it. That defendant hearing that Givens intended to demand an execution of the bargain, applied to counsel and shewed a copy of the letter, and to the best of his recollection, (for he lost it,) the opinion of the counsel was, that it was an incomplete contract, and not obligatory. That defendant heard no more on the subject until April, 1799, when Wm. Robertson requested by letter that defendant would make titles to Givens for the lands, which he declined under a conviction that the bargain was incomplete. The answer concludes as usual, and prays to be dismissed, &c.

*177

The cause afterwards came to a hearing.

The following evidence was given on the part of complainant.

Mr. W. Robertson testified that Dr. Calder employed *him to draw deeds of conveyance from himself to Mrs. Kelsal and W. Givens, to whom he had sold some land.—In his instructions he stated it to be a tract of about 800 acres, at 20 shillings per acre; part of it to be cash, and the balance payable by instalments. He took the description of the land, and the terms from Dr. Calder's own hand writing. He drew also a mortgage of the land to secure the purchase money. Dr. Calder spoke of it as an actual sale, having made the arrangements with Mr. Givens, and said that by the agreement, the money was to be lodged in Mr. Bolds's hands till the titles were executed. He said he came to town expressly on that business, and was going out of town to meet the parties, and complete the business. The witness delivered all the papers drawn up, but not executed, to Dr. Calder, who left town; and as witness heard, died a few days after at his plantation.

*178

†See 2 Henry Blacks. 263. 2 Atk. 72. 1 Vern. 389. 1 Lord Raym. 731. 3 Term Rep. 151. 4 Term. Rep. 263. Gilb. Ev. 71.

The manner in which the cash part was to be settled or provided, was not mentioned in the instructions.

Mr. John Bolds testified that Mr. Rhodes sent down 260*l.* to pay the cash part of Mr. Givens's purchase of land from Dr. Calder, as soon as the titles were executed. Dr. Calder knew that this money was lodged with him, and asked if it was ready for him, and he answered yes.—The money has lain in his hands ever since. If Calder had called for it, he would have paid it to him. Calder made no reply, but that he had got the papers from Mr. Robertson, and was going to the country to close the matter with Mr. Givens. Thinks he would have held the money for Calder till he heard from him; but if Mr. Rhodes had written to him to return the money, believes he should have done so.

Mr. Rhodes testified that he had, at the desire of Mr. Givens, sent down £260 to his partner in Charleston, Mr. Bolds, to pay Dr. Calder the cash part of a purchase W. Givens had made from Dr. Calder. It has never been withdrawn. Witness knew that Mr. Givens and Mrs. Kelsal took possession of the land, and held it, and exercised acts of ownership over it. Cannot say whether with *the knowledge and consent of Dr. Calder, but presumes so.

*179

Mr. Hanahan and Mr. Seabrook testified that they had heard Dr. Calder say he had agreed to sell some land to Mr. Givens. It lay to the southward. They understood the bargain was completed.

Mr. Fickling swore that he had a conversation with Dr. Calder about his selling land to Mr. Givens, and about giving possession to Givens; but cannot be positive that Dr. Calder said he gave Givens leave to take possession, or was present when he did.

Mr. W. Whaley testified on the part of the defendant, that Dr. Calder stayed a night at witness's house on his way down to town in August, 1797, and informed him that he was going to town to see Mr. W. Simmons, to learn from him whether he had declined the purchase of a tract of land he had offered him, (that now in contest) for Givens, the complainant, had informed him that Mr. Simmons had told him he had declined it. Dr. Calder added, that if Mr. Simmons chose it, he should have the land. Mr. Whaley said that he was with Dr. Calder during the greater part of his illness on his return from town, and at his death. He never saw Givens or Mr. Fickling there, and he does not believe they saw him after his return.

Mr. W. Simmons testified that he never told Givens that he had declined the purchase of the land from Dr. Calder, that he did not even know Givens.

Mr. Joseph Alston, Mr. Ward, and Mr. Pringle argued for the complainants, that the contract in this case was very deliberate, and there was no uncertainty. The land sold was known and ascertained; the price was fixed; the terms arranged; the deeds drawn by Dr. Calder's own instructions, and found among his papers at his death; and in consequence of this agreement, and of these arrangements, certain acts were done, sufficient to take the case out of the operation of the statute of frauds. These acts were, the depositing part of the purchase money, with *the knowledge and approbation of Dr. Calder, in the hands of an agent, who was ready to pay it whenever the deeds should be executed. And then the purchaser had taken possession of the land and held it, under the impression that the bargain was completed. It was true there was no positive evidence that the possession had been taken by Mr. Givens, with the consent or by the direction of Dr. Calder; but the circumstances are strong to support the presumption that it was with his consent. Some of the witnesses thought so. And indeed the instructions in writing, given by Dr. Calder to Mr. Robertson, to enable him to draw the deeds, amounts to such memorandum in writing, connected with the other circumstances, as would take the case out of the statute.

*180

That in fact this was not an executory agreement, but executed. The letter of Dr. Calder to Mr. Givens, now admitted by defendant in his supplementary answer, shews that he considered the bargain as closed; and there is a marked correspondence between the letter, and the evidence of Mr. Robertson and Mr. Bolds.

There was no room for the jus deliberandi or locus penitentiæ. The contract was perfected, and ought to be carried into specific execution. There is no danger of fraud or perjury in such a case, and it is to avoid that danger that the statute was enacted.

The counsel cited 1 Vern. 364. Staples v. Butcher; 2 Vern. 456. Pike v. Williams; 2 Stra. 783. 3 Bro. C. C. 162. Tawney v. Crowther; 1 Fonbl. 165. 3 Ves. jun. 696. Foster v. Hale; 3 Atk. 1, Lacon v. Martins; 3 Atk. Only v. Walker; 3 Atk 503. Welford v. Beasly; Powel. 291. 1 Fonbl. 171, (in note) 168, 182. 1 Atk. 8, 13. 4 Ves. jun. 686.

Messrs. Desaussure and Ford and Parker argued for the defendant.

They contended that this case ought to be examined on two grounds.

1st. Under the operation of the statute of frauds, 29th Car. 2, chap. 3.

*181

*2nd. Under its own circumstances, independent of the statute, on the ground of the incompleteness of the contract, and on the inadequacy of price.

1st. Under the statute of Charles, it has been decided that if an agreement be by parol, and not signed by the parties, or some body lawfully authorized by them, if such agreement be not confessed in the answer, it cannot be carried into execution. But when in his answer, he allows the bargain to be complete, and does not insist on any fraud, there can be no danger of perjury; because he himself takes away the necessity of proving it.

So, if carried into execution by one of the parties, as by delivering possession, and such execution be accepted by the other, he that accepts it must perform his part. 1 Fonb. 165, 6, 7, 8, 9.

The three important circumstances are:

1st. The signing by the parties.

2d. The confession in the answer that the bargain is complete.

3d. Or if possession has been delivered by one party, and accepted by the other as an execution of a complete agreement, or by such other acts as amount clearly to part performance.

In our case none of these are to be found.

Dr. Calder signed nothing.

His brother and heir does not confess the agreement to be complete.

No possession was delivered, but was taken after the death of Dr. Calder, and the pay was equivocal. As to what the law construes a signing. See 1 Fonb. 165, 178, (note C.) 1 P. Wms. 770, also 618, Hawkins v. Holmes, and notes by Mr. Cox. Whaly v. Bagenal, 6 Bro. P. C. 45 to 55. Parol evidence inadmissible to prove the agreement. 1 Vesey jr. 326, 330, 1, 3, 4. Brodie v. St. Paul.

Parol evidence not admitted to prove variation of agreement, though it is acknowledged an agreement existed. 1 Vesey jr. 402, Jordon v. Sawbrien.

*182

*Parol evidence refused where complainant stated agreement and defendant admitting that an agreement existed, denied that it was as stated. 3 Vesey, jr. 34, 8, 9, 40. Pym v. Blackburn. See all the cases cited in the note to this case, p. 38, 9, 40.

The cases which upon equitable grounds have been exempted from the operation of the statute of frauds are:

1st. Where in consequence of fraud the provisions of the act have not been complied with. See 1 Vern. 296. 1 P. Wm. 618. 1 Vesey 123. 2 Vern. 506. 2 Atk. 98. 3 Atk. 388. Ambler 67.

None such are pretended in this case.

2d. Where the agreement has been in part performed, either by delivery of possession, payment of money, &c. &c. see 1 Vern. 363, Butcher v. Stapely. 2 Vern. 455, Pike v. Williams. 1 Vesey, 82, 218, 297, 437. 2 Bro. C. C. 559, 567, Whitechurch v. Bevis. 3 Bro. C. C. 400. 1 Fonb. 165, 175. 1 Atk. 12, Clerk v. Wright. 3. Atk. Lacon v. Mertins. 6 Bro. P. C. 45, Whaly v. Baginal.

3d. Exception is where the answer admits an agreement. This has prevailed to the extent of binding the defendant by that admission. 2 Vesey, jr. 243, Mortimer v. Orchand.

"It has never been pretended that the admission of an agreement authorized the plaintiff to give (parol) evidence of the terms." 3 Vesey, jr. 39.

The late cases shew that the judges think the court have gone too far in trenching on the statute of frauds.

In Mortimer v. Orchand, 2 Vesey, jr. 243, the Chancellor says, (in 1793,) the bent of my mind is strongly in favor of the wisdom of the statute. Therefore I am rather against the cases which have entrenched upon it.

The present Chancellor (1798) declared he thought that "the Court had gone rather too far in permitting part performance, and other circumstances, to take cases out of the statute." 3 Vesey, jr. 712.

Parol evidence not admitted to prove an agreement *made upon purchase of an annuity, that it should be redeemable. 1 Vesey, jr. 241, Hare v. Sharewood.

*183

The answer denies that the agreement is complete.

The confession of an agreement in the answer must be complete, to take it out of the statute of frauds.

So is the text of 1 Fonb. 167, 8, 9. But where in his answer he allows the bargain to be complete, and does not insist on any fraud." And so are the cases cited.

In Moor v. Edwards, 4 Vesey, jr. 23, 4, the Lord Chancellor was of opinion, that "though the agreement is admitted, the statute may be used as a defence to the suit, notwithstanding complainant alleges part performance, by taking possession and improving. A case in Atkins misleads people on this point.

"Saving the benefit of the plea to the hearing gives a right to insist on the statute, as a defence to the suit, p. 24.

As to part performance, taking the case out of the statute, we answer, there was no part performance here, for the possession was taken, not given. It was taken after the death of Mr. Calder.

Now all the cases of part performance are made to turn upon the point, that one party permitted the other to act on the parol agreement. See 1 P. Wms. 770, 1, 2. Note (1.) See cases cited in 1 Fonb. 169, note 4, 171, note e.

The general rule is, (1 Fonb. 175,) that the acts must be such as could be done with no other view or design than to perform the agreement, and not such as are merely introductory or ancillary to it. Gunter v. Halsay. Ambler 586. Whitbread v. Brockhouse. 1 Bro. Rep. 412.

The giving possession is to be considered as an act of part performance. 1 Fonb. 175.

But giving directions for conveyances, and going to view the estate, are not. Clerk v. Wright, 1 Atk. 12. Whaley v. Bagnel. 6 Bro. P. C. 45. 1 P. Wms. 770. 1 Fonb. 165, 6.

*184

*Payment of money is part performance. Lacon v. Mertins, 3 Atk. 4. See 1 Atk. p. 497. But payment of earnest is not. 1 Fonb. 175. And there was no payment in this case.

Defendant not bound to confess or deny the agreement, as the statute affords a good defence against the performance of it; and it is immaterial whether the defence be set up in the shape of a plea, or by answer. The statute not having prescribed any mode in particular, by which a defendant must avail himself of such defence.

See 1 Fonbl. 171. 2 Bro. Rep. 559, 566, 7, 9. Whitchurch v. Bevis. 1 Bro. Rep. 404, 9. Whitbread v. Brockhurst. See particularly page 409.

By insisting in the answer on the statute, the party shall have the same advantage as upon a plea. 1 Eq. Cas. abr. 19, pl. 3. 2 P. Wms. 144. 1 Ves. 298. 1 Bro. Rep. 413.

Lord Camden's opinion in Cole v. White. If facts alleged to be done in part performance of an agreement, are denied, it is immaterial whether such denial be by plea or answer. 1 Bro. Rep. 416, 418. 3 P. Wms. 244.

Even the cases most favoring the opinion, that Courts of Equity may compel the performance, and consequently the discovery of merely parol agreements, require, that the terms of the agreement should be clear, definite and conclusive; and therefore if the court can collect the jus deliberandi or locus penitentiæ to have been reserved, the contract shall not be considered as complete till reduced into writing, or in part performed. 1 Fonbl. 171. Whaley v. Bagnel. 6 Bro. P. C. 45. Whitchurch v. Bevis. 2 Bro. Rep. 566.

We contend secondly, that under the circumstances of the case, and independently of the statute of frauds, it is in the discretion of the court to refuse to enforce this pretended agreement, on the ground of the incompleteness of the agreement; and the uncertainty, and on the inadequacy of price, and on alteration of circumstances.

*185

*That it is in the discretion of the court, see 1 Fonb. 178. 1 Vesey, jr. 565, Cooper v. Denne.

The agreement being incomplete, there was room for the locus penitentiæ. The letter of D. Calder to Givens, refers to a future meeting to compleat the business.

That uncertainty of terms is a good ground to refuse to decree specific execution. See 3 Vesey, jr. 184, 5.

Lord Chancellor says, "I lay it down as a general proposition, to which I know no limitation, that all agreements in order to be executed in this court must be certain and defined, equal and fair, and proved as the law requires. 3 Vesey, jr. 420. Lord Walpole v. Lord Orford.

That inadequacy of price will induce the court to exercise its discretion in refusing to compel specific performance. See 1 Fonb. 116, &c. &c. 2 Bro. P. C. 396.

Slight circumstances will be laid hold of. 1 Bacon, 109, 117. Title agreement.

Alteration of circumstances also will induce the court not to enforce specific performances. 1 Fonb. 384. 5 Viner's abr. 538, pl. 18. One of the parties was dead, who could explain the transaction. His heir is entirely ignorant. Meanwhile the land has risen three fold in value.

With respect to the performance of a contract, the time is material. Therefore a bill for specific performance was on gross laches of plaintiff, dismissed with costs. 4 Vesey, jr. 686, 9. Harrington v. Wheeler.

Lord Chancellor says, the case in 1 Amb. 12, Gibson v. Patterson, is fairly reported; time is material.

Agreements are not to be made out partly by parol and partly in writing. 1 Fonb. 174.

There is no instance of such an imperfect agreement decreed to be specifically executed against heirs of the supposed vendor. He certainly received no money and gave no possession; for he died immediately on his return from town without seeing Givens.

Dr. Calder's not signing the deeds in presence of his at*torney, nor before his death, proves that he thought the matter open till he should see Givens and Mrs. Kelsal, who were to execute on their part.

*186

Mr. Givens is not entitled to any favor. He attempted to mislead Dr. Calder, with respect to Mr. Simmons.

Dr. Calder not receiving the money, when Bold told him it was ready; but only desiring him to keep it; that he was going to meet Mrs. Kelsal and Givens, proves he did not consider it concluded.

Chancellor RUTLEDGE afterwards delivered the decree of the court.

The complainant's bill states, that he as the agent of a Mrs. Kelsal now deceased, in July, 1797, entered into a parol agreement with Dr. W. Calder, now also deceased, for the purchase of a tract of land on the terms and conditions in bill set forth. It states further, as a part performance of the agreement, that the sum agreed to be paid down was deposited with the complainant's agent, to be paid to Dr. Calder, when he should execute and deliver the titles to Mrs. Kelsal. Also, that Dr. Calder assented to Mrs. K's taking possession of the land, (which she did) and preparing for the next crop, if she thought proper.—That Dr. Calder went soon afterwards to Charleston, had titles drawn, and shortly after he returned home, (viz. in the month of August,) and died without compleating his contract. The bill therefore prays a specific performance by defendant as the representative of Dr. Calder.

The defendant in his answer says, he is entirely ignorant of any agreement made by Dr. Calder with complainant as agent of Mrs. Kelsal for the land, and therefore can neither admit or deny the charges in the bill. That being at any rate only a parol agreement, it is void by the statute of frauds. The defendant is ignorant of Dr. Calder's agreeing to Mrs. Kelsal's entering on the land previous to his making titles thereto; but has been informed that neither she nor her agent entered thereon till some time after Dr. Calder's death. He does not admit the de*posit of the money as a part performance, and denies that it was ever tendered to him, or that complainant offered to fulfil his contract, till a considerable time after defendant arrived in this country. The defendant not having confessed the agreement, nor admitted the allegations of part performance, as stated in bill, either of which would have been sufficient to induce the court to decree a specific execution of the agreement, (because where defendant confesses the agreement, or acknowledges part performance, there is certainly no danger of fraud or perjury, which were the objects contemplated by the statute) it was necessary for the complainant to support his case by proof. This he has attempted to do by the adduction of parol evidence as to the part performance; first, by payment; next, by delivering possession of the land, & thereby to take the case out of the statute. He also attempted to prove by parol evidence, the contents of a letter written to him by Dr. Calder; but that not being admitted, the counsel on both sides went into the cause and argued the case very fully. The complainant immediately after the first hearing, filed a supplemental bill, wherein he recites the letter alleged to have been written by Dr. Calder to complainant, and calls for an answer from the defendant, whether he has not seen such a letter in Dr. Calder's hand writing. Defendant by his answer acknowledges that the complainant had shewn him a letter which he believed to be in the handwriting of his brother, though he had not seen or corresponded with him for many years. The letter in substance is to inform complainant that all the writings for the land he had bought were ready, and the sooner he came and settled the better; and desired Mrs. Kelsal should go with complainant, and take her security with her. The parol testimony of Mr. Fickling was produced to prove that he had seen the letter, and had a conversation with Dr. Calder about the sale of land, and giving possession to complainant; but he does not positively swear that Dr. Calder told him that he had given possession to complainant, nor does he know if Dr. Calder was present when complain*ant took possession, or that he gave complainant authority to take possession.

*187

*188

Mr. Whaley on the part of defendant, swore that Dr. Calder on his way to Charleston, in August, 1797, slept at his house, and informed him that he was coming to town to see Mr. W. Simmons, and to learn from him whether he had declined the purchase of the land now in contest: complainant having informed Dr. Calder that Simmons had declined it: that if Simmons had not told complainant so, he should have the land if he thought proper: that Whaley was with Dr. Calder after his return, during the greater part of his illness, and when he died: he never saw either complainant or Fickling there, and does not believe they saw the doctor after his return.

Mr. Simmons swears that he not only had not made such a declaration to complainant, but that he had not seen nor ever heard of complainant. The cause has been re-argued on the supplemental bill and letter, and the arguments ought to have been confined simply to the point, whether the letter written by Dr. Calder to complainant varied the case, without going into parol proof of possession. In determining on this case, we must reverse the order of things, and take up the last question first, by disposing of the letter set forth in the supplemental bill, and determining whether it varies the case. According to adjudged cases, it is clearly held that in order to make a letter evidence of an agreement for the sale of lands to take it out of the statute, it ought distinctly to set forth the terms of the agreement, or at least refer to some written instrument in which the terms are set forth, and that the party accepted such terms. Does the letter alluded to specify any thing? It does not. It only informs complainant that the deeds were ready when Mrs. Kelsal was disposed to perform her part. There was no obligation on her to do it. No evidence has been offered to shew even that she authorized complainant to negotiate the business. There was therefore no mutuality of contract.—That letter then, though the contents are admitted, does *not vary the case. As to the delivery of possession, there is no actual proof of it, for complainants own witness does not positively swear that Dr. Calder told him either that he had given or even authorized complainant to take possession. And from the evidence of Messrs. Whaley and Simmons, it is rather to be presumed that no possession was ever given or even authorized. The case therefore stands precisely on the same grounds it did upon the argument on the original bill and answer.

*189

It is a singular case, and there is not one like it in the books, for the parties to the agreement, seller and purchaser, are both dead, and the person who now comes forward to claim a specific performance of the agreement in his own right as the residuary legatee was the agent of the purchaser. It rests with him to make out such an agreement as best suits himself, and that too against a person who could not possibly know any thing of the transaction, being a total stranger in this country. We do not mean to charge complainant with suggesting in his bill any untruths; but a case of this sort may occur, and it would be scarcely possible for a defendant circumstanced like the present, to controvert the facts, if parol evidence was to be admitted. If ever there was a case therefore in which the statute should be rigidly adhered to, and the party have the benefit of it in its greatest latitude, it is the present.

The judges of the court of Equity were formerly very astute in laying hold of circumstances, in order to enforce parol agreements, and to take them out of the statute, whereby it is problematical whether they have not done more injury than real good. For though by a strict adherence to the letter of the statute, a present inconvenience might have been sustained, the mischief would soon have worked its own cure, and the parties would have reduced their agreements to writing, agreeable to the directions of the law. There would not then have been so many cases on the subject, various in their circumstances, and the decisions on them (as has been observed by a very ingenious *writer) not immediately reconcileable. The modern adjudications however are corrective of the former; and we find judges of the present day, declaring the bent of their minds strongly in favor of the wisdom of the statute, and against the cases that have intrenched upon it, and accordingly framing their decisions conformable to the intention as well as the letter of the statute. The question now before the court we believe has never been fully discussed. The present decision will therefore establish a precedent, and with it the law on the subject. The numerous cases that were cited have been carefully reviewed, and after mature consideration of them, we are clearly of opinion, that in the case of parol agreement, not tinctured with fraud, if the defendant chooses to avail himself of the statute, it is not necessary that he should by answer confess or deny the agreement, the law having declared it void. Neither ought he to be compelled to confess or deny part performance of it, although charged in the bill. That to permit parol proof of a parol agreement, would be in effect to repeal the statute, and introduce all the mischief, inconvenience & uncertainty it intended to prevent. That to admit parol proof of part performance of a parol agreement would be equally improper, and is not warranted by any of the cases in the books; for it is clearly held that if the part performance alleged be possession of land or the payment of money, the complainant must prove delivery of possession in the first case, or receipt or written evidence of payment in the other, to entitle him to a specific execution of the agreement. All the parol testimony therefore which has been adduced in the case to prove the parol agreement or the part performance of it, is made inadmissible and must be laid aside.

*190

The case thus standing without proof on the part of complainant, the facts of part performance, namely, payment of part of the purchase money and delivery of possession, not being admitted, but denied by the answer as fully and explicitly as defendant could do so,

The bill must be dismissed with costs.

---

2 Desaus. *191

*Case XXI.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.]

MAINE and Wife v. Adm'r of DICKINSON.

(May, 1803.)

[Executors and Administrators ⟸56.]

The complainants bill was for a discovery and account. They claimed under a voluntary deed of gift, to a niece. The defendant relied on a release, and a receipt of a later date, as full settlements of the estate.

It was in proof that no money was paid at the time of signing the release and receipt, and no actual consideration was established; which reduced the case to a question between two volunteers. Decreed that the first deed should prevail, and defendant to account for the estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 308; Dec. Dig. ⟸56.]

Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the Court.

Complainants bill is for a discovery and account of the estate of J. Dickinson. They claim so much of the widow's part of it, as she has not received from the administrator, by virtue of a deed of gift to complainant's wife, dated 20th May, 1798. Defendant opposes the claim to discovery in his answer, files an account of money paid her, and concludes finally by pleading a release from the widow, Mrs. Dickinson, and a receipt for £730. in full for the widow's proportion of the estate, dated 23d November, 1799.

The complainant's wife was Mrs. D.'s favored niece. The deed was executed when she was in good health. It is stated to be in consideration of natural love and affection, and to the intent to vest the absolute property of the negroes and all the rest of her property in complainant's wife at her death, and it was recorded in July, '98, previous to complainant's marriage. Complainant's witness, Miss Conyers, deposed that she frequently visited Mrs. D. during her last illness, (she died in January, 1800,) and the night before her death, the complainant, Maine asked her if she would have the deed back? She answered no! If it was not a good one, he might have another made.

Dr. Stevens, the defendant's witness, swore that when she executed the deed to defendant, she was in a destitute *situation, and very sick. That she executed the release immediately as it was presented; the other paper two or three days afterwards. That she was perfectly satisfied, took time to consider of it; and expressed her thanks to defendant, and Mrs. Shrewsbury for their attention. That when she executed the second paper, defendant promised to take care of her, that she would not want. That she was very sick when she signed the release and receipt, and there was no money paid when she signed the receipt for £730. on 23d November, '99. It is necessary here to remark that defendant also claimed under a deed from Mrs. D. 22d October, '99, the negroes mentioned in deed to complainant, and took possession of them on Mrs. D.'s. death. Complainant brought an action against him, obtained a verdict, and has thereby established his claim at law to the negroes. The only question now is, whether that deed or the release and receipt are to prevail. On the part of defendant, it was argued that he was a purchaser for valuable considerations, without notice, and to prove it, a lease for life from him to Mrs. D. of a house which he swears was purchased by him purposely for her accommodation, and her letters approving the house were produced. It is to be observed that this house was purchased in November, 1799, two or three months before her death, when she was extremely sick, and most probably with some of the money to which she was entitled from her husband's estate. She however never occupied it, for she died before it was in a situation for her to go into. As a strong proof that he was not a purchaser for valuable consideration of Mrs. Dickinson's rights, and of the release and receipt, the lease specifies that it was made in consideration of £250.: it does not say by whom paid, but it could be by no other person than the lessee Mrs. D. The release states what has not been proved, that he had settled his account; and it is in evidence that no money was paid by him when the receipt was given. If the defendant had proved himself a bona fide purchaser without notice, he must have *succeeded in his claim against complainant, whose deed was only a voluntary one, which though for a good consideration, such as natural love and affection, would not have prevailed. But defendant not having paid any consideration for his release or receipt, or if he had paid or promised to pay any money, it being only out of what Mrs. D. was legally entitled to from her husband's estate, he cannot be considered as a bona fide purchaser, nor can the release and the receipt be viewed in any other light than as voluntary acts; by no means however under as favorable circumstances as the deed to complainant's wife, which was made when Mrs. D. was in sound health, for a favorite niece, and in the cool moment of reflection. Whereas the release and receipt to defendant were obtained from her when she was extremely debilitated—almost at her last gasp, and not perfectly recollecting at the time, (as may reasonably be supposed) the deed she had formerly executed in favor of her niece, because the very day before her death (it is in evidence) she desired complainant Maine to have another deed drawn, if the former one was not sufficient. Upon a mature consideration of this case, the court are of opinion that defendant cannot in any point of view be considered as a purchaser for valuable consideration: but the release must stand purely on the footing of a voluntary deed. No money being paid when the receipt was signed, that must be laid aside.

*192

*193

Deed to complainant's wife, and the release being considered as altogether voluntary, the established rule both at law and in equity must prevail, which is that where there are several voluntary deeds, the first is to take place.

Complainants deed has already been established at law, and it was absolutely necessary for them to come here to obtain a discovery and account. It must therefore be referred to the master to state and settle the defendant's accounts and ascertain the balance remaining in his hands, which was unpaid at Mrs. D.'s death. With respect to the Georgia Lands, by the law of that state, if a person dies intestate, his widow is entitled to one third of his *whole real and personal estate. She, however, has a right to elect her dower if she thinks fit, and is nevertheless entitled to one third of his personal estate; as Mrs. D. did not make any election, complainants can only be entitled to one third of the money the land sold for.

*194

2 Desaus. 194

Case XXII.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.]

WILLIAM SKIRVING v. EDWARD NEUFVILLE.

(May, 1803.)

[Estoppel ⟸94.]

A mortgagee agrees that the mortgagor should sell to a third person part of the mortgaged negroes at an advanced price, and receives the purchase money, for which receipts were given, as of payments made on the debt due by the mortgagor. This is such a privity of contract between the mortgagee and the new purchaser, as releases the negroes so purchased and paid for, from the operation of the mortgage, though the remaining negroes are insufficient to satisfy the balance of the debt due by the first purchaser on the mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 247; Dec. Dig. ⟸94.]

This was a bill filed to obtain a perpetual injunction against a mortgage of negroes from George Tunno, to Edward Neufville, part of whom W. Skirving purchased with the consent of defendant, and paid him nearly all the purchase money. But the defendant insisted the negroes were liable under the original purchase, and mortgage by G. Tunno, for a deficiency, due by G. Tunno, which the other negroes included in the mortgage could not satisfy, as appeared by a sale made of them.

It appeared that when George Tunno was found to be incapable of paying the purchase money, Mr. Edward Neufville, the mortgagor, was anxious to obtain a safe purchaser for them, and opened a communication with Col. W. Skirving, which terminated in his agreeing to purchase part of the negroes, and to pay a larger price for them than Tunno had agreed to give; and the defendant consented to the purchase. Col. Skirving paid the purchase money through his factor to the defendant Neufville. But the receipts were expressed to be on account of Tun*no's debt to Neufville. The only question was whether there was such a privity of contract between complainant and defendant, as released the negroes from the mortgage of Tunno, on Col. Skirving's paying the defendant the amount of his purchase, there being a deficiency on the sale of the rest of the negroes.

*195

After the argument, Chancellor JAMES delivered the decree of the Court.

George Tunno bought 62 negro slaves of the defendant and gave him a bond and mortgage for them.

The debt being unpaid, defendant threatened to enforce his mortgage. George Tunno became anxious to make sale of some of the negroes, to raise money to pay the debt, and made application to the complainant to become the purchaser of some of them. That complainant called on defendant for the purpose of communicating with him on the subject. But defendant was not at home. Defendant afterwards wrote to complainant on the subject. And in two days after, defendant wrote to complainant, requesting him to commit to paper, the number and value of the negroes, the terms of payment, and reasonable manner in which complainant expected to accomplish the latter. And the defendant also expressed the most unlimited confidence in complainant's compleating the promises made. Complainant returned an answer in the manner requested by defendant, and conceiving the matter sanctioned by defendant, he concluded the bargain, by which he bound himself to pay £2775 for 37 of the negroes, most of whom were delivered to complainant by G. Tunno, with the assent of the defendant, and part of them by defendant himself. Afterwards the remainder of the negroes were sold below their value (defendant not attending the sale) under the mortgage, so that a large sum remains due on G. Tunno's original purchase and mortgage. Complainant has paid almost the whole of the amount of his purchase to defendant. But defendant insists that the negroes sold to complainant are liable to make good the deficiency *due by Tunno, on the mortgage; and he threatens to enforce the mortgage against them. The bill prays that the negroes purchased by complainant may be discharged from the lien, and that he may have a complete title.

*196

The defendant admits that G. Tunno was indebted to him as stated, but swears that he told complainant previous to the purchase of the negroes, that he would not relinquish his lien on the negroes, until the whole debt was paid; and thinks that complainant has secured himself from the effects of the mortgage, by an indemnity from George Tunno's brothers. That defendant did not deliver any of the negroes to the complainant, and submits that on a fair construction of the letters produced, he (defendant) cannot be considered as a party to the contract; but that the same was made by complainant with George Tunno.

Mr. Price proved that the first mover towards the contract was the defendant, who was anxious to conclude it. That complainant is particular in his bargains, and would not have concluded this if he had thought the property would remain subject to the lien, after he had paid his purchase. That the price of the negroes was £15. per head higher that the mortgagor had given for them. That complainant has paid the whole of the purchase money except £47. The letters were produced, as above stated, also a letter of 21st April, 1796, from defendant to complainant, wherein he makes some arrangements relative to the specified negroes which complainant was to receive. Complainant did receive the negroes and made payments on his purchase.

The court considered the bargain compleat at this stage, and would not consider the subsequent letters of defendant to T. Tunno, nor the receipts expressing the payments to be on account of George Tunno, to bear upon the question, as this would be allowing defendant to new model and colour the transaction so as to suit his own interests. The court upon the whole of the evidence, was satisfied that the application first came from the defendant to com*plainant. That defendant was anxious for the sale to the complainant, whom he considered a purchaser in whom he could place unlimited confidence. What then is to be presumed by this unlimited confidence? Certainly one without restriction, or any other pledge to secure the property than that required by the letter above stated, (to wit: that complainant would commit to paper the number and value of the negroes, the terms of payment, &c.) the object of defendant seems to have been to get the contract reduced to writing, so as to make it binding on the parties. Complainant did so write, and defendant was satisfied. Here then the contract was complete; and the privity of contract between complainant and defendant is established. It is acknowledged by defendants counsel, that this privity is the principal criterion by which to judge whether this contract was a separate and independant one of that made with George Tunno.

*197

The court thinks the privity is complete in all its parts. As soon as G. Tunno assented to deliver up the negroes, it appears that he was no more consulted, and every step taken was between complainant and defendant.

Complainant thinks himself released from the operation of the mortgage, and Mr. Price proves that complainant acted on that principle. Defendant swears he never meant to release the negroes till the whole debt (from Tunno) was paid. The letters must decide this point in this contradiction; and the court is of opinion that whether defendant meant to release the negroes purchased by complainant from the mortgage or not, he has used expressions which the court must consider a release. It is said that the defendant's intent never to release the negroes till the whole amount of George Tunno's purchase was paid, came to complainant's knowledge. This would have been very important if it had come to complainant's knowledge before the completion of the contract: but it seems to have been after the contract was completed. Another circumstance of weight is, that defendant might have got more for the remainder of the negroes, (in Tunno's hands) and receiv*ed full payment of the balance by more equitable means than a rigid adherence to the enforcement of the mortgage by the sheriff for cash; at which sale he did not attend, but allowed them to go off low. Mr. A. Tunno offered his note for the balance of debt, with an endorser at 90 days, if he would release the negroes—this was refused.

*198

The conclusive consideration with the court is, that the complainant bought the negroes with the consent of the defendant for a full price, (higher than the first sale) and complainant has paid it all except £47.

It is common for sellers to warrant the property on sales for full value. Here where defendant was the real seller for full price, (which he has received) there is no good reason why the seller should be allowed to disturb the property.

Decreed, that on complainant's paying the balance due by him on his purchase, (and it is referred to the master to ascertain it) the defendant be perpetually enjoined from disturbing the complainant under the mortgage.

Defendant to pay costs of suit.

Mr. Pringle for complainant.

Messrs. Ward, Drayton and Simons for defendant.

---

2 Desaus. 198

Case XXIII.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.]

ANONYMOUS.

(May, 1803.)

[Husband and Wife ⊂283.]

The Court of Chancery will decree alimony in proper cases: but a widow is not entitled to recover alimony or maintenance from the estate of her deceased husband, after living many years separate from him, without suing in his life time. The demand does not survive, though the separation was at the desire of the husband, and against her inclination, and there was no fault in her conduct alleged against her: and he never maintained his wife or child during his life, and made no adequate provision for them by his will: and though she forbore to institute suit for alimony in her husband's life time, to prevent violence between him and her relations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 1073; Dec. Dig. ⊂283.]

*199

*The bill was filed on the 5th of Dec. 1800, by a widow against the executor of her deceased husband to obtain arrears of maintenance from her husband's estate during many years that he had lived apart from her, and furnished no means of support to her, or to his daughter.

The bill states that the complainant married the defendant's testator in May, 1772, at London, and arrived in this state in August following. That on the 28th of Feb.

following, complainant was delivered of a daughter at the house of her husband's mother. That from their marriage until the birth of said daughter, they lived together as man and wife, though not happily. That in May, after the birth of her daughter, she visited her friends in another part of the country at the desire of her husband. That afterwards she was desirous to return to her husband, but he refused to receive her, and continued so to do until his death in February, 1796. That her friends perceiving he intended to live separate from her, they insisted he should allow her a separate maintenance; and accordingly some negotiations were begun, and eminent counsel employed to enforce the claim, who made some progress in the business; and her husband offered to hire a house for her in Charleston, and to maintain her as his wife; and he assented that she might fix her own annuity. That some altercation taking place, a quarrel ensued between her said husband and her counsel, which ended in blows, and a duel between her said husband, and a nephew of her counsel. And the complainant being alarmed at these violences, and fearing that the death of her said husband, or some of her relations who took a warm part in her cause, might be the consequence of pursuing her claim, she on this account alone desisted from pursuing the same.

That from the time she visited her friends, until the marriage of her daughter, neither herself nor her daughter were maintained by her husband; but by her relations until the death of her father, who bequeathed to her brother property amounting to £1600 in value, in trust for the sole use of complainant and the heirs of her body, with which *she has maintained herself and her daughter, until her daughter's marriage. That notwithstanding the long separation, complainant being conscious she had acted like an affectionate wife, hoped he would finally compensate her for the distress she had sustained by his conduct; but he died (sometime early in Feb'ry. 1796) without compensating his wife and daughter for the neglect hitherto shown as to their maintenance. That at the death of her husband he had by him a will dated in Oct. 1791, in which, among other devises, he gives as follows: "First, after all my just debts are paid, I give and bequeath unto my wife (naming her) the sum of fifty pounds sterling, in lieu of her dower, and every other of her demands against my estate real or personal." And then after giving £50 to his daughter, he devised the residue of his estate to distant relations, and appoints the defendant his executor. That his estate was estimated at £15,000 sterling, and complainant knowing her right to dower out of the real estate to be incontrovertible, and that her claim to maintenance during separation, and the infancy of her daughter, was just, instituted her suit at law for the first, and demanded payment of the latter from the executor, hoping her demand would have been complied with: but although the legality of complainants claim was admitted, and a recovery had as to her dower; yet said executor has refused her demand for alimony, alleging at one time that she eloped from her husband, whereas complainant charges that she quitted her husband's house on the visit appointed by his express direction; at other times the defendant pretends that if complainant ever had any right to alimony, she relinquished it by desisting from her pursuit of it for so many years; and that if she did not, her right expired with her husband.

*200

Whereas complainant contends that desisting for a time under imperious circumstances, by no means implies a relinquishment; and that such claim cannot expire with her husband, seeing that maintenance is an obligation imposed by law upon a husband, which therefore will survive, whe*ther created by act of parties or provision of law. All which doings are contrary to equity and good conscience.

*201

Bill concludes in usual manner, and prays for relief.

To this bill the defendant pleaded the statute of limitations.

On argument, the plea of the statute of limitations was overruled. But the court having some doubts whether the demand was not altogether of a personal nature, and whether by the wife's not making her application during the life of her husband, she had not slept so long on her rights as to have lost her title to relief, the court directed that point to be argued and precedents sought for, before they would order the defendant to answer.†

This question came on to a hearing, and was argued by Messrs. Parker, Holmes and Desaussure and Ford for complainant, and by Messrs. Drayton and Simons for the defendant.

For the complainant, it was contended that the doctrine of alimony is derived from that of divorce a mensa et thoro, by the ecclesiastical court. There is no such court in this country; but a voluntary separation by mutual consent, or a separation by the wife, ex justa causa, must draw after it the same doctrine and relief. This arises ex necessitate, else the greatest injustice would be done, without any remedy for it. And even in England where there are competent Ecclesiastical Courts, the Court of Equity has concurrent jurisdiction. See 1 Fonbl. 96, 7. 2 Vern. 752. Williams v. Callow. The suit for alimony is given to the wife in case of separation, if the husband refuses to make her an allowance suitable to their station in life, and his fortune. It is called an injury to the wife, which the court christian will redress. See 3 Bla. Com. 93, 4.—Alimony is a vested right, on a proper case being made out. It arises out of the marriage contract to maintain *the wife; together if they live happily; separate, if unhappy circumstances should separate them without criminality on the part of the wife. It is an allowance out of the husband's estate for the wife's support, on consideration of all the circumstances, 1 Bla. Com. 441, 2.

†This was equivalent, as insisted by her counsel, to putting the cause on the footing of a bill demurred to: or a motion to dismiss a bill for want of equity apparent on the face of the bill, admitting it to be true.

*202

Maintenance is a vested right in the wife, founded on the marriage contract; on the weakness of the sex; on the confidence implicitly reposed in the husband; on the great advantages given to the husband in and over the property of his wife. It is a duty to allow it. Godolphin, 509. 1 Levinz. p. 6. See 2 Blac. 302.

There is no good reason why this right should not survive to the wife. The claim being founded in contract, the most sacred of all others, the marriage contract, may survive as well as any other contract, unless satisfied in the life time of the parties:—and it is more peculiarly so, as the law relying on the husband's faithfully performing his contract, and his duty to maintain his wife, gives him an absolute right in all her personal estate, reduced to possession, and other rights in her other property; from which alone she could be maintained, if he refuses to do so.

It cannot be reasonably contended that this right to sue for and recover alimony, arises ex delicto; no more than any other case, where a man by breach or non performance of a contract, makes himself liable to suit. And there is no more reason for the uncertainty of the amount preventing the claim surviving in this case than in any other. And there are numerous cases of claims of uncertain amount surviving. Nor can it be said that the wife in this case hath waived her right. The husband refused to receive his wife home; and when it was ascertained that he was resolved she should never return home to him, she set up her claim to maintenance for herself and infant daughter. This was apparently acquiesced in. But some disputes arising, and blows and a duel following between her husband and her counsel and his friend, this unhappy lady became terrified at the evils and bloodshed which might result from the prosecution of her claim; and she *dropped the pursuit at that time. Her feelings and her forbearance prevented the renewal of her claim during her husband's life, lest it should provoke a renewal of these scenes. She subsisted with difficulty, and maintained his daughter on small means derived from her friends, and contracted debts which now straiten her, rather than produce mischief and blood by pursuing her claim in his life time. It would be hard indeed if this forbearance, founded on such motives, should be construed into a waiver or abandonment of her claims. It surely was not intended by her as a waiver, and the circumstances will fully justify the court for not presuming a waiver against the facts of the case.

*203

All presumptions of waiver or satisfaction are on the ground that there has been a culpable omission in the prosecution of the claim. But it would be a perversion of words, and a forgetfulness of all correct feelings, to call such forbearance on the part of this lady a culpable omission. Her conduct has been correct throughout, and there is no shadow of blame on her.

Alimony and dower are distinct rights; where alimony terminated, dower began—and both are recoverable.

The ground of doubt whether a wife who has been obliged to live separate from her husband, without any maintenance, is entitled to recover alimony after his death, has arisen from the misapplication of another principle—to wit: That a wife having a right to the settlement of her estate, this court would compel him to make it. But it is a personal equity, and if she dies, her children cannot compel it. 1 Fonbl. 89. And so though the wife may be entitled to the income of a separate estate, yet if she do not demand the produce in the husband's life time, and he maintains her, an account of such separate estate shall not be carried back beyond the last year—and this is upon an implied waiver. 1 Fonbl. 95.

For the defendant it was argued that the claim to alimony will not survive.

The husband is not liable except for necessaries, and *that only during the marriage and cohabitation. 1 Bla. 442. The case of Corbet and Poelnitz which attempted to extend the liability of the husband for the contracts of the wife has been overruled in 8 Term Rep. Marshall v. Rutkin.

*204

The ecclesiastical court decrees alimony only in cases of divorce, a mensa et thoro. And though from necessity the Court of Equity has assumed the jurisdiction in this country, to prevent a total failure of justice, yet it will not decree alimony except in cases where the ecclesiastical courts, would have granted a divorce a mensa et thoro. This court is still governed by the same principles. The substance of the claim has undergone no change. See 2 Vesey, jr. 191.

All the cases shew that alimony is granted only on the misconduct of the husband and on the correct conduct of the wife. His ill conduct is a tort. It is therefore a personal claim, and dies with the parties. 2 Atk. 97. The decrees for the relief of the wife are always prospective. 2 P. Wms. 82. Hankey v. Cox.

The Court of Equity allows alimony only during the separation, and if the husband shews that she is obstinate, and will not return, though he is willing to receive her, the alimony will be revoked. See 3 Atk. 517, 550. Head and Head. 2 Atk. 96. Watkins v. Watkins. 2 Vern. 752, Williams v. Callow.

This is a claim which cannot survive and be prosecuted after the death of the husband. The claim is founded on the violation of his marital duties; and is ex delicto, not ex contractu. The acquiescence too, has been for many years. It was 23 years from the separation to the death of the husband, and in all that time but one claim was made, and that soon dropped. Then the husband died in 1796, and no claim made till the bill filed in 1800. This is a waiver of the demand; for whatever were the motives, the waiver and the abandonment were complete and decisive. 3 Bro. C. C. 639, Smith v. Lane. 2 Vesey, jr. 87. Ibid. 585, and 3 Atk. 225.

*205

*Besides it would be dangerous to allow such demands after a husbands death. The subject of the differences between husband and wife are of a delicate kind; and the reasons of his conduct are probably locked up in his own breast. To allow such charges and demands to be made after his death, would be to expose his memory to misrepresentation and reproach, without his executors having the means of defense. The demand of the wife is refused on several grounds; and if the husband were living, he might shew that some of those grounds existed.

The widow has dower allowed her after her husbands death. It has been claimed and allowed in this case. Now dower is allowed after the husband's death in lieu of alimony, which he no longer lives to furnish.

The Court took time to advise, and afterwards Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the Court.

The complainants bill states that she married the late A. B. defendant's testator, in London, in May, 1772; that they arrived here in August following:—that in the February ensuing, she was delivered of a daughter. That from the time of her marriage to the birth of her daughter, they lived together as man and wife, though not so happily as could have been wished. That in May, 1773, she went to visit some of her friends at Beaufort, at the express desire of her husband, and was afterwards desirous of returning to him; but that he refused to receive her, and continued so to do till his death in March, 1796.—That some negotiations were set on foot for allowing her a separate maintenance, but a quarrel ensuing they were broken off, and never afterwards renewed. The reasons why nothing further was done are particularly detailed in the bill. Complainant therefore prays a suitable allowance, during the time she lived separate from her husband. To this bill defendant pleaded the limitation act, which upon argument was overruled. A strong doubt arising whether the demand of complainant was not altogether of a personal nature, and by her not making appli*cation during the life of her husband, she had not slept so long on her rights as to lose her title to relief, the court desired to have that point argued and precedents sought for before they would order defendant to answer.

*206

The question has been very fully discussed by counsel on both sides. For the complainant it was contended that the husband was bound to maintain and provide for his wife, as well during his life as after his death. That he was under a moral obligation to do so; that it was a part of the marriage contract, and the court would compel him to it. That this suit was not ex delicto as for a tort; but ex contractu for a breach of that contract; and therefore that a suit for alimony would survive against executors as well as for any other contract; but even admitting it did not generally survive, it ought under the peculiar circumstances of this case. For the defendant it was insisted, that suits for alimony or separate maintenance do not survive. It was admitted that the court may allow separate maintenance during the life of the husband. Nevertheless he was only liable where there was a divorce, a mensa et thoro; and as incidental to a decree for that purpose. That the causes of divorce were purely personal, and cannot be decreed after the death of one of the parties; that complainant forfeited or lost her claim by not pursuing it in the life of her husband; and that where a party with a full knowledge of his rights, sleeps over them, the court will consider it as an abandonment or relinquishment of them. With respect to the power of this court to allow a separate maintenance, where a proper case is made out, that is not to be questioned. It has been exercised and must continue to be exercised, because a wife would be otherwise without redress, there being no other court in this country competent to it.

This question must be decided on general principles and not on the particular circumstances of this case. It is plainly and simply whether a wife who applies for alimony or a separate maintenance ought not to bring suit against her husband in his life time? The very idea of ali*mony or a separate maintenance, admits that the husband is alive, and refuses to perform the contract which the law imposes on him of maintaining and supporting his wife. A suit must therefore be instituted against him personally, charging him with a violation of his contract.

*207

and stating particularly ill usage on his part as a ground for the application for a separate maintennce. He is then called upon by the process of the court, in which the suit is commenced, to answer the charge. Upon his answer and the proof adduced, depends the decree that is to be pronounced. Hence it is evident, that the suit must be brought against him personally, because in the Ecclesiastical Court, there must be a divorce a mensa et thoro, previous to the allowance of alimony, and a sentence of divorce cannot be given in any case where either husband or wife is dead. A decree cannot be made in this court against a defendant where his misconduct is the charge for the foundation of such decree, unless he is brought into court, to answer the charge, except indeed he absconds, in which case, the court will make some provision for the wife, till he returns. That the suit for alimony is for a tort and altogether personal, is further illustrated by its being brought against the husband for ill usage, for depriving the wife of her conjugal rights, such as driving her from bed and board, and refusing to support her. What acts can be more tortious than those? None; not even beating her. Such conduct of the husband, being proved, terminates in a decree in the Ecclesiastical Court, for a divorce a mensa et thoro, and an allowance of alimony; or in this court a separate maintenance, during their separation only; for this court has no right to decree a perpetual separation. A very strong ground for the court not sustaining this suit is, that no precedent has been produced of a similar case: whence it may be very fairly and justly inferred, that no suit of this kind has ever been brought from a thorough conviction that it could not be maintained; for if such a suit had been instituted, some determination on it would certainly have been found in *the books. The singularity of such a case would unquestionably have attracted the attention of all the writers on this subject, and the diligent researches of complainants counsel would undoubtedly have brought it to light.—It was therefore with that view that the court desired to have the question fully discussed. When differences arise between husband and wife, when their mutual resentments must be considered of so serious a nature as to induce a separation, it is reasonable to suppose that she would institute her suit with promptness, and prosecute it with vigor; but if she remains wholly passive during his life, and makes no application for a separate maintenance till several years after his death, the court will consider such conduct as an abandonment or relinquishment of her rights. In almost all cases the law has fixed the period within which suits of various kinds shall be brought, and where the law is silent, the courts reasoning from analogy, have limited the time for prosecuting suits of a similar nature. In cases of tort, the law has fixed twelve months for bringing an action at law. In a case like the present, which is also a tort, if the wife does not commence her suit during her husbands life, the court would not interpose its aid for the best of reasons, because the offender, (if he was one) is no more. He is in his grave; he is incapable of answering to the charge which is made against him. The violation of contract in the case under consideration, is of thirty years standing. Both the parties have lived in the state within a few miles of each other, during the whole of that period, until his death, and no steps taken by complainant to obtain redress for the injury, except at the commencement of these differences; some conversations were then had on the subject, and proposals made, which were broken off; the whole business was then relinquished, and nearly five years after her husband's death this suit was instituted against his executor to be allowed a separate maintenance for upwards of 20 years back: That complainant has not been without a maintenance, although not from her husband, appears from *her own bill; for within two years after their separation, her father died and left 1600*l.* in the hands of trustees, to be applied to her sole use, which it is to be presumed she has uniformly received the profits of; and since her husband's death she has received a very liberal allowance for dower out of his estate. To allow of such stale demands as the present, after so great a length of time has elapsed since the original cause of suit, and so many years after the death of a party, might be attended with the greatest inconvenience and most dangerous consequences. It would be putting it in the power of the living to accuse the dead of the grossest misconduct, and it is more than probable that an executor might be wholly unacquainted with circumstances, and therefore incompetent to repel the charges or make a proper defence; whereas if the husband was alive, it is possible he might be able to assign good and substantial reasons for his conduct, and rebut the accusation by the testimony of witnesses. No one ought to be condemned unheard. Audi alteram partem is the language of reason, of common sense, and of the law: but how can the person accused be now brought into this court to make his defence. Expedit Reipublicæ ut sit finis litium, is a maxim that has prevailed in this court in all times. Laches and neglect are always discountenanced, and a Court of Equity which is never active in giving relief against conscience or public convenience, always refuses its aid to stale demands, where the party has slept upon his rights, and acquiesced for a great length of time. Upon the whole of the case, the court are unanimously of opinion that no precedent being shown wherein the court has given relief in a case similar to the present, they will not make one. That the demand made by complainant for an allowance is altogether of a personal nature; that it did not rise ex contractu, but wholly ex delicto; and therefore does not survive against the executor.

*208

*209

The bill must be dismissed.

---

2 Desaus. *210

*Case XXIV.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.]

THOMAS KARWON, Administrator of Catharine Ashby, v. THOMAS LOWNDES and Wife and Others, FRANCIS and FLORIDE PEYRE, and the GAILLARDS and ASHBYS.

(May, 1803.)

[Descent and Distribution ⟸41.]

An intestate dies, leaving a real and personal estate. His nearest relations were an uncle and aunt, of the half blood, and three first cousins of the whole blood; and he left several more distant relations. The uncle and aunt of the half blood are entitled, under our statute of February, 1791, for abolishing the rights of primogeniture, and for other purposes, to take the whole real and personal estate in exclusion of the first cousins of the whole blood.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Edwards v. Barksdale, 2 Hill, Eq. 420.

For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. § 116; Dec. Dig. ⟸41.]

[This case is also cited in Peyre v. Karwon, 2 Desaus. 420, as to facts.]

Bill of Interpleader.

Catharine Ashby being possessed of a real and personal estate, died in Sept. 1802, intestate, unmarried and without issue, leaving alive many relations, to wit: Mrs. Lowndes and her brother and sister, who were cousins of the whole blood, by the paternal line, to the intestate. The Ashbys and the Gaillards, who were cousins of the half blood, by the maternal line, to the intestate; and Francis Peyre and Floride Peyre, who were uncle and aunt of the half blood, by the maternal line to the intestate.

The claims set up by these various relations to the estate of the intestate, induced the administrator to file a bill of interpleader, calling upon all these relations as defendants to set forth their claims, and to obtain and abide by the decree of the court, on their respective pretensions.

The defendants answered and admitted the relationship in which they severally stood to the intestate, and submitted to the judgment of the court on their claims.

The cause came to a hearing, and it was argued by Mr. Parker and Mr. Desaussure for the first cousins of the whole blood, that none of the relations of the intestate *were entitled to any part of the estate, except themselves and the uncle and aunt of the half blood.

*211

That the cousins of the half blood are not entitled, because the uncle and aunt of the half blood are nearer in degree of kin, according to the mode established by the act of 1791, for ascertaining the degrees of kindred. That as between the cousins of the whole blood, and the uncle and aunt of the half blood, they are equally entitled per capita; for by the 4th, 6th and 7th sections of the act for abolishing the rights of primogeniture and for giving a more equitable distribution of the estates of intestates, a preference is given to the relations of the whole blood, over relations of the half blood, when standing in the same degree, which is substantially removing relations of the half blood one degree; which in this case would put the first cousins of the whole blood and the uncle and aunt of the half blood on the same footing; and they would be equally entitled.

The clauses of the statute of February, 1791, applicable to this case, are the following: The 4th clause gives a preference to brothers and sisters of the whole blood; and provides that the children of a deceased brother or sister shall take among them respectively the share which their respective ancestors would have been entitled to had they survived the intestate.

The 5th section provides, that if there be no issue, nor father or mother, nor brother or sister of the whole blood of the intestate living, the brother or sister of the half blood, and the children of a brother or sister of the whole blood, shall take the estate; the children of every deceased brother or sister of the whole blood taking among them a share equal to the share of a brother or sister of the half blood. But if there be no brother or sister of the half blood, then the children of a deceased brother or sister of the whole blood are to take the estate, without any provision for the children of deceased brothers or sisters of the half blood.

By the ninth section it is provided that in reckoning the *degrees of kindred the computation shall begin with the intestate and be continued up to the common ancestor, and thence down to the person claiming kindred inclusively, each step inclusively being reckoned as one degree.

*212

By the express provisions of the English statutes of distribution of personal estates, no representatives are admitted among collaterals, further than the children of the intestate's brothers and sisters. But in our statute of February, 1791, which regulates the descent of real as well as the distribution of personal estate, and puts them both on the same footing, there is no such provision, restricting representation; and by the law for the descent of real estate, prior to our statute of 1791, representation was allowed ad infinitum, as well among collaterals as among lineal descendants.

A considerable change has been made by our statute respecting the rights of the half blood. By the common law of descents, the half blood could not inherit real estate at all. But by the construction put upon the statute of distributions, the half blood might take personal estate equally with the whole blood. By our statute of February, 1791, the half blood are let in to take real estate by descent, but both with respect to real and personal estate, brothers and sisters of the half blood are postponed one degree—that is, they cannot take at all whilst there is any brother or sister of the whole blood alive. But if none such be alive, then brothers and sisters of the half blood are let in equally with the children of brothers and sisters of the whole blood. And doubtless it was the intention of the law to extend this postponement of the half blood one degree (in the reckoning the degrees of kindred) in all the remoter degrees. If this be correct, then the defendants Mr. Peyre and Miss Peyre being uncle and aunt of the half blood to the intestate, are in the third degree of relationship, and being postponed one degree, they are to be reckoned in the 4th degree. Mrs. Lowndes and her brother and sister are also in the 4th degree; and these are equally entitled to the estate of the intestate. All the *other relations being more remote, cannot take any share.

*213

Mr. Gaillard and Mr. Pringle for the other relations, argued, that the case which has occurred is not provided for specifically by our statute of February, 1791. The last part of the 4th section of the statute does provide that the children of brothers and sisters of the intestate shall take by representation the shares to which their respective ancestors would have been entitled had they survived the intestate. But this representation extends no further. And the priority given by the act to brothers and sisters of the whole blood, is not carried any further. Now the statute of distributions is not repealed. Of course it is abrogated only so far as the provisions of the new act contravene it. The case under consideration does not come within the express provisions of the new law; consequently the old act of distributions applies, and the uncle and aunt of the half blood being one degree nearer of kin, are entitled exclusively. The words of the act are not to be extended by analogy.

In the case of Poaug, the doctrine was recognized that there shall be no representation among collaterals beyond brothers and sisters children.

In the case of Carson and Stuart, it was contended that the act intended to put real and personal estate on the same footing. But the court thought differently. See 4 Burns' Ecclesiastical Law, 355, 6, 357, 8. Also 1 P. Wms. 26, 53, 594. 2 Vern. 124. 2 Ves. 213, 215.

Chancellor MARSHALL afterwards delivered the decree of the court.

This case is not provided for in any of the specially enumerated cases of the act for the abolition of the rights of primogeniture, &c. passed the 19th day of February, 1791, but comes within the provision of the 7th clause of the 1st section of that act. It is in these words: "If the intestate shall have no lineal descendants, father, mother, brother or sister of the whole blood, or their children, or brother or sister of the half blood, or lineal ancestor, then the *widow shall take two thirds of the estate; and the remainder shall descend to the next of kin.

*214

The single question in this case is, who are the next of kin to Catharine Ashby the intestate? Whether Miss Floride Peyre the aunt of the half blood, and Francis Peyre, the uncle of the half blood? Or Mrs. Lowndes, Mrs. Wragg, and Jacob Bond I'on, the first cousins of the whole blood?

In computing the degrees of kindred, the act above quoted directs in the 9th clause of the 1st section, that "in reckoning the degrees of kindred, the computation shall begin with the intestate, and be continued up to the common ancestor, and thence down to the person claiming kindred inclusively, each step being reckoned as one degree." By this mode of computation, Miss Floride Peyre, the aunt, and Francis Peyre, the uncle of the half blood, stand in the third degree.

The children of Mary Ashby, (Mrs. I'On) viz. Mrs. Lowndes, Mrs. Wragg and Jacob B. I'On, stand in the fourth degree. It is evident therefore, that Miss Floride Peyre and Francis Peyre, the aunt and uncle of the half blood of the intestate Catharine Ashby, are the next of kin, as being in the third degree; and that they are entitled equally to the estate of the said Catharine Ashby in exclusion of the others.

Costs to be paid out of the estate.

2 Desaus. 214

Case XXV.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.]

The Administrators of SOMERS, v. JOHN SMYTH, Administrator with the Will Annexed of Samuel Adams, and REBECCA KELLY.

(May, 1803.)

[Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸108.]

Deeds conveying the whole property of the person making them, to a woman with whom he cohabited, without any proof of valuable consideration paid by her, she not having means to make such purchases, will be presumed to be void, as against creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 333, 334; Dec. Dig. ⟸108.]

[Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸278.]

The statute of limitations does not run in such cases.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 801, 802; Dec. Dig. ⟸278.]

*215

*This was a bill filed by creditors for an account and discovery of the estate of Samuel Adams, deceased; and to set aside certain deeds from said Adams to Rebecca Kelly, on the ground of their being voluntary and fraudulent, to the prejudice of creditors.

There were three bills of sale, bearing date the 18th of August, 1794, by which the said Samuel Adams conveyed away nearly all his property to Rebecca Kelly. His will was also executed on the same day. His executor Duffy proved the will, qualified, and included in the inventory all the slaves included in the bills of sale, and most of the other property.

Robert Caldwell proved that he knew Samuel Adams from 1791 to 1794, when he died. He knew several of his slaves. They were included in the bills of sale, but some of them remained in his possession till his death.

Rebecca Kelly cohabited with him. Witness lived on plantation of Adams in 1797. He leased it; at first he applied to R. Kelly, and she referred him to John Smyth. He paid them both in work for the rent. Smyth sold some of the negroes of the estate to Mr. Clarkson. Some were sent off to the Havannah. When Rebecca Kelly lived with Adams, he maintained her.

Mr. Clarkson proved that he bought several negro slaves from Smyth, some of them had belonged to Samuel Adams.

Mr. Sherwood proved that he rented the plantation from Smyth in 1798, and paid him the rent. Smyth afterwards told him to give up the possession to Rebecca Kelly on her application for it.

Mr. Mazyck proved that his father had emancipated Rebecca Kelly, and had given her two slaves, and an annuity of £60. for 10 years. She afterwards lived with Adams. She was not industrious, and was extravagant. She might have made £60. or £70. per annum; but her earnings and savings could not be considerable.

Mr. Squib proved that Rebecca Kelly carried on the business of making mattresses extensively. She some*times sent down 10 or 12 in a week to Charleston for sale. Adams derived more assistance from her than she did from him. Adams told witness he was under great obligations to R. Kelly. He would have gone to pieces without her.

*216

Mr. Lemon proved that Smyth had sold some negroes to Adams. But they were not paid for; and Smyth took them in 1797.

Mr. Denoon proved that he sold the mattresses for Adams for a long time. They did not amount in value during the whole time, to any such sum as £200. or £300.

Mr. Cheves and Mr. Pringle for the complainants argued, that the bills of sale were fraudulent and void—that even if they had been fairer, the complainants were judgment creditors at the date of the bill of sale. It is a strong circumstance of fraud that the deeds convey Adam's whole property. The deeds too were executed in August, on a sick bed, and Adams died in October of the same year. The courts will be suspicious of persons living as R. Kelly did with Adams, and gaining an ascendency over him, and obtaining such deeds at such a time. 1 Fonbl. 272. Her circumstances did not enable her to make such purchases; nor has any consideration been proved to have been paid. Adams kept possession of the property till his death; and his executor Duffy included the property in the inventory; and no claim was made whilst they remained in Duffy's possession.

The evidence contradicts the defendants answers.

Mr. Gaillard for defendants, argued that the real question was, whether there was any fraud in obtaining the deeds. The answer of R. Kelly denies the allegation of fraud. The executor at first inventoried the negroes as part of Adams estate—but afterwards gave them up. The considerations expressed on the face of the deeds are considerable, if not amply sufficient. The encreased value of the property since cannot affect the question. If there be fraud in the transaction, it is true the statute of limitations cannot be used as a defence. But if there be *not fraud, then possession and the statute of limitations will protect the purchaser of the slaves, even against prior judgments. Cowp. 434, 713.

*217

Chancellor JAMES afterwards delivered the decree of the court.

The object of the bill is for an account and discovery, and to set aside deeds from Sam'l. Adams to Mrs. Kelly. Adams made his will on 18th August, 1794, and on same day executed a bill of sale to Rebecca Kelly, of his stock of cattle, furniture, &c. also of eleven negroes, and deeds of lease and release of his lands and lots. He died in 1794, possessed of a considerable real and personal estate.

The bill prays that the bills of sale & deeds may be set aside, as fraudulent, and that Smyth should be decreed to account with complainants as creditors of Samuel Adams. The answer and the evidence are detailed in decree.

The defendant Rebecca Kelly states in her answer, that her freedom was given to her in the early part of her life by her master, Mr. Mazyck; that she lived with him in the capacity of house-keeper afterwards; and received from him £60. per year for her services; and during the time she lived with him, that she purchased two negroes from him.

That she afterwards lived with Samuel Adams, and carried on for him the business of upholsterer for several years. That for the said services rendered to the said Samuel Adams, and for certain monies lent and advanced by her to him, he became indebted to her for the sums mentioned, as the consideration money in the said bills of sale and the said deeds. That the said bills of sale and the said deeds were executed by him to her, about two months before his death, when he was of sound mind, and that she knows he did also make a will. That A. Duffy took forcible possession of the negroes of the said Samuel Adams after his death, as executor; but that he again delivered up the same to her in consequence of her producing the bills of sale aforesaid.

*218

*That she lived on the plantation at the four mile house long before the death of Samuel Adams, and hath always kept possession of the same by herself or tenants. That she never had possession of the lot of land in Charleston, but that the same through some defect of title hath been lost to her. That she does not know what property the said Samuel Adams died possessed of, but understands that besides the property mentioned in the said bills of sale and deeds, he died possessed of many hundreds of acres of land in the upper country; the titles for which were in the hands of a Mr. Geddes in Charleston.

That the said bills of sale and deeds are fair and bona fide.

The defendant John Smyth in his separate answer, admits that he did qualify as administrator on the estate of Samuel Adams as in bill set forth, and gave security to the Ordinary for £100. the same being the full value of all the property of Samuel Adams.

That judgment was renewed against him as administrator upon the debt of complainants, but on what ground he knows not. That he has heard S. Adams say he could not live without the assistance of R. Kelly, and that he was greatly indebted to her for monies and property she had advanced to him. That he never reduced into his possession any of the property in the bills of sale or deeds mentioned, nor did he return the same to the ordinary, because he was convinced that the said bills of sale and deeds were fair and bona fide. Were it not for that belief, that he would have endeavoured to obtain possession of said property, as being the greatest creditor of said S. Adams. That he never had any dealings with R. Kelly on account of the estate of said Samuel Adams, and that he never assisted in sending away any negroes of said estate. That he never was but once in the last seven years on the plantation at the four mile house, and that he never received any of the negroes of said estate, or any part of the proceeds of their labor.

Upon the trial, it was proved on the part of complainants by the testimony of Mr. Caldwell, that the property *contained in the bills of sale and deeds was all the property which he knew Samuel Adams to be possessed of in his lifetime. Mr. Geddes also proves that if the papers in his possession be grants and title deeds for lands in the upper country, that they were always ready to be delivered to the administrator. From the testimony of Mr. Mazyck, it further appears that R. Kelly was not very industrious, was extravagant; and both he and Mr. Denoon agree, that she never could have been possessed of more than £200. or £300. at any one time. It also appears from the evidence of several of the witnesses that S. Adams cohabited with the said R. Kelly, and was very much under her influence; that she did indeed carry on the upholsterers business on his plantation; but that she was chiefly assisted by his negroes. From the bills of sale and deeds, it is further evident that they and the will are all dated on the same day, and that the will directs payment to be made of the debts of testator by a sale of his property, while the bills of sale and deeds dispose of the whole property to R. Kelly. That one of the witnesses (Caldwell) leased the plantation at the four mile house from R. Kelly and John Smyth in 1797, and paid them both in carpenters work. that another witness (Sherewood) leased it from Lemon, Smyth's nephew, as his agent, in 1798, and paid the rent to Smyth.

*219

On the part of the defendant, R. Kelly, it was proved by one witness (Mr. Squib) that Samuel Adams spoke in warm terms of R. Kelly's industry and good conduct. That she carried on the business of making mattresses extensively, and sometimes sent to town 10 or 12 in a week. That she also sent poultry and pigs to Adams on her own account. That Adams derived more assistance from her than she did from him; that he would, in the witnesses words, have gone to pieces without her. The same witness also gave in much more testimony in favor of Kelly, which it is needless to recapitulate, as it is not corroborated by the testimony of any other witness, and is indeed contradicted by

*220

Mr. Denoon, one of defendants own wit*nesses. The evidence of Mr. Lemon for the defendants goes only to exculpate Smyth the administrator from some of the charges in the bill, but proves nothing in favor of R. Kelly. The court said that the complainants had contended:

1st. That the bills of sale and deeds, containing a general conveyance of all S. Adam's property, real and personal, were fraudulent and void.

2d. That the circumstances of the purchaser were entirely inadequate to such a purchase.

3d. That the complainants were judgment creditors of S. Adams, at the time of the date of the bills of sale and deeds, which were voluntary conveyances and void.

4th. That the will of S. Adams, bearing date the same day, and containing clauses repugnant to bills of sale, &c. he must have been noncompos or imposed on.

The defendants contended 1st, that though the consideration was now inadequate, it may have been at the time a full consideration.

2d. That the deeds were dated 18th of Aug. 1794, recorded 27th of Sept. 1794, which was notice to all the world.

3d. That Duffy, the executor of Adams, and the ordinary, had recognized the claim of Mrs. Kelly, and given up the negroes to her.

The court upon full consideration, is in favor of complainants.

1st. These deeds appear to contain all S. Adam's property: all the evidence shews that his whole property was conveyed. Therefore according to the rule quoted from Twyne's case, "quod dolosus versatur in generalibus," these deeds have the signs and marks of fraud. See 3 Rep. page 81.

2d. Upon this ground the preponderance of the evidence shews that the circumstances of Rebecca Kelly were at all times inadequate to the making of such a purchase. This being clearly proved, and no money having been shewn to be paid by her, the court may safely presume that this was *a voluntary gift without sufficient consideration, and therefore void as to creditors.

*221

3d. The complainants were judgment creditors at the very date of the deeds and will. None of the witnesses have been produced to prove the payment of any money. There are violent presumptions of fraud growing out of all the circumstances. No money applied to pay off Adam's debts by himself or his executor.

4th. The court is obliged under the circumstances to believe that S. Adams was either non compos, or that unfair dealings were used towards him to induce him to sign the deeds, &c. The will making dispositions different from the deed is dated the same day. The defendants grounds were not supported by any evidence, or was overpowered by the opposite evidence shewing fraud.

Decreed that the bills of sale and deeds be set aside as voluntary and fraudulent; that the administrator J. Smyth do account before the master for the rent of the plantation at the seven mile house for the years 1797 and 8, (during which he leased it out) and that complainants be permitted to enforce their judgments and executions.

Costs to be paid by defendant Kelly.

---

2 Desaus. 221

Case XXVI.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.]

FRANCIS PEYRE and FLORIDE PEYRE v. THOMAS H. JERVEY.

(October, 1803.)

[Husband and Wife ⊂=10.]

A husband is exclusively entitled to the personal estate of his deceased wife, though not reduced to possession during the coverture.—His right of administration will protect it, notwithstanding the provisions of the act of February, 1791.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Peyre v. Karwon, 2 Desaus. 420; Baskins v. Giles, Rice, Eq. 326.

For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 42; Dec. Dig. ⊂=10.]

The bill for discovery and distribution, sets forth that Magdalene Ashby in bill mentioned, being entitled to one third of the estate real and personal of John Ashby, her deceased husband, who departed this life some time in the year 1793, the said Mag*dalene did make her last will and testament in the year 1801; by which, amongst other things, she gave and bequeathed unto her sister Floride Peyre, and unto her niece Floride Taylor, all her part or proportion of the bonds, debts, &c. that she might be entitled unto, to be equally divided between them, share and share alike, as soon as possible. All the residue of the property, or her proportion of the said undivided estate of her deceased husband, whether in lands, negroes or whatsoever the same might be; and all such other property as she might be possessed of, or entitled unto in any manner whatever, she gave to her daughter Mary Catharine Ashby, to her and the heirs of her body; but in case her said daughter should die, leaving no child, then and in that case, she gave and bequeathed the same unto her niece, the said

*222

Floride Taylor, and to her nephew Thomas Ashby, to be equally divided between them, share and share alike, to them and their heirs for ever: and she appointed executors of her said will. That the said Magdalene Ashby soon after making the said will, died, and some months after her death, to wit: on the 6th May, 1802, Floride Taylor, mentioned in the said will, intermarried with Capt. Thomas Jervey, the defendant. That Mary Catharine Ashby, the daughter of the testatrix, died on the 21st Sept. 1802, an infant unmarried, and without issue.

That soon afterwards, to wit, on the 3d Nov. 1802, the said Floride Jervey died intestate, and without issue, leaving complainants the next of kin. That the estate of the said John Ashby was not divided in the life time of the said Magdaline. That since the death of Mary Catharine Ashby, the said Thomas Jervey, as administrator of his wife, has been put into possession of that part or share of the estate of the said John Ashby, which on the death of Catharine Ashby, without leaving a child or children, was given by the said Magdalene Ashby to the said Floride Jervey, the wife of the said Thomas, including a proportion of the proceeds of a tract of land belonging to the estate of the said John

*223

Ashby, lately sold for the purpose *of making a division between those interested therein.—And complainants insist that they are entitled to a distributive share of the real and personal estate of the said Floride Jervey, as next of kin, she having died intestate, and without issue; the act entitled an act for the abolition of the rights of primogeniture, saying expressly that in all cases of intestacy, the personal estate of the intestate shall be distributed in the same manner as real estates are disposed of by this act.

That with respect to real estates, that part of the said act applicable to this case, is in these words:

On the death of any married woman, the husband shall be entitled to the same share of her real estate, as is herein given to the widow out of the estate of the husband, and the remainder of her real estate shall be distributed among her descendants and relations as is heretofore directed, in case of the intestacy of a married man. Complainants therefore conceive themselves entitled to one third of the estate real and personal of the said Floride Taylor; and further state, that they have applied to the said Thomas Jervey, administrator of his said wife, for one third of the estate real and personal, which she died possessed of, interested in or entitled to, that he has refused and still refuses so to distribute the said estate of his said wife; contending that such distribution is not agreeable to law. Complainants pray that a full discovery may be made by the said Thomas Jervey of the assets of the aforesaid Floride, wife of the said Thomas; and that after payment of debts, the surplus of her estate may be divided according to law, and complainants put in possession of their proportion or share thereof, and such other relief as the nature of their case may admit.

The answer of Thomas Jervey the defendant, admits that Magdalene Ashby, in bill mentioned, did depart this life at the time therein mentioned, and that she was entitled to one third of her deceased husband's estate as stated.

*224

*That the said estate was not divided in her life time, and that she made and executed her last will and testament as is set forth. Defendant admits his marriage with Floride Taylor, and that she died at the time stated in said bill; and that Mary Catharine Ashby, in bill mentioned, died an infant and unmarried, and without issue: and also that he administered on the estate of his wife, and received sums of money due thereto, including a proportion of the proceeds of lands sold lately, and other property left by Magdalene Ashby to his said wife Floride Jervey.

Admits that the said Francis and Floride, the complainants, are the next of kin of the said Floride Jervey, his deceased wife, but denies that they are entitled to one third of the estate real and personal, which she died seized, possessed of, or entitled to. Submits to the court that complainants are not entitled to any part or share of the personal property bequeathed to his deceased wife by Mrs. Ashby, or which she otherwise possessed at the time of her death, considering the said legacy as vested in his said wife during her life time, and that as soon as it vested, in virtue of his marital rights, he became entitled thereto, and therefore it cannot be considered as the estate of his wife, or distributable by the act entitled an act to abolish the rights of primogeniture, although there is a clause in the said act saying, that in all cases of intestacy, the personal estate of the intestate shall be distributed in the same manner as real estates are disposed of by the said act; yet defendant apprehends that the said clause does not, and was not intended to relate to married women who are not capable of making wills, since such construction would make it operate in the nature of a marriage settlement in every case where the wife had property at the time of her marriage, or acquired it afterwards.

If the court should be of opinion that the complainants are entitled to any of the proceeds of the tract of land belonging to the estate of John Ashby, deceased, sold for the purpose of a division as is set forth, or to any part or share of sums he may receive due on the bonds left by the *said John Ashby, and not yet paid, although they were payable long before the death of the said Magdalene Ashby, the testatrix, or to any proportion of the negroes left to his said wife by the said Magdalene Ashby, defendant will immediately come to a fair and full account with them as administrator aforesaid, and abide any decree this honorable court may think fit to make in the premises.

*225

The case was heard, and one of the chancellors afterwards delivered the decree of the court.

The husband is by law entitled to the personal estate of his wife on their marriage, or which may come to her afterwards, unless secured to her by settlement or otherwise, although not reduced into actual possession; for there might be time spent, and delays occasioned before he could recover her personal estate, especially if it consisted in choses in action, and such delay ought not to turn to his prejudice.

Indeed the statute of frauds presuming on the circumstance of his not having reduced any part of the personal estate into possession, gives to him the right of administration, and provides that no part of it shall be distributable amongst her relations after her death, by declaring that he shall recover and enjoy the same: The act for the abolition of the rights of primogeniture, has not intrenched in any manner on the rights of the husband respecting his title to his wife's personal estate; but has placed his claim to her real estate on the same footing as it places the wife in relation to the husband's estate, if he was to die intestate in her life time.

In this case the legacies to defendant's wife were vested: the first of them before marriage, and the second after.—On the death of Mrs. C. Ashby, under age, and without issue, of course they belong to her husband, and are not liable to distribution. He must however account for what money he has received, or may receive, on account of lands that were sold, for the purpose of making a division *of Mrs. Ashby's estate between him and her nephew T. Ashby.

*226

It is therefore ordered and decreed that he account for the money so received by him; one third part whereof is to be paid by him to complainants, according to their respective rights thereto.

Costs to be paid out of the estate.

Mr. Croft for complainants.
Mr. Gaillard for defendant.

This subject has since come more fully into discussion, and the court of appeals has decided repeatedly, that the personal estate of the wife, not actually reduced to possession during the coverture, does not belong exclusively to the husband, but is distributable under our statute of Feb'ry. 1791. Vide 3d vol. of Reports in Chancery, p. 135, 147, 8. 155 to 164. See also 12 Ves. 497.

2 Desaus. 226

Case XXVII.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.]

PIERCE BUTLER v. PAUL HAMILTON, Comptroller General.

(June, 1804.)

[Principal and Surety ⊂⊃89.]

A security to certain bonds is not released from his liability, merely on the creditors not urging the demand. There must be an express extension of credit to the principal. If one of the bonds has been pursued diligently, and an execution has been returned nulla bona, there is less necessity to sue the others.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Rutledge v. Greenwood, 2 Desaus. 405.

For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. § 139; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃89.]

[Principal and Surety ⊂⊃123.]

[Cited in Rutledge v. Greenwood, 2 Desaus, 415, to the point that it is incumbent on the security, before he can expect relief, to apply to the obligee and require him to sue the principal.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. §§ 304–311; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃123.]

The bill was filed to obtain relief against the liability of the complainant, on three bonds, executed by him, together with Daniel Bourdeaux and as his security to the commissioners of the treasury.

The bill states, that on the 5th day of ——— 1787, complainant entered into three bonds as surety to Daniel Bourdeaux, now deceased, payable to P. Bocquet and J. Mitchell, the treasurers and their successors in office. Each bond conditioned for the sum of £781 11s. 8d. with interest from the date. That the said three bonds were payable in three annual instalments, to wit: on the 12th

*227

March 1788, 1789 *and 1790. That the said bonds were not signed by Joseph Atkinson, as they were to have been, as will appear by reference to exhibit A. and insists that it was incumbent on Mr. Boquet and Mr. Mitchell to have procured the same, as the name of Mr. Atkinson was inserted in said bonds, and it was intended and meant at that time that the signature of Mr. Atkinson should have been to the said bonds.

Bill states that judgment was obtained on the first bond against said Bordeaux, and your orator, in the year 1789. That no proceedings were ever had on said judgment or on the other bonds against said Bordeaux, or your orator. That your orator conceived that all the said three bonds were paid by the above mentioned D. Bordeaux, the principal, until Mr. Hamilton the comptroller applied to your orator for payment of them.

The bill further states, that after the said bonds were due and payable, your orator applied to know if they were paid at the treasury by Mr. Bordeaux. That he was informed that on search the said three bonds could not be found, and that they must have been paid; and that from the nature of the debt, he conceived that due diligence would be used; and that if your orator had known that the said bonds had not been paid, he could have had an indemnity from Mr. Bordeaux. That the application to the treasury was made expressly to see if the bonds were paid, he then having in his hands, bonds and other assurances of Mr. Bordeaux, as will appear by exhibit B. That the said bonds and assurances of Mr. Bordeaux were well secured by a mortgage of real property, and were given up to Mr. Bordeaux under the idea that his bonds to the treasury were paid. That under all the circumstances, the lapse of time, the gross laches in the officers of the state, and the not inserting the name of Mr. Atkinson, as was originally meant and intended, that he should be a party to the said three bonds, it would now be unreasonable to compel your orator to pay the said three bonds.

The bill further states, that complainant holds by as*signment certain lands of Mr. Bordeaux, as security against any securityship he might have entered into for Mr. Bordeaux; and that the proceeds of these lands when recovered, he is willing to pay on account of those bonds preferably to indemnifying himself. Bill prays that complainants name may be struck out of said bonds, and that he may be fully relieved in the premises, &c.

*228

The answer of the defendant admitted the execution of the bonds, but stated the ignorance of the comptroller-general of the other facts charged by the complainant.

The cause came to a hearing, and Mr. Gaillard and Mr. Parker argued for the complainant. That it was manifestly intended that Mr. Atkinson should have been joined in the bonds, his name being inserted as a co-obligor; yet he never executed them; that the state treasurers were bound to have procured the execution by him, and complainant would not have signed them unless he had understood that Atkinson was to have signed also.—1 Powel, 316, 395. 2 Pow. 196, Loft's Rep. 113. That the complainant called at the treasury, and was told his bonds were paid; and he in consequence gave up a counter security which he had received from Bordeaux, the principal. That the treasurers were in the habit of giving indulgence on bonds due to the state, as was proved by Col. Moultrie, the former attorney-general. That in fact the principal had not been pressed for ten years, which was an indulgence that the creditor had no right to give the debtor at the risk of the security. 2 Bro. C. C. 579. 2 Vesey, jun. 540. 4 Vesey, jun. 824. 3 Atk. 80. That the treasurers were bound to have collected the debts summarily.

That the letter of complainant acknowledging his liability, was written when not advised of his rights, and ought not to bind him. That the confirmation of an obligation not existing, is inoperative. 3 P. Wms. 306. 1 Fonb. 115. 1 T. Rep. 112, 285.

That the case of Nesbit and Smith, in 2

*229

Bro. C. C. has *settled the law, and shews that this court will give relief to the security, where the creditor extends the time of payment to the principal.

On behalf of the state, Mr. Pringle, the attorney-general, argued that with regard to one of the bonds there could be no doubt, for it was sued when due, and judgment obtained in 1789, and due diligence used to recover the money. That it would have been useless to pursue the principal on the other bonds, as he was insolvent, and nulla bona returned on the execution on the first bond.

That the leaving out Atkinson was not a misrepresentation to affect the complainant. To obtain additional security, was merely intended to strengthen the security of the state.

That any application should have been made to the attorney general, in whose hands the papers were, and not to the treasurers. That the cases in which the Court of Equity has given relief to securities are unlike this; for they are cases where the creditor varied the contract, or gave further time expressly, and these are not applicable to this case, for there was no express extension of credit.

If complainant had wished the principal pressed for the debt, he should have required it to be done. The letter of complainant was written deliberately, and bound him.

After the hearing, Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court.

This is a case of the first impression, and of considerable magnitude, as it relates to the monied interest of this country. It has never before been fully discussed, therefore the court took time to deliberate on it. It has been heretofore a generally received opinion, that the principal and security in a bond, were at all times equally liable for the payment of the debt, as long as the bond existed; and under that impression, payment has never till lately been resisted by the security, when called upon. Some modern adjudications in the Court of Chancery in England, have however shaken former opinions; and it is now set*tled, that the security is not liable to the extent it was believed; and that a Court of Equity under peculiar circumstances would give relief, and has actually given it in several cases. It was never doubted, that a security had a right to call upon the obligee to sue the principal and obtain payment of the debt from him, and if he refused to do so, by an application to this court, the obligee would be compelled to bring suit for that purpose. The grounds for relief in equity, in the case of sureties, are various. That the obligee has not used due diligence to recover his debt from the principal in the first instance, and has refused or neglected to comply with the sureties request, to use that diligence: Also, that the creditor has extended the credit longer than the parties contracted for, against the sureties consent. The second ground is the strongest; it is on that, and that only, that the court has uniformly determined in favor of the surety. All the cases are bottomed on that principle, that the surety is only responsible for a limited time; and if the obligee will extend the credit to a longer period, against the will of the surety, he shall be discharged; for it is both unreasonable and inequitable, that a man should always have such a cloud hanging over him. No one could say what estate he had left for his family, if he was to be liable beyond the time he contracted for. His estate might continue to be so, in the hands of his heirs or legatees to the most distant period. The plain simple question then is, whether the complainant, from the peculiar circumstances of this case, is entitled to relief, on the principles of the adjudged cases? With respect to the first bond, there is not the smallest ground whatever for relief; because it was put in suit, and judgment and execution obtained against him, and Bordeaux, the principal, as soon as it could possibly be done. What availed the due diligence? Was any part of the debt received in consequence of it, from Bordeaux? Not a penny. Was he in a situation to pay? We presume he was not. For what purpose then sue the other bonds? Did the complainant ever apply to the treasurers *to do it? It does not appear that he ever did; and for the best of reasons, because it would not have advanced his interest, and would have been attended with additional expence. When he made the application to the treasurers, to know if the bonds were taken up, is not stated, nor is it a material circumstance, because he could have got the information from Bordeaux himself; and from the complainants own confession, as stated in his bill, he had ample means in his own possession, to secure himself completely. He knew judgment had been obtained against him on one bond. It was therefore his interest to see that that was satisfied in the first instance; and also the other bonds afterwards, and before he parted with the funds he was possessed of. If he gave up some of them to Bordeaux without being ascertained whether the bonds in question were or were not taken up, and has made a bad bargain in the disposition of the rest, he has only himself to blame. The negligence of the public officers ought not to be used as a shield, to protect him against his own supineness. Upon the whole, the court are unanimously of opinion, that the complainant is not entitled to relief on the ground of negligence, with regard to the first bond, because due but unavailing diligence was used to recover the money on that. Nor is he entitled to relief on the other bonds, upon the ground of extending the credit beyond the time contracted for, because he has not made it appear that such credit was given either expressly or impliedly against his consent or inclination. This case therefore is not similarly circumstanced, nor does it come within the reason or equity of the lately adjudged cases. And lastly, because from complainants own confession, it appears he was fully indemnified for his suretyship by the funds deposited with him, for that purpose, if he had made due and proper application of them.

*230

*231

Bill must be dismissed with costs.

---

2 Desaus. *232

*Case XXVIII.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge and Marshall.]

JOHN LLOYD, Jun., and Wife, v. the Executrix of DANIEL CANNON and Others.

(January, 1804.)

[Executors and Administrators ⇨488.]

A person possessing himself of the estate of a female orphan relation during the war, when there was no American government or civil authority to grant letters of administration, will not be considered as a trespasser, or executor de son tort, but as a trustee acting for the best: and will be allowed commissions on his accounts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 2072; Dec. Dig. ⇨488.]

This was a bill filed by the complainant John Lloyd, for an account and settlement of his wife's estate. It involved many matters of fact, but no point necessary to report but one.

Mr. Cannon, the connection of Mrs. Lloyd, on the death of her father, took charge of her person and property, and took out such authority as was then to be obtained from the British board of police, which was the only semblance of civil authority in Charleston, a garrison town held by the enemy. After the restoration of the American government, Mr. Cannon did not deem it material, or was not advised that it was proper to take out regular letters of administration; but he proceeded to act upon and manage the affairs of his young relation who lived in his family till her marriage with Mr. Lloyd. Mr. Lloyd afterwards bro't suit for an account and settlement of his wife's estate, which some complicated circumstances prevented the parties settling without the aid of the court.

A question was made whether a person situated as Mr. Cannon was, could be allowed commissions on his pecuniary transactions. On that point the court said that Mr. Cannon ought not to be considered as a trespasser or executor in his own wrong. He was rather to be commended then censured for getting possession of the estate as he did; for there was no other way of securing it but by application to the ruling powers.

But he should afterwards have applied to the Court of *Ordinary for letters of administration. Yet as the court cannot consider him in the light of a wrong doer, but of a trustee, he was justly and equitably entitled to his commissions. The report of the commissioner on that point was therefore confirmed.

*233

Bailey for complainant.
Desaussure and Ward for defendant.

---

2 Desaus. 233

Case XXIX.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.]

JOHN RAMSAY and Maria, his Wife, v. WILLIAM ALLEN DEAS, Executor of John Deas, Jun.

(June, 1804.)

[Descent and Distribution ⇐6.]

The act abolishing the rights of primogeniture, having a precise day fixed by law for the commencement of its operation, must operate on all cases coming within its scope, on that day.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. § 30; Dec. Dig. ⇐6.]

[Adverse Possession ⇐61.]

An executor entering on lands of the estate of his testator, and occupying them, is to be considered, as holding them in trust for the heirs or devisees, unless he proves that he held adversely with notice to the heirs or devisees; in which case, the proof lies on him to establish the claim at law, on an issue directed.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Carr v. Green, 2 McCord, 82.

For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 316; Dec. Dig. ⇐61.]

[This case is also cited in Fowke v. Woodward, Speers, Eq. 246, on the doctrine of notice.]

John Deas, jun. died on the 20th October, 1790, possessed of a considerable real and personal estate, leaving alive his wife Maria Deas, and an infant son, John Seaman Deas, and his wife pregnant of a child, who was born soon after, and proved to be a son. A little before his death, to wit, on the 20th October, 1790, he executed his last will and testament, which he left in full force, wherein and whereby he devised, (amongst other things) all his real and personal estate, not otherwise disposed of, to his son John Seaman Deas, and such child as might be born after his decease; if a son, to be equally divided between them, share and share alike, as tenants in common, and their heirs. But should such child prove to be a daughter, in that case he devised and bequeathed one third of his estate to such child and her heirs. and the remaining two thirds to the said

*234

John S. Deas. He bequeathed his *house servants, furniture, &c., to his wife for life, with the remainder to his son J. S. Deas. He desires the plantation called Thorowgood, which he had contracted to purchase, should be actually purchased; and he gives a life estate in it to his mother, and the use of it after her death, to his wife, during the minority of the children. He also devised as follows: That if he, the testator, should die without male issue, or if said John S. Deas, or such other male issue should die under the age of 21 years, he gave and devised the whole of his real estate to such posthumous daughter, her heirs and assigns; and in like manner, he gave and bequeathed to her a moiety of his personal estate; the other moiety of his personal estate, he in such case, gave and bequeathed to his wife forever.—And on said J. S. Deas coming of age, he directed a house to be built on Mount Holly, for the accommodation of his wife. And if he should die without male issue, or should such after born child prove a daughter, in that case, he gave and devised Thorowgood and Mount Holly estates to his brother W. A. Deas, his heirs and assigns.

And he appointed his wife, Mr. Archibald Brown, and his eldest brother (Mr. W. A. Deas) executors of his will. They all three qualified as executors on the will.

That on the 23d October, 1790, the widow was delivered of a child, who proved to be a son. The eldest son John Seaman Deas, died in November, 1790, an infant, unmarried and intestate; and some time in the year 1792, the posthumous child died, an infant, unmarried and intestate.

After the death of the testator, Mr. A. Brown and the said W. A. Deas possessed themselves of the real estate, and received the rents and profits thereof; and after the death of the posthumous son, the widow and the two executors sold all the personal estate, (except what was specifically bequeathed to Mrs. Deas for life) and part of the real estate of testator, and the two executors received the money and specialties.

*235

*Mr. Brown, the executor, died in the year 1797, and the said Wm. A. Deas possessed himself of the real estate unsold, and received the rents and profits, and possessed himself of all the monies and specialties.

Mrs. Deas afterwards intermarried with Dr. John Ramsay.

Upon this state of facts, Dr. John Ramsay and wife filed their bill of complaint, claiming the whole real and personal estate devised by the said John Deas to his two sons, both of whom Mrs. Deas survived, and requiring an account from Mr. W. A. Deas. The complainants insisted that by the operation of the statute of Feb. 1791, abolishing the rights of primogeniture, and for other purposes, the whole estate vested in her, on the death of her two sons, the devisees of their father Mr. John Deas.

The answer of Mr. W. A. Deas admitted all the facts charged, but denied the conclusions drawn from them by the complainants. He denied the complainants right to the estate, and insisted that ever since the death of his nephew, the posthumous child of testator, he had been in the peaceable possession in his own right of all such parts of the real estate of said John Deas, as was not sold, and submits to the court whether the residue of the specialties arising from the sale of the lands, made by the executors, should not, (after payment of debts) be considered as real estate. And that if the complainants ever had any right or title to any of the real estate of said John Deas, (which however, he denies,) he contended they were barred thereof; and he prays the benefit of the statute of limitations.

At the hearing, it was insisted for the complainants, that on the death of John Seaman Deas, the eldest son of the testator, in November, 1790, the estate he was entitled to went to his brother, the posthumous son, either by the devises in the will, or by descent, according to the common law; the statute altering the law, not then having been enacted. And that on the death of the posthumous son, an infant unmarried and intestate, in July, 1792, af*ter the passage of the act abolishing the rights of primogeniture, and of the time fixed for the commencement of its operation, (1st May, 1791) his mother, the complainant Maria, became entitled by the provisions of that statute to the whole estate. That the devise to W. A. Deas, was upon contingencies which had not occurred; for the testator did not die without issue male, his son John S. Deas being living at his death: and the child with which his wife was pregnant, did not prove to be a daughter, but a son. And that the executor W. A. Deas, having entered on the real estate, and possessed himself of the personal, as executor, he could not set up his possession after the death of the posthumous child (in 1792) as an adverse possession, so as to entitle himself to the benefit of the statute of limitations. That executors do in this country constantly enter upon the lands of the estates of their testators, ex necessitate, from the blended nature of the real and personal estate; lands, which are real, with negroes, which are personal, placed on them for cultivation; and this entry and occupation must be considered, not as a trespass or adverse, but confidential, and in trust for the heirs.

*236

For the defendant, it was insisted that upon the true construction and intention of the will, if the two children of the testator died under 21 years of age, the defendant was to take the real estates of Thorowgood and Mount Holly. But that if the defendant did not take under the devise, he was entitled as heir at law to the posthumous child. That the law abolishing the rights of primogeniture did not operate upon cases of this kind, where the wills of testators were executed prior to the passage of the law; and upon failure of the provisions of the will, a descent took place, and the estate should rightfully go according to the ancient law.

That on the death of the posthumous son, in July or August, 1792, the defendant considered the estates as his own, and treated them as such; occupying them in his own right, renting them out, receiving and appropriating *the profits to his own use, until the filing of the complainants bill in Sept. 1801.

*237

That however his original entry on the land might be, on account of the children, yet after their death he claimed it as his own, and held adversely to all other persons; and his acts manifested this to the world, and particularly to the widow, and those acquainted with these transactions. This entitled him to the benefit of the statute of limitations.

The court took time to deliberate, and Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court.

Upon a fair construction of the will of J. Deas, nothing can be more clear and manifest than that the testator never intended his wife should possess any part of his real estate, except a life estate in Mount Holly, on which he directed a house to be built for her accommodation on a certain contingency. It is also as clear that had not the law for abolishing the right of primogeniture interfered, the defendant, upon the death of testator's children, during minority, would have been entitled to his real estate. The act abolishing the right of primogeniture, passed since the testators death, and also the amendatory act, have made a total alteration in the law, both as to real and personal estates, by making the father or mother of an intestate child capable of taking the real estate, particularly in exclusion of those who were formerly entitled to it. We wished to have restricted the operation of the law to such wills as had been made after it passed, because it was impossible for persons who had made wills previous thereto, to guard against the inconveniences of such alterations as might be made in the general law, on the subject, and to have excluded its operation in cases of intestate infants who are by law incapable of disposing of their estates; but the time for the commencement of the operation of the law being fixed to a day, the court have no discretion; and however hard, we may think the defendants case to be, such is the law; by it must our decisions be governed. In the sixth clause of the will, testator says, if I should *die without male issue, or should such after born child prove a daughter, in that case I give, devise, &c. Thorogood and Mount Holly estates unto my brother, W. A. Deas, his heirs, &c. Neither of these contingencies happened, for he did not die without male issue, which according to legal construction must be confined to a dying without leaving male issue at his death; and the posthumous child did not prove to be a daughter. The consequence then is clear that the devise to defendant could not take effect, and the mother under the law before mentioned (as it then stood) became entitled to the whole estate devised to her children who died infants and intestate: No person being designated by the amendatory law to take the part which is therein directed to go to the brothers and sisters.

*238

In opposition to complainant's demand respecting the lands, defendant has pleaded the limitation act in bar thereof. If he had proved an adverse possession in Mount Holly, the court would have directed in issue for defendant to establish his title at law by the verdict of a jury; but as it is evident that the defendant being an executor, got possession of the estate in that character, the court cannot view him in any other light than as a trustee for the devisees, which circumstance alone would give this court a jurisdiction in the case of claims to land, for otherwise the question being merely as to the validity of a title by possession, it is properly determinable in a court of law. Considering defendant therefore as a trustee, in which case the limitation act will not avail him, his plea must be overruled. Defendant must therefore account for the estate of his testator before the master, namely, the rents and profits of Mount Holly, the bonds which were taken for lands sold, and also the personal estate. Also that he deliver up to complainant all the deeds, evidences and writings relative to Mount Holly tract.

Afterwards in October, 1804, a motion was made for a bill of review, before Chancellors

*239

RUTLEDGE and MAR*SHALL—which was argued, and the court finally directed an issue at law, wherein W. A. Deas should be plaintiff, and Dr. John Ramsay and his wife, defendants, to ascertain whether the plaintiff has had quiet, peaceable, and uninterrupted possession of the Mount Holly lands, or any, and which part thereof, for five years before the filing of the complainant's bill, with notice to the said complainants, (defendants in the issue directed at law) of such possession.

On the trial of this issue at law, the plaintiff in the issue, W. A. Deas, went into proof of his adverse possession of the Mount Holly lands, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, establishing his title; which verdict was afterwards supported by the court—(ex relatione.)

Messrs. Parker, Gaillard, Pringle, for complainants.

Messrs. D. Deas, Ward, Smith, for defendant.

---

2 Desaus. 239

Case XXX.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.]

M'CAULY and Others, Executors of Edgar Wells, v. M'FARLANE and PLAYER, and Their Assignees.

(June, 1804.)

[Assignments for Benefit of Creditors ⟸310.]

A copartner taking money out of the funds of the copartnership, and carrying it into a new concern or trading house, and that becoming bankrupt, the fund cannot be followed specifically, so as to give the former copartnership a priority over the other creditors of the bankrupt house.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Mason's Ex'rs v. Mason's Ex'rs, 3 Desaus. 122; Woddrop v. Ward, Id., 209.

For other cases, see Assignments for Benefit of Creditors, Cent. Dig. § 908; Dec. Dig. ⟸ 310.]

This was a bill filed to recover certain sums of money from the defendants which M'Farlane, when a copartner in the house of M'Farlane & Wells, but trading under the firm of Alexander M'Farlane, had taken out of the funds of that concern, and carried with him into a new concern in trade, formed by him with Mr. Player, under the firm of M'Farlane & Player. The latter had since become bankrupt, and had assigned all their estate and effects to assignees, who are made defendants. The complainants claim a priority of payment out of the bankrupt *estate, which claim was resisted by the defendants.

*240

At the hearing the evidence was as follows: That when M'Farlane entered into copartnership with Wells, the former was active and industrious, but had no funds. The latter had funds. By the articles of copartnership, the business of the concern was to be confined to shop keeping. It was a prosperous concern and made money.

It was acknowledged by Mr. Player that some of the copartnership funds of A. M'Farlane and E. Wells, were brought by M'Farlane, into the stock of the new concern of M'Farlane and Player. But it was in money, not in goods. Certain sums were ascertained also by evidence.

It was contended by Mr. Bailey, for the complainant, that the funds taken by M'Farlane out of those of M'Farlane and Wells, and carried into those of M'F. & Player, could be pursued and made liable specifically. That the new concern held as a trustee for Wells, and are accountable even for the profits made from that fund. He cited 1 Ves. 240, 2. 2 Cowp. 445. Coopers Bank Law, p. 129.

It was argued for the defendants by Mr. Pringle, that admit it to be proved that M'F. had carried the funds of M'F. & Wells into the house of M'F. & Player, it was not stock in trade, which could be specified and traced, but money which has no ear mark. That stock must be capable of specification. That a lien cannot attach but on specific goods of the first stock. 1 Ves. jun. 166. That even if goods be taken out of the company stock by one of the partners, his separate estate only is liable. 3 Ves. jun. 240.

There is no evidence that an atom of stock was carried into the new concern by M'F.

Chancellor MARSHALL delivered the decree of the court.

The object of the bill in this case is, that complainants should be permitted to follow certain funds which were taken by Alexander M'F. from the copartnership of *M'Farlane & Wells, trading under the firm of Alexander M'F. and carried by him into a partnership, subsequently entered into, of M'F. & Player, and since that, transferred by their bankruptcy under the law, to their assignees.

*241

It has been contended for the complainants, that they, as the representatives of E. Wells, the copartner of A. M'F. have a right to follow these funds so taken; that they have a lien on them, and can claim them in the hands of the assignees, preferably to their other creditors. It has been also contended, that the taking of these funds by M'F. (being an act done as a partner) was to all purposes a trust which attached to them, throughout their whole subsequent progress, and protected them from the effect of M'F. & P's. bankruptcy. The only evidence which clearly and distinctly proved the taking or appropriation of any of the funds of M'Farlane and Wells, by Alexander M'F. and carried into the copartnership of M'F. & P. related to three sums, viz: one of £693. 4s. 10d. proved by the answer of Player, one of the defendants, and the books of Alexander M'F. to have been brought by Alexander M'F. into the partnership of M'F. & P. also the sum of £482 received by one Peitring, from J. Tunno of London, in consequence of a letter of credit from Alexander M'F. (M'F. & Wells,) on J. Tunno, which sum he received, and afterwards paid the amount to M'F. & P. who never remitted the same to J. Tunno, but appropriated it to their own use, leaving the estate of the copartner Wells, answerable to Tunno. The last sum is that of £186 received by M'F. & P. of Carpenter and Smith, of Camden. This debt was due to the partnership of Alexander M'F. (and Wells,) but was appropriated by M'F. & P. to their own use. The single question then is, have complainants under the circumstances of this case, the right contended for, or must they, as is insisted on by defendants, come in as other creditors for a dividend of the estate of M'F. & P. It was proved at the hearing of this case, that what was taken from the partnership of M'F. & W. & carried by him into that of M'F. & Player, was in money.

*242

*This has no ear mark, by which it can be traced or designated. No lien can specifically attach upon it. It is not tangible as goods or the like. It has not been proved, that M'F. ever took the copartnership goods of M'F. & Wells, and carried them into the stock of M'F. & P. The sums appropriated by M'F. were in money, ready cash, which it is impossible to identify in the funds of M'F. & P. M'F. & P. have become bankrupts, and their estate has passed into the hands of assignees, and as the case stands, we cannot say that complainants have a higher equity than their other creditors. They can only come in on the footing of general creditors of M'F. & Player.

Bailey and Desaussure and Ford for complainant.

Pringle for defendant.

---

2 Desaus. 242

Case XXXI.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.]

JOHN IZARD WRIGHT, Administrator of Catharine Wright, v. CAROLINE M. WRIGHT and JOHN SIMMONS, Executrix and Executor of James Alexander Wright, Deceased.

(June, 1804.)

[Contracts ⇐247; Executors and Administrators ⇐460.]

Administrator and heir may compel his co-administrator and co-heir to account; and the court will not on slight grounds presume that settlements have been made; or that parties have abandoned their rights. Some partial settlements not conclusive, that all transactions have been settled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 1139; Dec. Dig. ⇐247; Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1983; Dec. Dig. ⇐460.]

[Husband and Wife ⇐8.]

[A husband, being banished, is civiliter mortuus; and such rights as he would have been entitled to on the death of his wife are extinct.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. ⟸8.]

John Izard Wright, as one of the administrators of his mother, the late Mrs. Catharine Wright, filed this bill against Mrs. Caroline M. Wright and John Simmons, executrix and executor of James Alexander Wright, deceased, for an account of his mother's estate, sometime in the hands of James Alexander Wright, as co-administrator.

The defendants denied that they were under any obligation to account, for the following reasons, viz.

1st. That Alexander Wright the father of complainant, and of defendant's testator, was entitled to a life estate in *the property, (having survived his wife) by virtue of a marriage settlement; and that James A. Wright had settled the account of his administration previous to the 28th August, 1796, with his father.

*243

2d. That when a division of their mother's estate was made in May, 1797, complainant gave two bonds to their testator, for a sum of money, being the difference between the value of the property allotted to him, and that to his brother, and did not then make the claim now insisted on.

3d. That when their testator in the year 1800, contracted with complainant for his share of their father's estate in Jamaica, the account now demanded was left entirely out of view, and therefore must have been settled.

The cause came to a hearing, and afterwards Chancellor RUTLEDGE pronounced the following decree of the court:

Complainants bill is brought as one of the administrators of the late Mrs. Wright, against defendants, executors of James A. Wright, who was the other administrator on the said estate, for an account of his administration, and to restrain defendants from compelling payment of a sum of money received by him from their testator, until the accounts before mentioned are liquidated. Defendants by their answer oppose an investigation and settlement of the account on three grounds. 1st. That Alexander Wright, the father of complainant, and of defendant's testator, was entitled to a life estate in the property, (having survived his wife,) in virtue of a marriage settlement, and that he never relinquished his right thereto; and to shew that he did not, they relied on a paper which they gave in evidence, dated 28th August, 1796, entitled regulations made by Alexander Wright with J. A. W. and J. J. W. drawn by the father, and signed by complainant and his brother; inferring from thence, that James A. Wright must have settled the account of his administration previous thereto with his father. Another ground set up is, that when a division of their mother's estate was made in May, 1797, complainant gave two bonds to their testator for a sum of *money, being the difference between the value of the property allotted to him, and that to his brother, and did not then make the claim now insisted on. A third ground was, that when their testator, in the year 1800, contracted with complainant for his share of their father's estate, in Jamaica, the account now demanded was left entirely out of view, whence they infer that all accounts between the parties were mutually relinquished.

*244

Two questions were agitated in this case, which occupied a great deal of the time of the court unnecessarily.—1st, with respect to the light in which a woman is to be considered, whose husband is banished, and estate confiscated; and 2d, as to the husband's right to claim a life estate in property settled on marriage, he having survived his wife, but is still in banishment. Both these points are extremely clear: the first, that she is considered as a feme sole, in every point of view; may contract debts, and acquire property, which she may again dispose of by deed or will. 2d, that the husband being banished, is considered as civiliter mortuus, and such rights as would have survived to him on the death of his wife, are extinct and gone with him; and the estate must consequently go to those to whom it is limited over. The case is reduced to these plain simple questions—whether an administrator and co-heir has a right to call his co-administrator and co-heir to an account for his administration of the estate they are respectively entitled to? And whether complainant has done any thing to testify his relinquishment of that right? The first question cannot be controverted, that an administrator and co-heir may compel his co-administrator and co-heir to account. The second question then only remains to be considered, whether complainant has done any thing to shew a relinquishment of his right? Upon this question, the paper entitled regulations, &c. is strongly relied on by defendant. But upon a careful perusal of that paper, it does not appear that a settlement of accounts relative to the estate in question, previous to that period, was at all contemplated:

*245

nothing is said on the subject, *and an arrangement or mode of conducting the affairs of the estate in future, of a temporary nature, and settled by the father, is the sole object of those regulations; which complainant and his brother subscribed, not from an acknowledgement of his right to make them, but from motives of policy: knowing that he possessed a large estate in Jamaica, and if they opposed his inclinations, he would most probably dispose of that estate to some other person. That paper therefore, we think, ought not to have any weight in the determination of the question.

With respect to the bonds given by complainant, when the division of the estate was made, they were given, it is to be presumed, in conformity to the mode prescribed by that deed, so that no inference can fairly be drawn from that act of an acquiscence on the part of complainant, respecting the account of his co-administrator being thereby settled. Indeed his subsequent conduct plainly evinces the contrary, for we find defendant's testator by letters in the months of April, June and October, 1798, several months subsequent to the division of the estate, written to complainant, informing him that he had drawn out his account, had mislaid it, but would draw it out again, and send it to him. It is impossible for us to ascertain whether he meant a private account between them, or those of his administration. The latter is as probable as the former; especially as it has not been attempted to be proved that he ever settled his account with his father. It is to be lamented that executors and administrators in general, are so remiss in their duty as not to conform to the directions of the law, by rendering accounts of their administration to the ordinary annually. Had that been done in this case, no difficulties could have occurred. There would have been no occasion for the present suit, and a public discussion of family discord, (at all times unpleasant, but which must be peculiarly so to the relatives of the deceased) would have been avoided. The court are of opinion, and decree, that the defendants account for their testators administration of the *monies belonging to the estate which he received, and that the injunction be continued till further order of the court.

*246

---

2 Desaus. 246

Case XXXII.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.]

JAMES SHOOLBRED v. CHARLES and THOS. DRAYTON.

(June, 1804.)

[Partition ⇐111.]

Three executors who were residuary devisees, had sold the real estate for a division upon credit, and divided the bonds equally amongst themselves; and one of them had pledged the bond that fell to him to his private creditor. Afterwards, the court at the instance of another heir, set aside the sale, decreeing that the estate was divisible into four shares instead of three, and that the sale was unauthorized. Upon a re-sale, the creditor to whom the above pledge was made, shall come in for the one fourth that would belong to the devisee who made the pledge, although it may leave an unequal pressure of debts on the other executors who assented to the sale and division.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 401; Dec. Dig. ⇐111.]

The case made by the bill was this—that the defendants, together with their brother Glen Drayton, were the sons and executors of John Drayton, deceased. That in the year 1779, they divided the estate of their testator amongst themselves, each taking one third part. That one part of the property so divided, was a house in Broad-street, which they sold for the purpose of division. That Dr. Chanler became the purchaser, and gave his three bonds for the purchase money, secured by a mortgage of the property; and each executor took one bond to himself as his portion or share of that property. That Glen Drayton was indebted to William Smith & Co. on a bond dated 7th March, 1788, for £720. 7s. on which, judgment was entered up 17th Oct. 1791—execution issued in May, 1792, and levied by sheriff Postell on a large gang of negroes held by G. Drayton. That complainant became administrator of William Smith, to whom G. Drayton owed sundry monies on accounts—these were liquidated with complainant, and G. Drayton gave his bond, dated 17th May, 1792, for the further sum of £684. 11s. 4d. and *confessed judgment thereon 27th May, 1792, on which execution was issued and levied in like manner as above. On the faith of these levies, and at the strong solicitations of G. Drayton, and repeated promises of payment, a series of indulgences were granted him. As a further security, he deposited with complainant one of the above bonds, made payable to the three executors, being the one that had fallen to G. D. on the division, which bond was for the sum of £1305. 4s. which bond the said G. Drayton then alleged was exclusively his own, and on which it appeared he had received sundry payments from Dr. Chanler. That complainant gave notice to Dr. Chanler, and believes the transfer was known to the defendants; that no objection was ever made. That G. Drayton had for many years held a large real and personal estate as his own, which was never questioned by his brothers, on the faith of which, creditors had extensively trusted him.—That in the year 1792, the defendants filed a bill against the judgment creditors of G. Drayton, stating that the brothers had divided the estate, on the mutual principle that each one was to pay his own share of the debts. That G. Drayton had involved himself extensively, and his creditors were about to take the property obtained from his father's estate under their executions: and this court, at their instance, granted an injunction to restrain the private creditors: that defendants then let the business rest for years, and suffered their brother, G. Drayton, to make crops and use them. That complainant employed counsel to urge his particular claims, but was told at a late stage of the cause, that not being named a party, he could not be heard except on an original bill; and the court proceeded to decree in that case, that all the lands that had been bequeathed by the testator to his son John, and which were directed to be sold in the event of his death, and which had been sold by the executors, should be re-sold by the executors under the directions of the master; which decree comprehends the aforesaid house, and the bonds taken from Dr. Chanler for the purchase of it, and operates to *cancel the bond, so as aforesaid transferred to complainant. That the said decree goes to defeat the creditors of G. Drayton, and the legal liens they had obtained: and although the court did not consider such claims as sufficient to bar the remedy of the creditors of John Drayton the testator, and the minor heirs of his son John, yet that those objects are duly provided for: and therefore the court ought to hold the defendants shares of the estate answerable for the reimbursement of G. Drayton's creditors, who ought not to be sacrificed for defendants safety; as they being executors, fully assented to the division, and to G. Drayton's holding his own share, absolutely, and freely incumbering it. And especially, that they ought to be decreed to indemnify complainant for the rescision of the sale to Dr. Chanler at their instance, so as to make good the amount of the bond that had been transferred by G. Drayton by their sanction. That this was the security for indulgence, and complainants might have sold the negroes levied upon as other creditors had done, and the property would have been out of the reach of the defendants, and the debts have remained upon them.

*247

*248

The defendants in their answer, admit that the debts stated to be due from G. Drayton to complainant, may be truly due. Also that indulgence might have been given, but not at the request of defendants. They admit that the bond of Chanler was allotted at the division of the estate to Glen Drayton, being his share of the sale of the house in Broad street. Also that G. Drayton received payments thereon, and that he deposited the bond with complainant, tho' defendants do not know for what purpose; but believe it may have been about the time and for the purpose in bill stated. But they own that at the time they divided and allotted the bonds, they did believe that each was entitled to one third of the house. But this court in March, 1793, in the case of the heirs of John Drayton the younger, against those defendants, determined that each was entitled to only one fourth, and defendants did not then know of the transfer of the bond to *the complainant, nor for a long time after, but it was kept a profound secret from both. That their bill was filed for an injunction, 3d. July, 1792, and the time of depositing the bond in November, 1792. That defendant Charles Drayton found it out by applying for it to secure himself when G. Drayton informed him he had parted with the bond. That he was his surety for 3000 guineas, which he has been obliged to pay, and was as ignorant of his circumstances as the rest of his creditors.

*249

That the debts due to complainants were contracted in 1780, 1781 and 1782, long before the bond was in existence, and could not be contracted on the faith of it, and that the execution could not bind it. As for not restraining G. Drayton from taking the crops during the long pendency of the suit, it was not advised by counsel, probably from not deeming the crops liable to his proportion of testators debts. That the bill and answer were lost for several years, and the creditors might equally have taken measures to urge the suit. That complainants case is not stronger than those of the other creditors of G. Drayton, concerning whom the court have already decreed; and as to the bond, complainant could have no more than an equitable claim, nor stand in a better light than G. Drayton himself, who could have no right until his proportion of his fathers debts was paid. That at all events his proportion of the house was only one fourth instead of one third, and he has probably received that amount in the payments that have been made to him on the bond. That this court having determined that the sale of the real estae including this house, was void, the bond and mortgage must be so too.†

*250

*This case was argued by Mr. Ford and Mr. Wm. L. Smith for the complainant, and by †This determination of the court will be found in the decree delivered Sept. 25, 1794, decree book, vol. 1, p. 177, which is accidentally omitted to be inserted in this work. It was the sequel of the suit of John Drayton, for self and minor sister, v. Charles Drayton and others, executors of John Drayton, reported ante, vol. 1, p. 324; and the decree should have been inserted in the 1st. volume. It is now inserted, and was as follows:

*250

*JOHN DRAYTON et al. v. CHARLES, GLENN AND THOMAS DRAYTON.

[Powers ⊜36.]

[Cited in Carroll v. Stewart, 4 Rich. 202; Mallet v. Smith, 6 Rich. Eq. 22, 60 Am. Dec. 107, to the point that a will authorized a sale of the testator's real estate, but did not authorize the executors to sell. The executors, in good faith, supposing themselves authorized, sold the land for the purpose of a division, and became the purchasers of a large portion of it. Held, that the sale was void, and that the executors would not be compelled to abide by their purchase.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Powers, Cent. Dig. § 141; Dec. Dig. ⊜36.]

Decree.

The point principally litigated in this case is, whether the defendants shall be held to their respective purchases of land belonging to their father's estate, which they advertised and set up

Mr. Parker for the defendant. But as the grounds of argument were similar *to those used on either side in the case of the executors of J. Drayton v. G. Drayton and others, (ante, vol. 1, p. 557, 562 &c.) it is deemed unnecessary to detail them here.

*251

Chancellor JAMES delivered the decree of the court as follows:

This case differs from that heretofore decreed between *the executor of J. Drayton, and the creditors of Glen Drayton, in one circumstance only, and that is, with respect to the bond in question of Dr. Chanler, for complainant had obtained judgment and execution, and the execution was levied on the property in Glen Drayton's possession, in May, '92, prior to the delivery of the bond to him. It is to be observed that Chanler's bond formed no part of the security for the debt in the first instance, and was considered in no other light than merely as a collateral security when received, according to complainants own statement; because though it amounted to nearly as much as Glen Drayton's debt, it was not taken in payment or satisfaction, for the judgment and execution still subsisted to be enforced at the pleasure of the complainant. The conduct of the defendants has been arraigned for delivering up this bond to Glen Drayton as his property, thereby giving it a currency, whereby complainant was induced to forbear enforcing his execution, and recovering his debt. If there appeared the smallest tincture of fraud in the defendants conduct, the court would lay hold of it to make them personally responsible for this debt: but when it is considered that the division of their testators estate was first made during the invasion of this country by the British, when no man could call his property his own one moment; that it to sale in February, 1786, or whether the lands shall be re-sold. Upon a review of the testators will, it does not appear that he has given any authority to these executors to sell any part of his estate, not even the lands in question, although he has directed them to be sold in the event of his son John's death during his minority, and without issue; nor has he authorized his executors to make a division of the real and personal estate bequeathed to John, or of his the testators residuary estate, although he has directed that such division shall take place: so that in these respects, the will is very defective. It has never been questioned that where a testator directs his estate to be sold, but gives no power to his executors to sell, that in such cases, a sale by the executors is illegal, and there have been various instances where executors in those cases have applied to this court to sanction their sale, which has always been done.

*252

In the present case, the defendants conceiving that upon John's death, they were exclusively entitled to the estate bequeathed to him, proceeded to a sale of the lands directed to be sold, in order as they expressly swear, (and their answer stands uncontradicted by any evidence) to make a division of the money, but no other person bidding except in one instance but the person authorized by defendants; they were bought in by defendants in such parcels as best suited them. Impressed with these ideas, it was not very material whether the lands sold at a higher or a lower rate, if their depreciation purchases were nearly for the same price; as in such case, either would have but a small sum to pay the others. It was contended that as complainants were minors at the time of sale, and there are creditors also interested, their rights should be particularly attended to by the court, and defendants ought therefore to be held to their bargain.—Though the claims of minors and creditors should be protected, it must not be done to the injury or oppression of the adverse party, who may have acted incautiously, but without any intention of fraud. If there was any evidence whatever before the court, which shewed that the defendants were apprized of complainants right, and yet persisted in the sale, not being authorized by will to make it, the court would be strongly inclined to hold them to their purchase.—But defendants have positively sworn that the sale was made from a misconception of their right, and for the express purpose of a divi*sion.—That no titles have ever been made, nor indeed could they have been properly or legally made. But it was said complainant J. D. who is the heir at law, is willing to make them titles. We ask, would he have been willing to make titles, had the defendants bought in the lands for a trifle? On the other hand, would he not then have requested the court to protect him in his right? As the court would not have confirmed the sales if the lands had been sold at a low price, purely on the principle that the executors had done an act which they were not authorized to do either by the will or the law; so neither ought the court to oblige the defendants to abide by their purchase, made under a sale which they were not warranted in, and under a misconception of their right, without any intention of fraud or deceit. The court are therefore of opinion and decree, that all the lands devised by testator to his son John, (which he directed to be sold on the event of his death) shall be forthwith re-sold by the executors under the direction of the master, on a credit of one, two and three years, taking bond from the purchasers, with a mortgage of the premises. Also that the personal estate, and such other parts of the real estate as John was entitled to under his father's will, and not directed to be sold, to be divided by three persons chosen for that purpose, into four equal parts or shares, and that one of such fourth part or shares, shall be delivered over to the complainant John Drayton for the benefit of the estate of William H. Drayton, deceased, he to be accountable for a proportionate share of testator's debts as were chargeable on his residuary estate. Also, that it be referred to the master to ascertain and report, what shall be a fair and reasonable sum of money to be paid by defendants for the use of the lands which they purchased, from the time of their purchase respectively; and also what may be a reasonable allowance for the work and labor of the negroes complainant may be entitled to; to be computed from the death of testator's son John to the time when the division shall be made, deducting thereout the expences of taxes and clothing; that the master shall examine and ascertain what sum of money was allowed or paid by defendants to Mrs. D. for her dower in John's lands, and the residuary real estate of their testator, and debit complainants with one-fourth part thereof in his settlement of accounts. And lastly, that the defendants do pay the costs of this suit out of the sales of the estate.

*251

was then made evidently for the benefit of all concerned: That every thing continued in a state of confusion for several years afterwards—when it is considered that defendants looked on the property as their own when they made the division, but had misconceived their rights; and it was not until some years after when their mistake was corrected by a decree of this court: When all these circumstances combined together are considered, they weigh strongly with the court not to make the defendants personally responsible; The first part of their conduct being justifiable, and the second in a great measure excusable. Besides a custom had too commonly prevailed, and in some instances had been sanctioned by the court, of dividing estates among the heirs and devisees before the debts *were satisfied. The inconvenience of such a practice has been seen by the court, and severely felt by creditors, and we trust will never occur again. Complainant states that he forbore to enforce his execution on the appeal of Glen Drayton's friends, and in consideration of this bond being deposited with him. Defendants in their answer positively deny they ever made the appeal set forth, and complainant has not proved they did; and so far from countenancing his parting with the bond, they wished and endeavoured to get it back again to secure themselves. As to complainants enforcing his execution, he would have been prevented from selling as well as the other creditors of Glen Drayton, who were restrained by injunction.

*253

It has been urged that the court in the former decree had favored the defendants, by setting aside the sale they had made of testators lands, which would prejudice their individual creditors; and it may eventually prove so. The reasons however, which are given by the court in their decree, evidently shew that the interest of defendants was not at all the object of that decree, but to make a legal distribution of testators estate, and set aside a sale not authorized by his will. If in so doing, a prejudice has arisen to the creditors of one of the legatees, it cannot be avoided: the will of the testator from whom the estate was derived must be complied with. The court are disposed to do all they can consistently with the principles of justice and equity for complainant's relief; but they are of opinion that they would violate those principles, in making defendants personally responsible for Glen Drayton's debt, seeing that they have already suffered considerably by his misconduct. As the house however still remains the property of the estate, and G. Drayton was entitled to a fourth part of the reversion in it, the court will order that the reversion in the house be sold, and the one fourth part of the amount sales thereof be paid over to the complainant.

2 Desaus. *254

*Case XXXIII.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.]

CHARITY FORREST, by Thomas Karwon, Her Trustee, v. JAMES WARRINGTON.

(June, 1804.)

[Husband and Wife ⇨29.]

A marriage settlement not recorded in the time prescribed by the acts of the legislature, is void as to a bona fide purchaser of the settled property from the husband. The wife's choses in action are equally included in those acts with other personal estate; and a transfer by delivery, by the husband, to a bona fide purchaser, is good against the wife, as well as other assignees.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Matheney v. Guess, 2 Hill, Eq. 69; Phillips v. Rivers, 1 S. C. 449.

For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 167; Dec. Dig. ⇨29.]

[Assignments ⇨22.]

[A chose in action is assignable at law as well as in equity.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. § 36; Dec. Dig. ⇨22.]

[Husband and Wife ⇨11.]

[The receipt of dividends on bank stock belonging to the wife, and the assignment of the stock by the husband, are a sufficient reduction into possession to vest the property in the assignee.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. ⇨11.]

The bill states, that in May, 1794, the complainant Charity Forrest, (then widow of R. Lushington) being about to intermarry with George Forrest, had a deed of settlement made, dated 8th of May, whereby her real and personal estate were conveyed to William Mason, (since deceased) and Thomas Karwon, as trustees, the particulars of which personal property were stated in a schedule annexed to the marriage deed, to which her said husband was a party, and in which the full power of holding and disposing was reserved to complainant as will appear by the deed itself. That the marriage took place 14th May, 1794. Among the articles of personal property settled, there were forty eight shares of bank stock, in the South-Carolina Bank, standing in the name of complainant, Charity Lushington. On these shares her brother-in-law, Daniel Lathan, drew the dividends for the year 1793, by virtue of a power of attorney from complainant. That the said George Forrest went to the bank, and without any power from her, drew the dividends for 1794, 1795 and 1796. That from the marriage and during part of the year 1797, the said George Forrest was in good credit, and supposed to be affluent. That in the month of May, 1797, he suddenly left this state, and no certain accounts of him have been since had. Numerous attachments have been issued by his creditors, and all his property has been seized and sold. That complainant was *ignorant of his circumstances, and being abandoned in a distressful condition, she claimed against the attaching creditors, the said bank shares, supposing them to be amongst the papers and property taken possession of. That she afterwards heard that Isaac Peace, one of the first attaching creditors, had laid claim to the same, as being included in 100 shares in the said bank, which George Forrest had transferred to him by an assignment, dated 27th November, 1796, in payment of some debt, but that they had not been delivered, the said G. F. having previously lodged them with other certificates in the office of the Charleston Insurance Company, of which he was a member, as a pledge, agreeably to their rules. That the deposit, as well as the assignment, were without the authority of complainant, or her trustee. That complainant learnt afterwards that James Warrington laid claim to 45 of the said bank shares as assigned to him by a deed subsequent to that to Isaac Peace: and complainant hath understood that the said 45 bank shares, with other stock, hath been delivered by the president or some other officer of the Insurance Company to the said James Warrington, in consequence of the claim by him so made. That the assignment made to the said J. Warrington by the said G. Forrest, was without the authority or assent of complainant or her trustee. That application hath been made to the said James Warrington, while in this state, and to his agent James Bulgin, since his departure, to deliver up the said bank shares, which they have refused, claiming property therein. The bill proceeds with divers charges, that defendant Warrington knew that G. Forrest was under the pressure of great difficulties, and availed himself of his necessities to get from him the stock he possessed at a great under value. That the consideration consisted of advances of money at an usurious rate of interest—that he knew the stock belonged to complainant as it stood in her name, and that the transaction was not fair and bona fide, and prayed that he or his agent, or the Insurance *Company, might be compelled to restore the said Bank Shares.

*255

*256

The defendant, James Warrington, filed a plea and answer. To the relief sought by the bill, he pleaded, that after the marriage between the complainant and George Forrest, and when he was in high credit, and reputed to be wealthy, viz: Sept. 1797, he pretending to be possessed in his own right, of and in the bank stock in bill mentioned, and sundry other stock in the same bank, and public stock of the United States (in plea set forth) all of which was deposited in the Charleston Insurance Company, subject to its controul, according to its rules and regulations, in consequence of G. Forrest being a proprietor of one half share of stock in that company, and pretending to have good right and full power to sell and transfer all the said stock, together with his share in the company, applied by his agent David Denoon to this defendant, and proffered to sell and transfer all his said stock and interest to the defendant for $6250, the defendant to come into the Insurance Company in his lieu and stead. That defendant inspected the rules of the company, and found that every stock holder must deposit money, or stock to be estimated at the lowest market price, to the amount of his capital share, and execute and deposit with such stock, ample powers of attorney, to sell and transfer the same, when by the rules and exigencies of the company it should become requisite. That on the 14th Sept. 1797, defendant applied at the Insurance Office for information, and was there informed by the clerk that the said G. Forrest held a half share, and shewed a specification of his deposit, amongst which were the bank shares in question, standing in the name of his wife before marriage, with several powers of attorney from G. Forrest, to sell and transfer the various stock, agreeably to the rules of the company; and defendant concluded that the said G. Forrest was the lawful proprietor with full power to dispose thereof, as a member of the company, and the said company having agreeably to their rules assented to receive defendant as a member in *lieu of G. Forrest, the defendant, on or about the 7th October, 1797, did actually purchase from the said G. Forrest, for valuable consideration, (viz. $2650,) all and singular the stock so deposited, including the shares in bill mentioned, whereupon by indenture made the 7th October, 1797, (ready to be produced) the said G. Forrest reciting that he was possessed of all the stock (as specified in the deed, and the shares in question amongst the rest) and other funds deposited in the insurance company according to its rules and regulations, for the consideration of $6250, paid, did bargain, sell and assign all the said stock and shares to the said J. Warrington, together with his half share in the company, &c. That by force of the assignment, and of an election had in the company, the said J. W. was admitted and accepted a member for a half share, and afterwards as such paid $2125, on a loss in the company; and the said J. Warrington doth aver that at the time of executing the assignment, and at and before the time when he paid the consideration money, and at and before the time of purchasing from the said G. Forrest, as aforesaid, he was without knowledge or notice of the marriage deed or settlement mentioned in the bill, and was an innocent and bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration, and without notice of the settlement or trusts in bill stated, and pleads the same in bar, of the relief prayed. And defendant answers (not waiving his said plea) that he does not know whether there was any power given to the husband to pledge the stock in said company, but submits that it was inferrible from the fact, that the said G. Forrest after the marriage always drew the dividends, and from his having possession of the original certificates. That the settlement all along lay concealed and not published on record as the law requires, until long after the stock was sold, viz. 4th November, 1797. The defendant denies that the said G. Forrest was apparently in embarrassed circumstances, but was in good credit; or that the certificates or stock were bought for inadequate consideration or for money advanced upon usurious in*terest, and avers that the contract was in manner and substance fair and bona fide.

*257

*258

This cause was argued by Mr. Pringle and Mr. Gaillard for the complainants, and by Messrs. Parker, Smith, Desaussure and Ford for the defendants.

For the complainant were cited, 1 Eq. Cas. ab. 68. 1 Vern. 161. 3 Ves. jr. 469. 5 Ves. jr. 515. 3 Atk. 20. 4 Bro. 139. 1 P. W. 459. 1 Atk. 280. 2 Ves. jr. 680. 4 Bro. 339. 1 Fonb. 96. 3 P. W. 197. 2 Fonb. 155, Solee v. Bezier, decided in this court. Also 2 Fonb. 155. 2 Ves. jr. 437, 440. 3 Atk. 654, 1 Fonb. 314. 3 Ves. jr. 469. 1 P. Wm. 199.

For the defendants were cited, Mitf. 215. 2 T. R. 70. 1 Fonb. 164. 3 P. W. 280, 1. Act of Assembly of March, 1785, and Dec. 1792. 1 Wils. 26. 3 Atk. 156. 2 Ves. 666. 2 Atk. 275. 2 P. W. 237, 532, 607. 3 P. W. 196. 1 Vern. 18. Ca. Temp. Lord T. 186. 2 Atk. 207.

The opinion of the court was delivered by Chancellor JAMES, as follows:

Complainant among other matters, states in her bill, that a marriage settlement was duly made and executed on the 8th May, 1794, by which forty-five shares in the South-Carolina Bank (among other property) were conveyed to trustees for the use of complainant Charity Lushington, (now Charity Forrest) the intended wife of George Forrest, which bank shares are the property claimed by the bill. That the marriage was shortly after solemnized, and the said George Forrest, soon after the marriage, received the dividends of said shares from the said bank, for the years 1794, 1795, 1796, without any power of attorney from complainant. That from the time of said intermarriage, until the close of the year 1797, the credit of the said George Forrest stood high as a merchant, but in the year last mentioned, he suddenly absconded from his creditors. That after the said George Forrest had left complainant in distressed circumstances, she found that the *said bank shares had been twice assigned by the said George Forrest—first, to Isaac Peace, without giving him possession of the certificates for the same; and secondly, to the defendant James Warrington, who had obtained possession of the said certificates from the president, or some other officer of the Charleston Insurance Company. That the said assignments were both made without any authority from complainant or her trustees.

*259

The defendant James Warrington, among other matters, sets forth in his answer:

That after the marriage of the said George and Charity Forrest, while the said George Forrest was apparently in affluent circumstances, viz: in the month of Sept. 1797, the said George Forrest pretending to have a right to sell the forty-five bank shares in dispute, together with other stock in the answer mentioned, this defendant did agree with him to purchase the same.

That in consequence of said agreement, the said bank shares were assigned to the defendant on the 7th October, 1797, under the hand and seal of the said George Forrest. That defendant gave a good consideration for the said bank shares, without notice of the marriage settlement, and was an innocent bona fide purchaser. That the said marriage settlement was never recorded in the manner prescribed by law. That therefore defendant pleads the matters of fact above stated in bar to so much of complainants bill as seeks to compel him to deliver up the said bank shares to the complainant.

A great many grounds have been occupied in this case, and the questions arising in it have been argued with great ability by the counsel on both sides. Upon consideration however, it appears to the court that the case may properly be confined to two grounds.

1st. Whether the marriage settlement of Charity Forrest, not being recorded, shall prevail against a bona fide purchaser.

2nd. Whether George Forrest, the husband, did make a legal assignment of the bank shares to the defendant.

*260

*Upon the first point, we observe that the act of the legislature to oblige persons interested in marriage deeds to record the same, passed on the 18th March, 1785, directs that every marriage contract, deed or settlement that shall hereafter be entered into for securing any part of the estate, real or personal in this state, of any person or persons whomsoever, shall within three months after the execution thereof be duly proved and recorded. That again, an act of the legislature to alter and amend the one above mentioned, which passed on the 21st of December, 1792, directs, that all marriage settlements shall particularise the real and personal estate thereby intended to be passed, or have a schedule annexed, particularising the same; and in default of such schedule, and recording the said settlements, are declared to be fraudulent and void against creditors and bona fide purchasers.

We have been the more particular in reciting these acts to shew the abundant caution of the legislature to provide against the mischiefs arising from the former practice of not recording marriage settlements. The preambles to both the acts also shew how anxious they were that persons interested in marriage deeds should not have it in their power to keep the same secretly by them, and by the shew of an estate liable for their debts, to induce creditors to trust them. If it were necessary by any other proof to shew the solicitude of the legislature to guard against these and such like mischiefs, it might be done by referring to the statute book, and pointing out that the spirit of every law upon the subject of recording deeds is directly opposed to the holding out of false lights to creditors, and bona fide purchasers.

The first act we have quoted, directs that marriage settlements shall be recorded within three months after the executing of the same; and the second enacts, that in default thereof, they shall be void against creditors and bona fide purchasers. Now in the case before us, the deed never was recorded until three years and seven months after the same was executed.

*261

*The acts of assembly have therefore pronounced it void, and how can this court say that it shall prevail against a bona fide purchaser. The abundant caution of the legislature has left no room for the interference of this court; and although it may be urged that this is a hard case, yet we must reply, as in a case decided to-day, that such is the law. Upon the question of assignment, it will be proper to enquire, 1st. Whether George Forrest had the power to assign. 2d. Whether the assignment was properly made. As to the power, we are of opinion, that although the marriage settlement was properly executed, as between the parties thereto; yet as to bona fide purchasers, from its not being recorded, that it remained inchoate, and inoperative.

To bring it into operation, the law required a certain act to be performed in a certain time; that act was not performed within the time fixed; therefore as between George Forrest and an innocent purchaser, the property remained as if no marriage settlement had ever been made, and all the marital rights over it, attached in the husband.

He would not indeed be allowed in equity to defeat his own agreement, if the same had been complete; but the trustees having left it incomplete, he was left at liberty to act as he pleased.

After the marital rights attached, it only remained for the husband to reduce the property into possession, to be able in law to assign the same; and this, it appears, he did by exercising acts of ownership over it; first, by receiving the dividends for three years; second, by depositing the certificates for the same in the Charleston Insurance Company; and third, by assigning over the same to the defendant. Now these acts certainly shew an intention to make use of the property—but to shew an intention to make use of property "is said in 2d Atk. 207, to be a sufficient reducing into possession. It therefore is plain that to a purchaser without notice, George Forrest had the power to assign.

*262

*The question then remains whether the assignment was properly made. It was contended by complainants counsel that a chose in action is not assignable at law, and that such assignment can only be made in this court. This may have been the case formerly, but in the case of Carteret & Paschal, 1st Peere Wm. 199, it is held that where Baron is entitled to a chose in action as he may release or forfeit it so if he should assign it for a valuable consideration, it would be good.

This case is fully in point, and the assignment stated to be made therein by Dr. Herbert, is similar in every principle to the one made by George Forrest, in the present case. We therefore hold this a sufficient authority for us to decide that the assignment by Forrest was properly made. It was strongly urged by complainant's counsel, that defendant had sufficient notice to put him upon inquiry, and therefore that this notice was good in law. We agree with the counsel, in the law, so far as it applies; but we apprehend that in all such cases, the purchaser ought to be put upon such an enquiry as might lead him to the truth. The only fact in the present case that could put the purchaser upon inquiring was that the stock at the time of the assignment, still stood in the name of Charity Lushington. But this fact would mislead him—seeing the stock still in the name of complainant before marriage, he would naturally conclude that by virtue of the marital rights it became her husband's after marriage.

But further if his researches carried him to the secretaries office, he would be led still further from the truth. Since there he would find that no marriage settlement had been recorded. So that the only information he had which could put him upon inquiry, would tend to lead him wide of the truth; we apprehend that the law quoted (from 1st. Fonb. 151) will not apply in the present case.

It was also contended that a chose in action was not such an interest as it was necessary to record; seeing from its nature it could hold out no false lights, could give no false credit, and therefore it could not come with*in the spirit of the acts. But as we cannot at this distance of time know all the views of the legislature in passing these acts it will be sufficient for us, if it can upon a fair construction be brought within the general words of the acts. It is clear from the books cited that choses in action constitute a part of personal estate. Now both acts of the legislature which we have cited, in directing settlements to be recorded, make use of the generic term personal estate, and therefore choses in action being as we have observed a part of the personal estate must come within the general words of the law, and ought like any other personal property contained in a marriage settlement, to be recorded.

*263

Before the court dismiss the subject, it may be proper to observe that during the argument, attempts were made to interest their feelings in favour of the complainant, as a woman left in destitute circumstances.

Had this been really the case, the court do not know what relief they could have afforded her under the law. But they find that the fact is otherwise, and that there is other property of considerable value contained in the marriage settlement, which does not appear to be claimed by the creditors of George Forrest.

Therefore as it appears that the marriage settlement was void, under the acts of assembly, from its not being recorded; and being so void, that the defendant, as a bona fide purchaser, became capable thereby to receive a legal assignment of the property in dispute,

It is therefore decreed upon the matters of fact set forth by defendant, that his plea in bar be sustained; and that the costs be paid by complainant.

---

2 Desaus. *264

*Case XXXIV.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.]

ADAM TUNNO and Others, Assignees of M'Farlane & Player, Bankrupts, v. LEWIS TREZEVANT, GEORGE CROSS, Jun., and Others, Trustees to the Marriage Settlement of Joshua Player and Charlotte, His Wife.

(June, 1804.)

[Fraudulent Conveyances ⟸94.]

A. makes a settlement before marriage, including his wifes fortune, and all his private property. The settlement was dictated by her uncle and guardian, who would not otherwise consent to the marriage, and who was ignorant of the insolvency of A. at the time. The creditors of the copartnership filed a bill to set aside the settlement as it respected his property as fraudulent and void against prior creditors. There was clearly no actual fraud, and the court refused to set aside the settlement.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Davidson & Simpson v. Graves, Riley, Eq. 236; McGowan v. Hitt, 16 S. C. 610, 42 Am. Rep. 650.

For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 241; Dec. Dig. ⟸94.]

[This case is also cited in Sniffer & Paxton v. Sass's Adm'r, 14 Rich. 22, note; Hutzler Bros. v. Phillips, 26 S. C. 148, 1 S. E. 502, 4 Am. St. Rep. 687, on relative rights of creditors of firm and of individual partners.]

The bill states that M'Farlane & Player, at the time they were declared bankrupts, were indebted to complainants and others in large sums of money. That the property of M'Farlane & Player will not pay two and six pence in the pound, they having surrendered respectively, very inconsiderable funds. That the said Joshua Player was possessed of a large estate derived from his father; and being so indebted and so possessed, he intermarried with Miss Charlotte E. Thomson; and previous to his intermarriage, executed a certain deed of settlement, on the 31st Dec. 1801, in consideration of his intended marriage, and in consideration of a certain settlement of his wife's property then in possession, and such as might afterwards come to her, whereby he conveyed to the defendants in trust, all his lands and negroes for the use of himself and wife for life, and if she died first, without issue living at her death, then to his sole use; but if she left issue alive, then to him for life, and remainder to the children. If the children died in his life time, then to his sole use for ever.—In the event of his dying before her, the same limitations are made in her favor; except that if she should die, leaving no issue alive, the property is to revert to his heirs.—*And the said Joshua Player further covenanted in and by the said settlement, that as soon as the said Charlotte E. Thomson's share of her father's estate was ascertained, he would convey the same to the said defendants, in trust for her separate use during their joint lives, not subject to his debts; and in the event of her dying first, without issue living, then in trust for the use of the said Joshua, his heirs, executors and assigns; but if she left issue, then to him for life, remainder to such issue. And in case the said Joshua should die before the said Charlotte, then to her for life, and remainder to her issue; in default of such issue to his right heirs.

*265

The bill prays that the said marriage settlement be postponed to the prior claims of the creditors, as far as regards the property of the said Player, thereby conveyed.

The answer of the defendants admits the settlement; that it was made on the 31st December, 1801, and that M'Farlane & Player were declared bankrupts on the 24th July, 1802; and the defendant Lewis Trezevant states the following facts in regard to the said settlement; that in May, 1801, the said Player applied to this defendant as guardian and uncle of the said Charlotte E. Thomson, (whose father was dead) to obtain his consent to the marriage of the said Player, with his niece; that this defendant consented thereto, but required that a proper settlement of her property should be made on her; and further, as mercantile men were liable to sudden misfortunes and failures, which often stripped them of their whole property; he required that the said Player should settle so much of his own property on her, and the issue of the marriage, as together with her own property, would secure her a competence in case he should meet with accidents, and become embarrassed. The said Player replied that a settlement was unnecessary, as his father's will devising to him his property, settled it upon him, and any family he might have. That this defendant expressing a doubt, whether the will might not be incorrectly worded, and not sufficient to effect this object, asked for a copy thereof, which *the said Player promised to give; at the same time saying, that if upon examination, the will should turn out to be insufficiently expressed to effect this object, he was willing to make the settlement required, as he knew his father's intention to be that the property should be so settled. That this defendant soon after examined the said will, and being of opinion that it would not secure with certainty this property to the family of the said Player, communicated to him that opinion, and required the settlement to be made. That the said Player then agreed to settle the said property upon such terms and trusts as this defendant might think proper and liberal. That this defendant then consented to his marriage with his niece, between whom and the said Player, an engagement immediately took place, although the marriage was not solemnized until some time after. And this defendant verily believes that the said marriage never would have taken place without his consent, which he certainly would not have given, unless this settlement had been made. This defendant solemnly avers, that neither at the time of the engagement, nor at the time of the marriage, had he any reason to suspect the solvency of M'Farlane and Player. That being but little acquainted with the circumstances of mercantile men in Charleston, he made some enquiries respecting the situation of M'Farlane & Player, at the time the latter was paying his addresses to his niece, and learnt that their credit was good at the custom house, and at the banks. Defendant therefore trusts that he will be acquitted of having had any improper design to procure the said settlement to be made for the purpose of placing the said property out of the reach of the creditors of M'Farlane & Player.

*266

This defendant avers that the settlement, and the terms and limitations therein contained, were proposed by himself, and not by the said Player. That the settlement was made in consideration of marriage, and to provide for the issue thereof, and also in consideration of the property and estate to which the said Charlotte was entitled.

*267

*These defendants contend, that as to the solvency of M'Farlane & Player, at the time of the agreement above named, the debts due in May, 1801, and not the amount due in December following, ought to be the sum taken into the calculation, because the verbal contract to make the said settlement, was made in May, at which time M'Farlane & Player were worth more than they owed by several thousand pounds sterling; but that even in December, they might reasonably have considered themselves solvent.

These defendants deny that M'Farlane & Player were indebted in the sum of $137,636.34 cents, in the month of December as stated; and they aver that a large part of the debts due in December, were paid before the bankrupty took place.

That the amount of debts proved against M'Farlane & Player, before the commissioners of bankruptcy, is only $74,318, 5cts. and in that amount, several creditors have proved their debts without giving credit for the proper discounts; which if done, would reduce the amount to $64,780, 30 cts.; and that from this sum ought to be deducted, the debt due by G. K. White & Co. which reduces the amount to $46,050, 25cts. That the debts and effects assigned by M'Farlane & Co. as bankrupts, is $91,281, 82 cts.

These defendants cannot admit that M'Farlane & Player are guarantees for Cummings & Co. as stated, and pray to be dismissed with costs.

The cause came to a hearing, and after argument, Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the decree of the court as follows:

This bill is brought by the assignees of M'Farlane & Player, against the defendants, trustees in a settlement made by Player, previous to his marriage, to set aside the settlement (so far as it respects his own private estate) in favor of the prior claims and rights of complainant and other creditors of M'Farlane & Player, the funds of the copartnership being wholly inadequate to the payment of *their debts, and because the said M'Farlane & Player were insolvent at the time of the settlement. The defendant Mr. Trezevant, who was the principal agent in the transaction, by his answer, among other matters, states that his niece referred Mr. Player to him, for his approbation, before she would give him an answer. That having no personal objection to Mr. Player, defendant proposed the settlement, which was afterwards made for the reasons set forth in his answer. That having inquired respecting the situation of M'F. & Player, he understood their credit was good at the banks and custom house; that neither at the time of his engagement, nor even at the time of the marriage, had he any reason to suspect the solvency of M'F. & Player; that he verily believes the marriage would not have taken place without his consent, and he would not have consented to it, if the settlement had not been made. That it was not only in consideration of marriage, and to provide for the maintenance and support of his neice, and for the issue of the marriage, but also in consideration of the property to which she was entitled. That her property is settled upon terms much more favourable for Mr. Player than his is in her favour. That it was the intention of Player's father, as expressed in his will, to secure the property he devised to his son, (and which is settled) in such a manner as to place it out of the reach of creditors; and therefore no more is done by the settlement than was intended by the father; and further that the lands settled are charged by the will with legacies to the amount of £600. It was admitted that this transaction was conducted with the utmost fairness and was totally free from the smallest imputation of fraud. It was nevertheless contended by complainants counsel that although there was no intention of fraud, yet if the deed was supported, it would operate as a legal fraud with respect to the creditors of M'F. & P. the copartnership being largely indebted at the time, and if not then really insolvent, has since proved to be so; that therefore Player had no right to make the settlement, in as much as it *breaks in upon the legal rights of creditors. For defendant it was insisted that M'F. & P. were solvent at the time of the contract, and no subsequent misfortunes ought to operate so as to invalidate it; that even if they were insolvent, and Player knew it, that would not affect the case, defendant not having notice of it, and they being purchasers for a bona fide and valuable consideration without notice. That the creditors trusted to the fund of M'F. & P. and must be paid out of them. Defendants were in nature of private creditors, and their claim was preferable to the copartnership creditors, and must be first satisfied out of the private estate. This case is confessedly stripped of every symptom of fraud: it does not therefore come within the statute of 13 Eliz. As the marriage would never probably have taken place, if it had been contemplated that the legality or validity of the settlement would have been at all controverted, the only question in the case is whether the settlement under all the circumstances of it, is made upon such a consideration as to prevail against creditors. Marriage is not only a bona fide and valuable consideration, but the very highest consideration in law; this court will therefore always support marriage settlements, if there is no particular evidence of fraud made out, shewing an intention to deceive or defraud creditors. In the case before us, referring to the answer of the defendant, M. Trezevant, he positively swears that M'F. & P. appeared to be in good circumstances; their credit was good, he was induced to give his consent to the marriage, (without which it would not have taken place) under the strongest conviction of the solvency of P. and that he was competent to make the settlement which was made.

*268

*269

Whether the house of M'F. & P. were or were not solvent, was a question defendant could not decide, he could only judge from circumstances, and he had no reason, as he has sworn, to suspect that they were insolvent. Besides the property proposed by Player, to be settled, was his own private estate, devised to him by his father, sub*sequent to his engaging in trade, and therefore could not have been counted upon by the copartnership creditors to satisfy their demands. Independent of that, defendant on referring to the fathers will, saw that his intention was to secure the property from his sons creditors, for the benefit of his grand children; and defendant therefore very naturally concluded that such intention would be carried into effect by this court, if applied to for that purpose. The doctrine of setting aside voluntary conveyances and settlements made by persons indebted at the time, is laid down we think on too broad a scale; for if that was held to be the law, scarce any settlements could be supported in this country, there being few or no persons who are not more or less in debt; and if it was to be extended to the actual solvency of the party making the settlement, it might be attended with great difficulty; for at that rate a man previous to making a settlement must know to a cent what he owed, and have his estate appraised to ascertain the precise value of it. The situation of mercantile men would be still harder, for they might be worth thousands to day beyond what they were indebted, and a few days hence by unforeseen losses in trade and bankruptcies of their debtors, they might be reduced to beggary. In the application of funds for payment of debts, the partnership effects are always appropriated to paying partnership debts, and the private estate to pay the private debts of the respective partners; the partnership creditors have no specific lien on the private estate of the individual partners. This is a private contract entered into by Player with the trustees, when he was generally believed to be in good circumstances, the consideration of which is of the highest nature, and not a scintilla of fraud in it. The private fortunes of Player and his intended wife, are mutually pledged as well for the purpose of securing a suitable maintenance and support for them, as for the providing for the issue of the marriage; and from the evidence offered, it appears the income is not, or is but barely sufficient for that purpose; and when the legacies *which are charged on the land are paid, which they must be, the income will be still less.

*270

*271

Upon the whole, the settlement seems to be both fair and just; we will not weigh it too nicely; it is a bona fide discharge of a moral duty, and ought to be supported.

Bill must be dismissed with costs.

Pringle for complainants.

Parker and Lightwood for defendants.

---

2 Desaus. 271

Case XXXV.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge, Marshall and James.]

WILLIAM TELFAIR v. EDWARD TELFAIR.

(November, 1804.)

[Courts ⇐489; Specific Performance ⇐58.]

The court will decree specific execution of a contract for the conveyance of land situate in this state, though the contract is in the form of a penal bond, and though the defendant resides out of the state.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Bowden v. Schatzell, Bailey, Eq. 366, 23 Am. Dec. 170.

For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 1326; Dec. Dig. ⇐489; Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 179; Dec. Dig. ⇐58.]

The bill was filed to obtain specific execution of a contract, for the purchase of a tract of land in South-Carolina, the contracting parties being partners. The defendant had given his bond to make titles to the land.

The bill stated that in 1772, complainant and defendant were connected in trade; complainant resided in London, defendant, then and still in Georgia. Defendant in May, 1794, bought of J. Smith and Elizabeth his wife, of Savannah, the plantation called Smithfield, containing 1,050 acres on Savannah river, in the State of South-Carolina, and took titles to him and his heirs for ever. That said purchase being made with the funds of complainant as well as defendant, he the defendant, on the day after the date of said titles, viz: on the 17th May, 1774, bound himself in a bond to complainant in the sum of £3,300. with a condition that in case defendant (upon complainants paying him the sum of £11,550. currency on or before the 31st August 1778, with interest from the date of bond to be paid annually, and upon the further payment of a moiety of all charges, &c. in repairs and buildings) would make him (said complain*ant) titles to one half of said plantation; then said obligation to be void, or otherwise to be of force.

*272

That said bond taken altogether was intended as an agreement to convey one half of said plantation to complainant, and ought to be carried into execution by this honorable court. That notwithstanding such purchase from Smith, the land belonged to Basil Cooper, of London, as is proved by said defendants letters, stating that on the 14th May, 1774, said Edward Telfair purchased of Mr. Cooper his half of Smithfield, for £1650 sterling and advising of his having executed a bond to make titles to half of said land to complainant upon his paying defendant's bond with interest, improvements, &c. That upon complainants being thus advised, he entered into bond with Basil Cooper, conditioned to pay £1650 with interest from 17th May, (time of purchase) at the interest of South-Carolina, eight per cent, being for the purchase of Smithfield. That said bond was accepted by said Cooper, as a performance by complainant of the stipulation made by defendant, touching said land, and was also an exoneration of defendant, and a performance of the stipulations entered into by complainant, to wit: the payment of £11,550 old currency, with interest at 7 per cent., making £1650 sterling, and complainant has taken up said bond, and is entitled to have half of said land conveyed to him and his heirs, according to the meaning of said bond, entered into by defendant, but settled by complainant. That in consequence of the revolution and the troubles incident thereto, complainant was a resident beyond sea until lately. That he has waited patiently for defendant to make him titles to said lands, hoping not to be compelled to resort to legal coercion against so near a relation; but defendant refuses to make titles, (although complainant has always been and still is ready, if there remains any thing on his part, to fulfil the same, and to come to a general account with defendant) & although complainant has paid said bond, which was for the consideration money for said land, and although said defendant has it in his power, if any other charges have ac*crued, to repay the same from the funds of complainant, which he retains in his hands, and upon which an account and general settlement will be found to exceed any charges which could possibly exist against complainant relative to said purchase. That the rents and profits of said plantation would themselves have defrayed the same.

*273

Bill prays for a specific execution of said bond, and that titles be made by defendant for one half of said land.

To this bill, the defendant demurred for want of equity, but the demurrer was overruled, and the defendant ordered to answer.

On the part of the defendant, the following paper was filed:

The answer of defendant contests the jurisdiction of the court, and denies all and every the matters alleged in the bill of complainant, except only that a bond with such special condition as is set forth in the bill, was signed and sealed by the said Edward, deposited with the late Basil Cooper, deceased, who was to have transmitted the same to the said William Telfair, and the said Edward does not admit that the said

William Telfair hath performed or complied with the conditions and covenants on his part to be performed. That on the contrary, the joint bond of Basil Cooper, and the said Edward Telfair, of which the original purchase of Smithfield, composes a part of the condition, is now in suit in the federal court of the district of Georgia. And the bond executed by the said Edward to Basil Cooper for one thousand six hundred and fifty pounds for the said Cooper's moiety, which the said William pretends to have satisfied, is now in suit in the same Circuit Court, to which suit, the said Edward among other pleas, has pleaded payment.

And the said Edward further saith, that Samuel Stiles obtained a judgment against him on the 21st February, 1793, in Beaufort district, in South-Carolina, for £1739 4s. 5d. which is in full force and unsatisfied, and for the payment of which, the said Edward conceives the said tract of land to be bound.

*274

And the said Edward saith that he *is a citizen of the state of Georgia, openly and notoriously residing there, and that he was not in the state of South Carolina at the time of filing the said bill, so as to be served with process, and that he has always been and still is ready to answer any suit, either at law or in equity brought against him in the courts of the United States for the district of Georgia. He therefore doth not admit, but insists against the power of the said Court of Equity, to call him in to answer as to matters contained in the said suit, he not residing in that state, nor being found there to be served with process. Wherefore for the several matters above stated, the said Edward requires that the said bill be dismissed.

The cause came to a hearing, and after argument, Chancellor RUTLEDGE delivered the following decree of the court:

The bill and answer being read, the only evidence adduced was, on the part of the complainant: 1st. A letter from defendant to complainant, dated the 29th of May, 1774, advising him of his having purchased B. Cooper's moiety of the tract of land called Smithfield, for complainant. 2d. A bond from defendant to complainant, to make him titles, on complainant's giving his bond for the purchase money to B. Cooper, and paying his proportion of expenses for improvement, &c. 3d. Complainants bond to B. Cooper for the purchase money, which bond was cancelled, the complainants name and seal being torn off, from which circumstance it was argued for complainant, that the purchase money due thereon must have been paid. There was no evidence offered on the part of defendant; but the defence urged by his counsel, was principally against decreeing a specific execution of the contract, after the length of time which had elapsed since it had been entered into; and that the court should leave the party to his remedy at law on defendants bond; especially as it did not appear that complainant had ever paid any part of the expenses, &c., which was part of the condition of the bond.—On the first blush of the case, the court were strongly in*clined to send the complainant to seek his remedy in the state of Georgia; but as he could at law only recover the penalty, and should he file his bill in the Circuit Court of the United States, and obtain a decree for a specific performance, that court could only enforce its decree by the process of attachment against his person, the land lying in this state, whereas this court could enforce its decree by putting the complainant in possession of the land, if defendant should prove contumaceous, the court have therefore thought fit, on maturely weighing all circumstances of the case, to retain the suit, and to order and decree, that the defendant do forthwith make good and sufficient conveyances in fee simple to complainant of the land in bill mentioned; that defendant be at liberty to file any discount which he may have against complainant for expenses incurred in improvements, &c. and that the land shall be considered as liable for the payment thereof: complainant being equally at liberty to make his charge against defendant for rent or hire of the said land.

*275

Costs to be paid by the defendant.

Desaussure and Ford for complainant.
Gaillard for defendant.

---

2 Desaus. 275

Case XXXVI.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge and Marshall.]

WILLIAM LOUGHTON SMITH, v. J. FISHER.

(November, 1804.)

[Discovery ⇐8.]

The court will not compel a defendant to answer whether his transactions with a third person were, or were not of an usurious nature, at the instance of a creditor of that third person; he not seeking the discovery, and there being no charge of fraud on the complainant.

[Ed. Note. Cited in Pickett v. Pickett, 2 Hill, Eq. 479.

For other cases, see Discovery, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. ⇐8.]

The case made in the bill, was shortly this; that prior to 1792, D. Campbell, owed complainant sundry sums of money, and on the 12th July, 1792, Mr. Campbell executed a mortgage to complainant of a considerable number of slaves and complainant going *abroad, left Mr. Campbell his agent, and left in his hands said mortgage with his other papers. The mortgage was to have been recorded, but was not recorded, until the 28th February, 1804, when complainant returned to this state. Complainant found that in the mean time, viz. 21st Oct. 1796, Mr. Campbell had executed a mortgage of sundry negroes and property to the defendant, J. Fisher, to secure payment of certain bonds given by Mr. Campbell to him. The said mortgage comprehended the negroes before mortgaged to complainant, and was duly recorded, and so took a preference at law. The bill alleges that after complainant's departure, D. Campbell became greatly embarrassed in his circumstances, and was compelled to resort to the expedient of taking up monies from divers persons at usurious interest, and of using the complainant's funds that came into his hands, to relieve his embarrassments. Being pressed and embarrassed with debts of this nature in the banks, some of the usurious notes alleged to have been held by defendant himself, he applied to the defendant to lend him a sum of money sufficient to pay off or take up all these notes, proffering good security. That defendant took an unfair advantage of him, and in lieu of money, compelled him to take stock at an enormous price, far above its price in the market, which Mr. Campbell was obliged to accept, in order to raise money by a sale of the stock at a sacrifice, and part of the money was applied to take up notes due the defendant, which were charged to be usurious, as will appear by discovery of defendant if compelled to answer. That complainant is a great sufferer by Mr. Campbell; the defendant threatens to inforce his mortgage and absorb the whole estate of said Campbell, thereby leaving complainant without any remedy, either by virtue of his mortgage or otherwise. And complainant prays that the defendant's incumbrances may either be cancelled, or postponed to the debt of complainant, on the grounds of the alleged usury and the oppressive manner in which the contract was made between the said *defendant and the said D. Campbell—and the bill seeks discovery and relief.

*276

*277

The defendant demurred to that part of the bill that sought for a discovery, whether the dealings between defendant and D. Campbell, antecedently to the sale of the stock, when these incumbrances were created, were not usurious. And as to the relief sought against these incumbrances, the defendant answered, that he knew nothing of the transactions between the complainant and D. Campbell, the origin or amount, or nature of the debt, nor of the mortgage stated to have been made in 1792. That as to the communication alleged to have been had for a loan, prior to the selling of the stock, he denies it. That he did not seek Campbell, but the latter applied to the defendant, having heard that he possessed a quantity of stock. That he offered defendant 20s. in the pound if he would sell him the stock on a credit of 1, 2 and 3 years. Defendant believes, but does not know positively, that it might have been sold for 18s. cash. That Campbell offered him security by mortgage of his real and personal estate. Defendant employed a professional gentleman to investigate his titles, and search the records, who reported the same to be good and unincumbered. Denies that the debt or any part of it was created for notes due the defendant, but solely for the sale of stock which was a commodity in the market like all other articles of fluctuating value, and always commanded a higher price on an extensive credit, as is usual with every thing else. That he took no advantage of his necessities, but fairly sold the stock at the same rate at which he had sold stock before. That to him the stock was at par, and he determined to keep it rather than sell it under par—and was not anxious to sell.

That instead of rigor, he had exhibited great lenity to the said D. Campbell, as the statement of the debt would shew, and denied any right in the complainant to interfere wtih his contract, which was fair and bona fide.

The demurrer was argued by Mr. Smith himself, and Mr. Gaillard for complainant, and by Mr. Parker and *Mr. Ford for the defendant. Many grounds were taken and many authorities cited on both sides, but it would swell this case to an unreasonable extent, to give the arguments of the counsel.

*278

The opinion of the court on the demurrer was delivered by Chancellor RUTLEDGE, as follows:

The complainant is a creditor of D. Campbell, and his bill seeks a discovery from defendant, respecting certain usurious transactions which he alleges have taken place between Campbell and defendant, and also with several other persons; likewise a discovery whether the bonds and mortgages in bill referred to, were not found on usurious considerations, and obtained from complainant by coercion, and when in such necessitous circumstances, that he was obliged to make the contract to relieve himself from his embarrassments. Defendant has demurred to such parts of the bill as call upon him to discover whether complainant had not at various times borrowed considerable sums of money from him and other persons, on usury or at exorbitant interest. To the other parts of the bill which relate to the bonds and mortgages, he has answered partly. The demurrer is now the only subject for determination.

If a bill had been filed by D. Campbell himself, containing the charges set forth in this, the case would have worn a different aspect, and defendant might perhaps have been compelled to answer. But the complainant being a creditor, and the defendant standing in the same situation, and Campbell himself not appearing to be dissatisfied with his contract, and not seeking to set it aside—if the court, upon the bare suggestion of one creditor, were to allow of an investigation of transactions between debtor and creditor, without any charge of fraud, it would be productive of infinite litigation. No fraud being charged in this transaction, and defendant having answered that part of the bill which relates to the consideration for which the bond and mortgages were given him by D. Campbell, the court are of opinion that it is by no means *necessary or material for him to answer that part of the bill respecting any prior usurious transactions between him and D. Campbell, if there were any, but more especially such as may have taken place between him and other persons. Cases cited are good law when applicable, but not so on the subject of the demurrer. How far they may apply on a discussion of the general question, will be determined when that is argued.

*279

Demurrer must be sustained.

NOTE.—In a subsequent term the court decreed on the merits which depended on matters of fact, and much evidence was adduced.

For the decree itself, vide Decree book, No. 2, p. 326, delivered in April, 1806.

---

2 Desaus. 279

Case XXXVII.

[Present, Chancellors Rutledge and Marshall.]

ANDREW KERR and Wife, Administratrix of Elizabeth Hill, and Guardian of Henry D. Hill, v. CHARLES P. BUTLER, Surviving Executor of Duncan Hill.

(October, 1804.)

[Executors and Administrators ⟸109.]

An executrix not allowed credit in her accounts for payments made by her, merely on the verbal request of the testator on his death bed; no measures having been taken to reduce the request to writing as a nuncupative will.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Turnipseed v. Sirrine, 60 S. C. 287, 38 S. E. 423.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 435; Dec. Dig. ⟸109.]

[Wills ⟸730.]

A testator giving the profits of his whole estate to his wife for life, and to his son afterwards, the wife is bound to maintain the son in minority, and till her death; and she cannot charge the son with board and maintenance.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Rhode v. Tuten, 34 S. C. 501, 13 S. E. 676.

For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1785; Dec. Dig. ⟸730.]

[Husband and Wife ⟸110.]

[A wife advanced to her husband several sums of money, for the purposes of his business, out of her separate property. On the death of the husband, he devised to his wife, for her life, after payment of several legacies, his whole estate. Held, that the representatives of the wife might recover, against the devisee in remainder, the sum so advanced.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 404; Dec. Dig. ⟸110.]

The complainants set forth in their bill, that the said Elizabeth Hill, formerly Elizabeth Butler, was possessed of a considerable real and personal estate, and contemplating a marriage between herself and Duncan Hill, did, on or about the 3d December, 1785, by indenture tripartite, the said Duncan Hill consenting thereto, and joining therein, for the considerations therein mentioned, settle, convey, and assure all her estate to Angus M'Cleod and James Hamilton, in trust for

*280

